Again, it will be seen that we view sin as the greatest of known evils. Hence an answer to that captious question which is sometimes asked, "If Universalism is true, what need is there of preaching it?" We answer, that God, in all we behold of his dispensations, uses means—and preaching is a means calculated to aid in the removal of this vast evil. Although we teach that men will be ultimately saved from it, we believe that they are immediately exposed to it, and that it acts upon them. And from this and its consequences, we would be instrumental in saving them, by the word of exhortation, entreaty, and warning. I stand up here, my hearers, to predict that in the usual order of nature, there will be a harvest in the course of the next year. But I know that there will be sowing and planting also. So we believe that God will ultimately save all; but we believe, likewise, that he will use means in accomplishing this salvation—and man is a great agent in applying these means. When we view the enormity of sin, shall we not strive to remove it? Shall we stand idle in the vineyard, knowing tha tour labor is needed in gathering the fruit? Shall we not toil, because we are told that the great work will finally be consummated, if not at all through us, through the agency of others? Is such our duty to God and our fellow-men?

Again, we have seen that he who is not born again, or from above, can not enter the kingdom of heaven, and that Universalism teaches this. No man will be saved in his sins. Until he turns and drinks of the waters of life, he can not be holy—he cannot be happy. Hence, it is wrong to say of us, that we teach that the suicide and the blasphemer may rush into the enjoyment of heavenly bliss with reeking hands and half-uttered oaths. In attacking our faith, let not this charge be brought against us.

Once more, we see that Universalism teaches that every man shall be adequately punished for his sins. How then can our doctrine be immoral in its tendency? Is it calculated to harden one, when we tell him that if he sows evil, he shall reap dread retribution? We do not hold up before him the illusion that he shall be saved from punishment. Is it of immoral tendency to tell him that he shall finally be saved from SIN? In so doing, we only affirm that which every Christian hopes for him, viz., that he will yet repent and be saved from his sins. And does any Christian hope for him that which would be of immoral tendency? Every appeal that is made to the impenitent one, is, or should be, accompanied with the hope which we have named. What this Christian hopes for, then, I repeat, we only affirm. Take, for instance, the hardened felon—is it calculated to continue him in sin, when we shew him that the more he sins, the more he suffers; that in virtue, in doing the will of God alone, is happiness; that the deeper and the oftener he sins, the heavier will be his punishment, and the oftener will it visit him; yet, that there will come a time when his soul shall be washed from pollution, his evil dispositions and vile affections removed, and his scarlet sins made white. Is this calculated to harden him in iniquity?—especially, too, when we represent to him that he is going counter to the will, and rebelling against the laws of his Father in heaven, the best being in the universe, the source of every blessing which he has received, and One who has done him good, and that continually?

But some may say that we preach too much, and set forth too prominently the love and the mercy of God; or, rather, that we do not as often as we should, unveil terror to the evildoer. We answer, that we do not think that the goodness of God can be dwelt upon too frequently, or be too vividly represented. It may be that we err in the latter respect, and that in striving to avoid one extreme, we cling to the other. Yet we deem ours the nobler error, inasmuch as we appeal to the nobler passion. May God give us zeal to declare his whole counsel, and show us wherein we fail! We do think however, that the exhibition of God's love, is the most powerful motive which can be applied to the softening of obdurate natures, and the melting of stern hearts. Facts conclusively prove to us the strength of the principle of love. It is the most powerful in the universe. It conquers the soul with its "still, small voice," when the whirlwind and the flame have swept by unheeded. It is destined finally to triumph, for "the goodness of God leadeth to repentance."—(Romans ii: 4.)

Lastly, it will be seen that the great doctrine which we teach is, that all mankind will be saved, not from hell, but from SIN—that all will be ultimately HOLY. Although it was my intention in this discourse, merely to exhibit our faith, not to argue specially in its defence, yet there is one remark which is sometimes made, that I will notice. It is said that when men have suffered adequate punishment for their sins, they may claim heaven as a right, owing nothing to redeeming love. Now, this argument we think most unreasonable. Is it so even in the affairs of this life? Does the suffering of merited punishment, bestow upon the sufferer a claim to the richest boon in the gift of the law-giver? Because the convict has remained his term of ten years in the State prison, has he a right to the endowment of an office in the commonwealth? You will answer to these questions, unhesitatingly, "No!" Well, then, because I had endured the misery which flows from transgression, would I be entitled to perfect bliss? because I had passed through hell, have I a right to heaven? No! my situation would be merely a negative one, neither suffering inflicted pains, nor enjoying additional blessings—in which it would be mercy to me that I was permitted, free from torment, even to behold the New-Jerusalem, or to stand and gaze afar upon the glory of its radiant portals.

But this argument of our opponents arises from a mistaken conception of our doctrine. We do not teach that heaven is purchased. It is given by grace—by the love and the mercy of God—to him who enters at the first hour, and him who passes in at the eleventh. He who early enters there, will praise Him who has saved him from sin, and raised him up to sit in high places—and he who is last will shout "Hosanna!" for the same great cause. But, in speaking thus, I am conveying the idea that heaven is a locality, when, it will be recollected, I said that we deemed it more a state. Laying aside the figure, then, I ask, when the individual finds sin no more besetting him, corrupt affections no more urging to do wrong—when he finds his soul purified, exalted, happy—will he allow no obligation to his Maker? no love for that Being who, in all his rebellion, his murmuring, his guilt, has been gently drawing him along, blessing and doing good to him? I say, can he look back upon that which he was, and say that he occupies his present position, the bliss and the glory which he now enjoys, as a right? Did the poor prodigal, think you, who asked as a favor of his parent, the station of a hired servant, feel that it was but a right which he enjoyed, when his father's arms were clasped around him, and his father's tears bedewed his cheek? We repeat, then, that this argument arises from a mistaken conception of our doctrine. It assumes that we teach, that the individual may be free from punishment, and yet polluted with sin; that he may pass with those sins into heaven, which is "a foreign good"—something which is external and material, instead of internal and spiritual. Now we have affirmed, and to impress this portion of the discourse upon our hearers, again affirm, that punishment ever accompanies sin—that sin the cause, must be destroyed, ere punishment, the effect, ceases. Therefore, when sin is destroyed, and punishment ceases—when the soul is purified and made holy—the kingdom of heaven is formed within the individual. Now what cause has he for boasting?—what right can he claim, any more than they who, in this life, have repented, and turned, and received salvation? They exclaim, "Redeeming love and free grace have done it, by whatever means they may have operated"—and "Free Grace and Redemption," will be the thrilling strains of his song, through all the ages of eternity! This, then, is no solid objection against the system of Universalism.

It will thus be seen, my hearers, that the great difference which exists between us and our brethren, is this—they teach that sin and punishment are endless; we, that they are limited. Endless sin! endless punishment! Did you ever look on through the long, dim futurity, and weigh, the idea? If you have, and thought that there would be a time when sin should be destroyed, and the sinning wanderer cleansed and restored, remember, I say, that you was thinking Uniververalism.

We can not think that evil is ultimate in the designs of God, or that his designs will not be accomplished. We cherish hope in the darkest hour, and for the most degraded of our race. We know that there are hard and obstinate hearts, benighted intellects, stern and savage natures; but we believe that these can be softened, enlightened, and changed. In the meanest of humanity, who grovels in the dust—in him who bows in blindness at the reeking altar of superstition—in him who wallows, besotted, in sensuality and all vice—we know that there is a germ, capable, when the still, gentle rain and the blessed dews shall fall upon it, of expanding, budding, and blossoming in light. We know that souls like these have arisen—that depraved natures have been purified—that the big tear of penitence has flowed from the eye that never qualied before the brow of battle, nor shrunk at the horror of carnage. Oh! then, shall we despair because much gloom is upon humanity? Shall our hope faint within us, when passion, and violence, and sin are scathing and desolating the earth? We know that there are energies in existence, capable of triumphing over all these, and we believe these energies will yet conquer. We derive much strength upon contemplating the history of our race. It has many annals which are calculated to make the philanthropist shudder and grow heart-sick. Yet these things powerfully support our hope, and in viewing man as he is, and then looking back to what he was, we gather cheer from the very darkness of the contrast. In the great fact of his advancement from a state so rude, and ignorant, and barbarous, we learn the vast capacities of his nature. From the depths of the cloud, a light breaks forth, far more glorious than the gloom which surrounds it—from the wildness and desolation of the moral chaos, evolves a world of wonder, of beauty, and of joy. As an illustration, we point to Northern and Western Europe, in the days of the first promulgation of the Gospel—to lands where smoked the Druid altar, and bled the sacrifice to the fierce deities of the North—to lands where the tribes that conquered Rome, the sons of the stern Teutonic race, were fostered and nourished upon the dark thought of war. Lo! now, the Gospel has beamed there with its light—knowledge has gone forth among them, and how changed is the scene! Says a late eminent writer, (Macintosh,) "Let those who consider any tribes of men as irreclaimable barbarians, call to mind that the Danes and Saxons, of whose cruelties a small specimen has been given, were the progenitors of those who, in Scandinavia, in Normandy, in Britain, and in America, are now among the most industrious, intelligent, orderly, and humane of the dwellers upon earth."

Upon facts like these, my hearers, rests the philosophy of our hope. If such may be the case with races and tribes of men, we ask, why not with individuals? Had those very individuals just mentioned, lived until now, and had the energies which have been put forth to the refinement and advancement of their descendants, operated upon them, who will say that they would not have been what their offspring are? We believe that these, yea, mightier energies will exist and act, wherever a human soul may be, until the capacities of its nature are brought out, and it "goes forth into a universe of light"—until the slumberers in the regions of moral death come forth from its darkness to the resurrection of an eternal life! To our Christian brethren of all denominations, then, we would say, allow us the Christian name, the Christian character, until by our fruits you are authorized to say that we are unworthy of them. And we say, moreover, learn our principles, and war with them; but judge not our principles by the practices of many who say they believe them. We know, and, oh! deeply do we lament the truth, that there are many who go astray, who sin much, and whose lives do shame and injury to the pure faith which they profess to cherish in their hearts. But if the acts of these are criteria from which to judge, we ask, what denommation will abide the scrutiny? If principles are to be condemned on account of practice solely, we ask if Christianity itself can stand? One thing we are willing to do, in proportion to our numbers. We are willing to undergo this investigation in comparison with any other sect of Christians. We do not say this in the spirit of arrogance—far be it from us!—but we use it in very self-defence, against those who judge the whole system by the practices of men who call themselves Universalists. No man is a Universalist who does not practice Universalism; and he who does this, we are willing should stand forth as an illustration of our principles. Let those of every denomination remember, that when we have all done our best, we are but unprofitable servants. We are all pilgrims and sojourners here; let us not, when we are so fallible ourselves, harshly judge each other. We only ask that the blessed charity of that Gospel, by the precepts of which we all profess to be guided, may dwell in all our hearts. We claim the right to stand in the courts of our God, and worship him according to the dictates of our consciences. If we worship in error, we beseech our brethren to teach us the truth—to reason with us, mildly, calmly—with the meek spirit of our Master—not treating us with scorn, jeering, nor contempt. Will not our brethren conduct thus towards us?

In conclusion, I would say, that there are many points upon which we differ with those who are styled orthodox, which I have not set forth in this discourse. But they are those which would have taken much time in exposition. They are those, also, which we hold in common with our Unitarian brethren, and which have been often and eloquently exhibited by them. I would that one of greater ability and more experience, had performed my labor at this time; but such as it is, I offer it to your consideration. I trust if any have heard me at this time, who have heretefore cherished wrong ideas upon any or all of the points which I have presented, that what has been said, may be the means of enlightening them, and of removing those misconceptions which they have had of thedoctrine. I hope, at least, that it may incite them to inquiry, and that in our many publications they will find satisfactory and abundant proofs of these things.

A few words more, to the Christian and philanthropist, of whatever name or sect. If you can not believe with us, wethink that you will, at least, acknowledge that our view is the most thrilling and glorious of which the human mind can conceive. Think of it, brother—it comprehends in the embrace of mercy, every human soul!—not darkened and debased, nor polluted with sin—but purified and perfected, holy and happy! Tell me, in your broadest scheme, what noblerend can you propose than universal good? You can not have more. Would you stop short of this? Oh! say, if it may be so, have you one objection? Will you not fervently rejoice and shout the triumph, also? Look at it! look at it! From a small fountain, a boundless sea! From strains which quivered over angel harps, anthems of praises—rising higher and higher—pealing from rank after rank of the white-robed host of the whole family of man!—armies of those who have been down in the shadow and the gloom, coming up and shouting upon the "hills of heaven!" light, breaking from one point, and flowing wider, and wider, and yet wider, until the vast universe is flooded with glory; and from those whose islands and altars are now in twilight or in darkness, goes up the morning song of joy and redemption, like the mingled voices of many waters! AMEN! and AMEN!

For the Magazine and Advocate

IT IS LAMENTABLE.

BY REV. S. MILES.

It is lamentable to behold the ancient cities and magnificent temples lie mouldering in ruins. But it is still more so, to behold our kindred nature, rushing upon our fellow-men, like an overwhelming torrent from the mountain top, sweeping before them every vestige of civilization and art, butchering all within their power, without discrimination of age or sex, and deluging the fields of battle with rivers of blood, desolation, rapine, and death.

How wonderful! how strange is it to us, when we cast our eyes over the natural, moral, and intellectual world, during the dark ages, and trace the events of the past up to the present time.—What do we behold but one unbroken chain of vice, passing down from father to son, from mother to daughter, and from daughter to the most distant connections. What treachery, avarice, perfidy, injustice, and revenge, do we see, even among those who profess to be the most pious, and claim to be the most wise and virtuous. Look back but a few years, and what do we see, but nation rising against nation, and empires dashing one against the other, like the raging waves of the sea. Yes, we behold them led on by their proud, ambitious, unrelenting, and cruel leaders, who were under the deadly influence of superstition and bigotry, connected with the doctrine of endless wo in a future world, which prepared them to fan the fears, the awful fears of deep damnation, in the fiery billows of an endless hell, which was constantly and carefully kept before their eyes. Yes, reader, it was under the influence, under the full belief of an endless hell, that the opposing nations and armies contended and struggled in the field of blood. It is true, they profess to love the souls of men, and pray for their salvation; when, at the same time, they have plunged them headlong into the dark abyss, into the presence of an angry God, whose wrath was supposed to be ten thousand times more awful and dreadful than their own.—In this manner have these infatuated mortals carried on a series of sanguinary contests for centuries past; and even now, the believers in endless wo are at war among themselves; one sect is struggling against the other, being hurried on by the spirit of their different sentiments.

It is among the conflicting powers and parties of the day, that we see every thing that is base and unmerciful in moral conduct, every thing that is subversive of the principle of benevolence, every thing that is destructive of charity and human happiness, that rouses the passions into diabolical fury, that adds to the sum of human wretchedness and wo, that is oppressive, cruel and unjust, and every thing that is dreadful and appalling to the benevolent mind, which has been enlightened and warmed by the benign influence of the Gospel.

O! that I had the pen of some ready writer, and the tongues of angels; then would I vent my sighs, my pathetic tones, in the ears of my fellowmen, of my fellow-sufferers. I would run—I would fly to earth's remotest bounds, until I had driven the spirit of darkness from every corner of the world, and wiped the briny tear from every weeping eye. Had I the power, I would gather together in one, all the ends of the world, all the kindreds of the nations, and spread over them the balmy wings of love. I would reconcile the unreconciled, and bring the wandering spirits of men to bow at the feet of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I would make them sit in heavenly places in Christ; I would lead them by the side of still waters in Immanuel's land, until all were brought to unite in one body, one spirit, and one mind. Had I the power, I would fully follow the spirit, the examples of my bleeding Lord. I would live as he lived, and weep as he wept, when going up to Jerusalem for the last time. I would pray as he prayed, for his bitterest enemies, even though they gave me their wormwood and their gall. I would dip my tongue and my pen in the ocean of unbounded love, and write the law of life upon every heart. I would utter the soft accents of heaven, and breathe the spirit of a broken and contrite heart among men, until all were brought to our Father's house, to taste and see that the Lord is good—until all were brought to walk the golden streets of Zion, and bask in the pure light of heaven, "the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Then the intelligences that people our globe would be transformed from darkness to light, from the power of satan unto God. Then the moral desert would be changed into a fruitful field, and "blossom as the rose." Then the instruments of human destruction would cease to exist, and ambition would no longer wade through slaughter to a throne, nor trample upon the rights of an injured people.—Brothers and sisters would be contented in the closest bonds of holy affection; the law of kindness would swell their hearts and dwell upon their tongues; serenity and joy would light every countenance; a mutual exchange of sentiments and generous affections would circulate from heart to heart, and from house to house, and all the members of the great family of man would dwell together in unity and peace.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A FAULT AMONG UNIVERSALISTS.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

There is one fault among Universalists that deserves the severest censure. It is the practice of leaving the cause to suffer merely because some one who professes it, is imprudent in his conduct. For instance, an individual will become a member of a society. He will regularly attend the meetings, either for business or public worship.—He will contribute of his substance toward defraying the necessasy expences, to which every society must be subject. Every thing appears to be in a prosperous state. The heart of the pastor is gladdened. He feels as though he had friends that will stand by him in every difficulty. He labors diligently by night and by day. He walks propagating these, also, am I a prisoner. But of abroad, and is met with smiles. An approval of his course is expressed unreservedly. Thus all seems to be at peace. No root of bitterness has sprung up. In prospect, he sees a growing and flourishing society. Surely, he says, we sit together in heavenly places. When lo! some member in the society, or the minister, does something which is deemed imprudent. Difficulty ensues. Disaffected members are to be labored with. Now comes the fault which I design to present. It is the practice of leaving the society, and the minister, and perhaps the cause altogether. Is this right? Can a man who does this be a sincere lover of the truth? I think not.

Those who take this step, will assign various reasons; for a man will be ashamed to be found doing that for which no cause can be assigned.—Some time it is alleged that many in the society are backward, and therefore it is extremely burdensome to be connected with such men. The minister is dull, (and what minister could help being dull under such circumstances?) or he does not exchange enough, or his sermons are too doctrinal, or too moral, or in private life he is too unsocial, etc. etc.—for there is no end to excuses when people neglect their duty. And if such persons could only once see their excuses in a proper light, they would feel degraded in the sight of God and man.

Now look at the inconsistency of such a course. Admit, for argument's sake, that there is something wrong in a society to which an individual has attached himself, (and what society is there in existence that does not sometimes violate moral precepts?) or that the preacher has committed a wrong act, and will that justify any one in leaving a cause to suffer? As well might the disciples have said, when Judas betrayed his Master, that that was a reason for leaving the sacred cause of truth. As well might our fathers who fought the battles of the revolution, have left the cause of liberty because there were tories in those days.—And if it be right for one to leave a cause in this way, it is right for all. Nothing can be more fatal to the interests of our denomination than such a course of conduct. If others do wrong, it is no excuse for the rest to do wrong. If things do not go on to suit the individual, let him stay by all means and regulate matters; for, by the way, these dissatisfied members of a society always seem to know precisely, what ought to be done. They can point out the only proper course to be pursued. They know what will tend to carry forward the denomination to the highest point of glory. What a pity that so much knowledge should lie in such a useless shape! Poor men, they live on, and suffer wisdom to die with them.

I trust the reader will examine his heart. If he has ever been with us and become disaffected on account of some imperfection he has discovered, and then left us, it is the prayer of the writer that he may feel as David did when Nathan said to him, "thou art the man!"

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1838.

2 TIMOTHY I: 1-12.

The division of the Scriptures into chapters and verses, while it very much facilitates reference, has been a great obstacle in the way of the unlearned in their endeavors to understand these important writings. If these books had been printed with the divisions into paragraphs like other books, many popular errors would have been prevented, and a much better understanding of them have been secured. We would recommend, therefore, to every one who is in earnest to be familiar with the true intent and meaning of these valuable records, to procure a copy of the Bible, or New Testament at least, printed, not in the usual way, but in divisions into paragraphs. The Common Version will be found so printed; (we believe from a Boston press;) and so will a New Testament only altered from the Common Version a little to correspond with Griesbach's improved text in Greek. While we would prefer either of these, to a Testament divided only into chapters and verses, we would give an infinite preference over either, to Wakefield's Translation of the New Testament.—Those who possess a copy of this work may have noticed, that in our divisions into paragraphs we have not followed Wakefield implicitly; yet, in the main, his mode of distribution is judicious, and greatly auxiliary to a better understanding of the sacred text. His improvements in the translation are also conducive to the same desirable end.—The first named PARAGRAPH TESTAMENTS have been printed in a cheap form for common use; why should not this? Are not the children of darkness wiser in their proceedings than are the children of light? The demand can not precede the supply; but we would confidently anticipate a demand were a supply provided. This, however, is scarcely the proper place for an expostulation on this subject—but, as we think the adoption of the hint and precedent would contribute much to the advancement of biblical knowledge and rational Christianity, we may revert to the theme upon some more appropriate occasion.

In the paragraph now before us, we perceive that Paul had some anxious fears about the steadfastness of his son Timothy, in the cause of Jesus; and the object which the apostle appears to have had in view, is to guard Timothy from the influence of shame or fear, or any other cause which might deter him from a faithful adherence to the cause of Christ. The train of thought pursued by Paul, seems to have been as follows:—"I regard myself, Timothy, as a servant of Jesus Christ, called by him for the purpose of propagating throughout the world, that promise of a future and better life which he came to reveal; and you have I adopted as a son, and devoted you to the same service. I am grateful to God for such a son and helper, and this gratitude I express morning and evening in my devotions. And I have much confidence in thy faithfulness in the cause, when I call to remembrance thy affectionate and warm reception of its doctrines, as well as the sincere belief which was given to them by thy grandmother and mother. On account of this, my confidence, and these my grounds of confidence, I make bold to remind you of your duty not to allow the powers and miraculous gifts of God, (which were given you when I ordained you by the imposition of my hands,) to lie dormant within you; but to seize every opportunity which your situation at Ephesus furnishes to you, to forward and defend against false teachers, the good tidings which you have received. Shrink not, my son, from the appearance of danger, for this is not what God expects from us who have enlisted in the cause: that cause will not be promoted by timidity or inactivity, but by courage—by bold and energetic measures, prompted by the spirit of universal benevolence, and regulated by sound judgment and discretion. God has provided us with these necessary qualifications for forwarding his cause, if we will only call them into exercise; and he expects that we shall devote these and every other capacity which He has bestowed upon us, in forwarding his cause. Wherefore, my son and fellow helper, be not ashamed of testifying to the things which concern our Lord Jesus, nor of me, who am at present a prisoner on his account; but be ready to suffer jointly with me for the sake of those good tidings which we proclaim to all people, in proportion to the powers bestowed on thee by God, who hath resolved to save us all, and hath accordingly called us all, not on account of our good works, as the Judaizing teachers affirm, but according to His own gracious purpose (Hebrew, purpose and grace) before the commencement of the Mosaic dispensation, which gracious purpose is now made manifest by the appearance of Jesus, the Christ, who hath made death ineffectual, and an immortal life (Hebrew, life and immortality) clear through the Gospel. For proclaiming these good tidings I am appointed a herald, apostle, and teacher unto the Gentiles; for this I am not ashamed; for I know the divine authority of him in whom I have believed, and I am confident, also, that he is able to preserve that doctrine, with which I am entrusted, against enemies and false friends alike, until its final triumph on that day when he shall deliver up the kingdom unto his Father."

Brethren, we believe that we have received the truth as it is in Jesus. What then does God expect from us—cowardice and inactivity? or energy, benevolence, discretion? Have we not the same support which Paul had, verse 12th? Let us, then, clergy and laity, stir up all the powers within us, and come to the help of our Father against the enemies of his children. If our cause is good, and will finally prevail, why not aid in its promotion! WHY? P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

VINDICATION.

GENTLEMEN—Believing, as I do, that Partialism is the same in all places, permit me through your valuable paper to state a few facts connected with the death and funeral of Mr. Jonathan Willard. Mr. Willard and myself, in our childhood and youth, were compelled to bow in humble submission and even adoration, to the doctrine of partial salvation; but when I came to years of accountability, reason taught me that it was false in all its parts. I then was led to inquire what was the truth; but no one could tell. I turned with disgust from such teachers, saying, can it not be found in the Bible? Oh, yes, say they, but the carnal mind can not understand it. Why then was it given to man as a revelation from God? Are we not all carnal, sold under sin? To be sure we are. Under these circumstances, I determined for the first time, to read for myself, and forthwith set myself to the task; and I have never yet regretted it. I was soon convinced that the restitution of all things, which God had spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began, was the truth of Jehovah. My old friend and neighbor, Mr. Willard, placed almost unbounded confidence in me, often bringing to me, what he termed hard passages of Scripture, for explanation, which I never failed to explain to his satisfaction, and he at length declared to me his conviction of the truth of universal salvation. He had arrived at the age of more than three score years, and expressed his belief that he should not live long, and that his death would be sudden. Under these circumstances, he requested me to procure a preacher of the restitution order, to attend his funeral, as there was no other one in whom he could confide. I pledged myself so to do; a pledge which the love of friends, or the fear of foes, shall never cause me to violate. Some months after, he was taken violently ill, and sent immediately for me, as he always did in cases of trouble. I repaired immediately to his bed-side, and found him already speechless, but not destitute of his reason. I continued with him the remaining time that he lived, which was about sixteen hours.

Previous to his death, several of the neighbors came in and rendered such assistance as was necessary; and after we had performed the service of laying him out, I observed to the family, and those present, that it was necessary to make some arrangements for the funeral, and made known his request respecting a preacher, which they very readily consented to. Accordingly, I despatched a messenger for Mr. Babcock early the next morning. Previous to this, the Limitarians of the neighborhood, having heard of his death, came in, apparently more with a desire to dictate than to advise, and on learning the arrangements, said with one accord that it must not be so, and endeavored to coerce the family, by saying that if a Universalist should preach, "there would be a fuss," and many other things no more to their credit. Some advised the eldest boy, 19 years of age, to turn the preacher out of doors if he should come. The young man came and informed me what was going on. I immediately repaired to the spot, and addressed myself to the family, requesting to know if they were dissatisfied. They replied they were not, but the neighbors were.—Verily, said I, here are members of three different churches, who can not eat and drink together at the Lord's table, but like Scribes and Pharisees can unite for the purpose of putting down the preachers of the Gospel of Jesus Christ; but unfortunate as it is for you, Mr. Babcock must preach on this occasion, and left them to settle the business among themselves; which, by the bye, turned out to be no easy task. However, inasmuch as they were foiled in their attempt to introduce a preacher who would deal out damnation to that afflicted family, and abuse and slander them and the deceased, a story was got up and put in circulation that I had hired the widow for a paltry sum to consent to have a preacher contrary to her wishes. Knowing that she was in a very feeble state of health, they supposed she would be unable to track them out, and detect them in their falsehood. In this, however, they are deceived; for, if I was not implicated, I would be found by the side of suffering humanity, and would follow the authors and abettors of this foul calumny from Dan to Bersheba, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth, but what I would detect them in their vile slander; for I can prove it false as the Alcoran.

The object of giving publicity to this, is to vindicate my own character and conduct, and that of the widow, and to rebuke those who manufactured and gave currency to this foul slander; not thinking however that your humble sheet will be able to overtake the report, unless it should speed itself across the mighty deep, for it has gone with the spirit of fanaticism upon the wings of the wind. MOSES L. SMITH.

Pike, September 4, 1838.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1838.

CANDOR.

So necessary is the possession of this quality, that even the most debased are aware that they can not secure the respect of their own associates, without at least, assuming its garb and aspect. And wherever we find, in enlightened society, a man who is beloved by all parties, I think we shall invariably find, that among all his other virtues, candor holds a conspicuous station in his character. Indeed, the manifestation of this human attribute in any person's conduct, is calculated to win the confidence of all. Its possession implies that boldness, in the declaration of a man's opinions, which is known to accompany a deep conviction of the justice of the cause he advocates; a faithful integrity and impartiality, in the investigation of all subjects demanding his attention, and an unshaken determination to deal justly with all men. Equivocation and deceit, is a stranger to his bosom. Intolerance towards those who differ from him, is never suffered to disturb his equanimity of temper, or deprave his sense of justice: Even the plain and palpable errors of his brother man, are looked upon, if there is any extenuating circumstance in their favor, more in charity than in indignation.

Such are the advantages to be derived from the cultivation of a candid disposition in the heart. What then must be its beauties and influences, when embraced, cultivated and practiced under the influence of religious motives? It strengthens and invigorates the mind, and prepares it for usefulness in every station. It gives man a degree of holy influence, which can not be enjoyed without it. It opens wide the door of benevolence, and surrounds him with innumerable opportunities of doing good. Are we in distress, we seek for the advice and assistance of the candid; for we know that our confidence will never be betrayed. Do we wish for instruction, the precepts of candor will be gratefully received, and heartily cherished. And then, too, the influence of this principle upon our own happiness, is beyond calculation.

The calmness and serenity which it imparts to the mind, the disciplinary power which it exerts over the passions, by exalting us above the excitement of petty litigation and querulousness, smooths the uneven path of life, and adds new lustre to a virtuous reputation.—Without this qualification, man becomes a peevish fault-finder, looking only on the darkest side of human existence, and judging others by the gloomy and distorted imaginings of a misanthrope. The genius of truth, though brightly and beautifully illuminated by the rays of heaven, he will not be guided by, because, to obtain her smiles, they must be diligently sought for, and constantly cherished. Failing to secure the respect of the wise, he soon ceases to respect himself; and fraud, deceit, and intolerance are the consequences. You can not confide in him, for he has no confidence in himself, and hence, can not have for others. Those who are above him, he hates, and would gladly hurl them from their eminence if he could reach them. Those who are beneath him are the objects of his supercilliousness.—Nor can you respect him for his conduct, for he respects not himself. God has given him noble faculties. He has so constituted him, that his real interest is identified with the interest of the whole community. He regards it not, however, but tramples upon that wise arrangement with perfect indifference.

Let all, then, who wish to merit respect, and who have any desire to render themselves useful in the world, cultivate the highest possible degree of Christian candor.—Let them harbor no sentiment which they could wish to conceal. Let them be actuated by no motives but such as they may fearlessly and unreservedly avow. Let them form no schemes, but those which they are willing should be viewed by the eye of impartiality. Let them cherish no feelings but such as are consistent with benevolence and justice, and, my word for it, they will never regret the mental and moral discipline, which the formation of such a character requires. A. R. B.

"FOR THE SAKE OF JESUS."

Do our ministering brethren know that this phrase is growing into use as a concluding petition in their prayers? And if they know the fact, do they realize the erroneous doctrine inculcated in it? By or through Jesus we receive the knowledge of the truth—through his name—i. e. his doctrine—we receive all spiritual blessings and influences—through him we hope for eternal life hereafter; for he is the medium, the mediator between God and us. But to ask for his sake, implies that God is not good of his own nature—not kind for our sakes—but that he is rendered good and induced to become kind to us, by something which Jesus Christ did to change his eternal purpose, and that that kindness is manifested towards us by the imputation of that act of Christ's to us. This is an error which, if we understand what our brethren believe, is not held by those who use this phrase—which is believed by them as well as the writer, to have no foundation in truth—no warrant in Scripture. And worshipping God by and in accordance with the best powers of my intellect, as well as of my moral powers and affections, I can not, conscientiously, unite with my brethren in breathing, inward communion, with that portion of their prayers—no more than I can with the closing petition of the prayers of our Trinitarian brethren, in which they acknowledge a trinity in unity.

A. B. G.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS....NO. XII.

"Touching the Almighty, we can not find him out; he is excellent in power, and in judgment, and in plenty of justice; he will not afflict; men do therefore fear him."—Job xxxvii: 23, 24.

1. God is excellent in power. What views have we imbibed concerning excellence of power? Let us pursue this question and we shall arrive at some important conclusions. Nero ascended the throne of the Roman empire in the year 51. He had full power—and he exercised it by setting fire to Rome, that he might have some idea of a burning Troy. In order to be free from the obloquy of his crime, he charged it to the Christians.—He then commenced persecuting them. Some were torn by wild beasts, and others were wrapped in pitched sheets, and fired in the evening. Was he excellent in power? Surely not—and for the very plain reason, that if he had exerted his power properly, he could have avoided all this evil. Alfred the Great ascended the throne of England in 872. He was wise, and entered upon every expedient which he thought would enhance the welfare and happiness of his people. All admit that he was excellent in power. Now here are two individuals, one of whom was not excellent in power, and the other of whom was. What constitutes this difference? Why, Nero consulted misery as an end, and Alfred consulted happiness as an end.

God has all power. Let us cast our minds back to the period when no human being lived. In looking forward into the future, by the power of his foreknowledge, God sees that there will be multitudes, who, if created, will be finally fixed in an endless round of pain—he views all the motives which will influence them, and can trace the windings of those influences, as, like the fascination of the snake upon the snared bird, they gradually draw their victims into irrevocable destruction. The Deity could leave them out of existence, or by one hair of his power, he could alter the tissue of motives which will surround them. Still, knowing that their end will be destruction, he exerts his power and creates them. Now, I solemnly put the question, could such a creation render God excellent in power? To me it appears not, because such a creation vastly preponderates in favor of evil. Even admitting such an act of power to be excellent, could we say with the other part of the text, that God did not afflict?

2. Let us take another view. When our Saviour constantly labored for the happiness of all men, and by his influence subdued a furious Saul of Tarsus and drew home a wandering prodigal, we say that he was excellent in power. By consequence, just in the exact ratio that he approximated to the subjection of all prodigals, we must admit that his power increased in excellence.

Let us go back before creation. God looks forward and discovers, that in consequence of the moral agency of the creature, an agency necessary to his earthly existence, he sins, oftentimes abominably. The Deity then discovers that the degree of moral light which he has given to all nations, and particularly the Gospel, will serve to check sin. In order to more effectually secure this end, he institutes a punishment—he traces its effect upon all transgressors through the devious paths of their days—he perceives that punishment struggling to overcome their opposition, and finally, they turn from vice, and all are brought into divine truth. With this view, he exerts his power and creates man, and sends him forth, a magnificent worm, to creep darkly or luminously through life, and finally to burst the shell of his mortality and expand into the vivid glories of immortality. Could we not then affirm that God is excellent in power? We could, because such an act of power would result in the happiness of every individual.

This view makes the text harmonious—for while it teaches that God is excellent in power, it also convinces us that he will not afflict. God is excellent in judgment, because he scrutinizes every act in love; excellent in justice, because he adjudges punishment according to the criminality of the offender; and excellent in power, because he is "a just God and a Saviour." Isa. xlv: 21. He is just to punish, and just to save from sin—hence, he will not afflict unnecessarily. How beautifully this harmonizes with the declaration of the prophet—"The Lord will not cast off forever: but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies—for he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men." Lam. iii: 31, 32, 33. We discover, then, that God is excellent in power, when all his plans result in "the restitution of all things." I know it may be said, that some men will be obstinate and will not submit to the reign and government of the Deity.—To this, I can only give the assurance of the Psalmist, when he said, "thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power." Ps. cx: 3.

Because God is excellent in power, judgment and justice, and will not afflict, therefore men fear him.—This is not the fear of a slave, however, nor that fear which hath torment; but it is that "fear of the Lord which is the beginning of wisdom." It is the goodness of God which leads us to repentance, for we love him because he first loved us; and when we have taken a view of his character in its excellent manifestations, of power, justice, wisdom and love, then we fear to offend his goodness by breaking his laws and rushing into vice. Such fear is the beginning of wisdom. And when the creature adheres to it, come weal or come wo, come prosperity or come adversity, come riches or come poverty, come life or come death, he or she can joyfully exclaim, "Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls; yet will I rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation." Hab. iii: 17, 18. G. W. M.

THOMAS PAINE'S OBJECTION TO THE INSCRIPTION WHICH WAS WRITTEN ON THE CROSS OF CHRIST.

"Not any two of these writers agree in reciting, exactly in the same words, the written inscription, short as it is, which they tell us was put over Christ when he was crucified."

The position contained in these words, Mr. Paine deemed as one proof, that the Bible is a fable and of no worth. But I shall endeavor to show that the objection is unfounded, and was advanced without due consideration.

It will be remembered, that when Christ was crucified, "Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross." John xix: 19. This title or inscription, the different Evangelists state as follows:—

"This is Jesus the King of the Jews." Matt. xxvii: 37.

"The King of the Jews." Mark xv: 26.

"This is the King of the Jews." Luke xxiii: 38.

"Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews." John xix: 19.

We admit at the start, that in the common Version, there is a verbal difference in the inscription as stated by the different Evangelists. But, we ask, (however great this verbal difference,) do not the four inscriptions express the literal fact, that the Jews charged Christ with claiming to be "King of the Jews?" No person can have a doubt touching this point. If, then, four sets of words express the same identical fact, feeble indeed must be the views of that mind, which will reject the fact, simply because the words differ.

But even, if in addition to verbal difference, there was real discrepancy in the subject related, it would not then falsify the main account. For, though some things relating to a fact may be wrongly stated, that circumstance does not prove that the general relation is not true.—This position is sustained by an instance from which all cavilling is excluded.

WEEMS.

"The American Generals on the night of June 16, despatched fifteen hundred men to throw up an entrenchment on Bunker's Hill." Life of Washington, p. 74.

GOODRICH.

"The evening preceding June 17, a detachment of one thousand Americans were ordered to make an entrenchment on Bunker's Hill." History United States, p. 132.

WEEMS.

"The British moved to the attack with rattling drums, and incessant discharges of muskets and great guns."

PAULDING.

"The gallant British soldiers came steadily on, silent as the grave, so many of them were soon to occupy, and were waited for by a foe equally silent." Life of Washington, Vol. 1, p. 150.

In this instance, there is not only a verbal, but there is a real difference in the things stated—for one says that fifteen hundred, and the other, that one thousand men, were sent to throw up the intrenchment—one says that the British moved to the attack with rattling drums and incessant discharges of muskets and great guns, and the other, that they moved on as silent as the grave. But, notwithstanding these discrepancies, who ever dreamed of denying that such an intrenchment was thrown up, and such a battle as that of Bunker Hill was fought?—Yet, according to Mr. Paine, we ought, not only to reject the account, but not even consider it "a reasonable lie"! Now, even admitting that all the marks of discrepancy discovered in this case, were attached to the inscription on the cross, they would not destroy the fact that Christ was crucified and that an inscription was written over his head, any more than the above mis statements prove that the battle of Bunker Hill was not fought. The case of the inscription, however, stands on better grounds than the statements of Weems, Goodrich and Paulding, for they differ not only in words, but in the things related. The Evangelists state one and the same fact, viz., that Christ was charged with being "the King of the Jews"; they only use more or less words in expressing that fact.

It is well known that Thomas Paine was confined during a part of the French Revolution, and also that he was the author of the Age of Reason. Let us suppose that he was guillotined, and that on the guillotine was written an inscription in French, German and English, to set forth the reason why he was murdered, and that, in the space of fifty years, four writers should refer to his death and the inscription; and one should represent the inscription thus, "this is Paine the author of the Age of Reason;" another, "the author of the Age of Reason;" the third, "this is the author of the Age of Reason;" and the fourth, "Paine, of America, the author of the Age of Reason." Would any person dream of denying his being guillotined, and of an inscription being written over his head, simply because of the verbal difference between the four writers, when it is evident they express precisely the same thing? Certainly not! There is then the exact parallel difference between the four Evangelists, that there is thus expressed in the instance just given.

The solution of the subject seems to be this—the Evangelists aimed to give us facts; but did not aim to give the facts in exactly the same words. They knew that an inscription was written on the cross—they knew that it charged Jesus with setting himself up as "the King of the Jews"—but as they wrote their Gospels at different periods, they did not endeavor to give the precise words of the inscription, but rather the true sense of it. From all these considerations, we deem it weakness to suffer Mr. Paine's objection to weigh a feather against our receiving the Word of life as the revelation of God.

G. W. M.

P. S. To Br. T. J. Sawyer:

From a note in the Cottage Bible and Family Expositor, I find that Dr. Townson places the subject beyond the remotest cavil, if his view is correct. He supposes, that, as the inscription "was written in Hebrew, Greek and Latin, it might have slightly varied in each language—and that, as St. Luke and St. John wrote for the Gentiles, they would prefer the Greek inscription; that St. Matthew, addressing the Jews, would use the Hebrew; and that St. Mark, writing to the Romans, would naturally give the Latin." In our translation, Mark has it, "the King of the Jews." Would this agree with Mark's using the Latin inscription, if Dr. Clarke presents that Latin inscription correctly; "IESUS NAZARENUS REX IUDÆORUM?" As I have no access to Dr. Townson's Discourse on the Evangelical History, I address this postscript to you, for information as to whether his views are admissible or not. Yours in Christ,

GEO. W. MONTGOMERY.

RETURN HOME.

The chilling rains and gloom of the past week, appear to have closed a beautiful and pleasant season.—I have just returned home from what I hope to be my last journeyings for the year, and address myself to the labors before me—neither few nor small. Br. Chapin, after a brief visit to this region, for fellowship and ordination, has taken him a wife and returned to Richmond, Va. Br. Hutchinson's health seems re-established. Br. Skinner is preparing to leave us, for a Southern climate, in the course of a few weeks more, where, we fervently pray, he may be preserved in safety and increasing health. The long evenings are at hand, and our correspondents having also returned home, and made proper arrangements, will we hope, soon employ some of them in furnishing us with a good supply of good articles—especially short ones—that we may make the latter end of the present volume better than its beginning; and the commencement of the next volume, more glorious and useful than that of any which has preceded it.

A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are much in want of good, brief articles, written in a tolerably legible hand. We have a considerable quantitity of long articles—and a frightful pile of almost unreadable ones. It is possible—very possible that there are yet a few of the kind we want among the mass, and we shall endeavor to sift them out, from time to time, as we find courage and leisure for the task; but for fear we should run out, clear altogether, do take pity on us and send us some short articles, written as plainly as you generally write. Our friends at the East, who have luxuriated at the Convention, would, methinks, like to unburden their minds of some of the good things with which they were crammed overflowingly full. Our brethren at the West might also find some subject of felicitation or complaint—of admonition or inquiry—of "decline of Universalism," or "no decline"—something or any thing to write about. (We bar "death," we have three or four articles on that already!) Come brethren, sharpen your knives, point and nib your pens, fill your inkstands, spread your paper, and write short articles for our paper.

But, bless me, I have forgotten that our female correspondents are as sadly in arrears as our brethren!—Singular! is it not? that the sweetness and beauty of their articles will rest so long on the mind—long, long after they are printed and read—that one forgets how long—how very long it is since they have written for the paper. Our sisters, too, then—we hope they will favor us, and soon. Really, until we found out that they had not favored us for so long a time, we did not know fully, how very necessary their correspondence is to the variety and excellence of our paper.

But, compliments and badinage aside, I do wish—I entreat the ladies not to forget us. If we are serious in any thing, it is in desiring them to take an active interest, not only in reading our paper, but in making it worthy of being read.

A. B. G.

UNIVERSALIST CONFERENCES.

The General Conference of Western New-York met in Gainesville, August 15th. Br. N. Sawyer, Moderator, and Br. N Brown, Clerk. The question previously appointed for discussion, was—"Is the observance of the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, obligatory upon us as a Christian denomination?" It was resolved that no discussion, in the proper sense of the term, should at present take place; but that a "mere expression of opinion" should be given for and against. Remarks on the question by Brs. Tomlinson, Sanderson, Brown and Kelsey. Resolved that the subject be deferred, for examination at the next session. Sermons were preached by Brs. Brown, Kelsey, Spaulding, Sawyer, Barnes and Tomlinson—Brs. Manley and Sanderson took parts.—Adjourned to meet in North Chili, Monroe county, on the third Wednesday and following Thursday in February, 1839.

[Br. Brown's remarks omitted for want of room. I think they would be more proper if made in a separate article. A. B. G.]

A Conference of the Black River Association met in Constantia, September 12th. Br. S. Jones, Moderator, and W. H. Waggoner, Clerk. The Standing Committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of conferring ordination on Br. Wm. Martin. Report adopted. Voted thanks to the Congregational society for their house of worship. Adjourned sine die.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Delong, Sias, Jones, Waggoner, C. B. Brown and N. Brown. The ordination services on the 13th, were as follows—

1. Reading Scriptures, Br. Waggoner. 2. Introductory prayer, Br. N. Brown. 3. Sermon, Br. Waggoner. 4. Ordaining prayer, Br. Jones. 5. Delivery of the Scriptures and charge, Br. C. B. Brown. 6. Right hand of fellowship, Br. Delong. 7. Addresses to the candidate, society, etc., Br. Waggoner. 8. Benediction by the same.

A Conference of the Central Association met in Knoxville, Madison county, September 26th and 27th. Br. Potter, Moderator, Br. Grosh, Clerk. The Standing Committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of granting a letter of fellowship, and conferring ordination on Br. E. H. Chapin. Report adopted. Adjourned sine die.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Biddlecom, Chapin, Smith, Potter and Grosh. We regretted very much that Br. Woolley was called away to attend a funeral on the second day.

The ordination services on Thursday were as follows—1. Reading Scriptures, Br. Biddlecom. 2. Hymn. 3. Prayer, Br. Biddlecom. 4. Hymn. 5. Sermon, 2. Tim. iv: 2, Br. Grosh. 6. Hymn. 7. Ordaining prayer, Br. Potter. 8. Delivery of Scriptures and charge, Br. Grosh. 9. Right hand of fellowship, Br. M. B. Smith. 10. Addresses to society, etc., Br. Chapin.—11. Voluntary by the choir. The benediction was given by the candidate.

HANSCOM'S SERMONS,

With a portrait of this deceased brother, and an ably written biographic sketch by Br. J. G. Adams, has been received, and is for sale at this office. Br. W. C. Hanscom was but 23 years old at the time of his departure, yet few had rendered themselves more deservedly beloved, and, judging by his sermons in this volume, as well as by his reputation, he proved himself an able preacher. We commend the work to the Universalist public. A. B. G.

N. Y. WESTERN CONFERENCE.

The Minutes of this body were received and prepared for the press, before I left home to attend the Hudson River Association, but by some unfortunate circumstance it was not inserted as early as I had intended. My brother, the printer, was also absent in New-York, at the same time. I returned last Friday night from my journey, and did not discover the omission till too late to add the remarks sent in Br. Brown's present letter. These remarks shall appear as a communication next week.

A. B. G.

Br. Bazin—Change directions of Expositor for Rev. N. Brown, from Henrietta to Salina, Onondaga county. Send current volume Expositor from commencement, to Rev. F. J. Briggs, Canton, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., credit $3 and charge G. and H.

Br. Whittemore—Even so. N. Kimball should have been Woodman Kimball, Utica. Credit him $2 and charge G. and H.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. C. S. BROWN, at Caroline, in exchange with Br. A. G. Clark, where a funeral discourse will be delivered on the death of the two Mr. Leggs—Br. A. G. CLARK, at South Bainbridge.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. B. BROWN, at Scriba—Br. C. S. BROWN, at Binghampton—Br. J. D. HICKS, at Newville, A. M., and at Ford's Bush, P. M.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in November, by Br. MCADAM, in the evening, in the schoolhouse near Br. F. West's, Stockwell settlement, Harpersfield—Br. DELONG, will supply for Br. C. S. Brown at Upper Lisle—Br. C. S. BROWN, at Lebanon.

Br. C. S. BROWN, will preach on Monday evening, November 5th, in the school-house near Br. Dick's, in Brothertown—Tuesday evening, 6th, at New-Hartford, if the friends think best. [Br. Brown's notice came too late for an insertion in last week's paper. ED.]

Br. C. B. BROWN, will preach on the evenings of October 29th, at Cheever's school house, New-Haven—30th, Scriba Corners—31st, at Oswego village—November 1st, Luddington school-house—and 2d, at Fulton.

The second Conference of the Otsego Association will take place at Burlington Flats, on the 24th and 25th inst. It may be expected that Br. Hayward will be ordained on that occasion. O. WHISTON, Clerk

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper

E W, Scriba—Rev F J B, Canton—P M, Boyalton, for J G and A T—P M, Clarendon, for H H, A W W and D M—Rev S P L, Bethany, (Pa) for W C—Rev C S B, Upper Lisle, for self, D R and L O—Rev S L, Chester, (Vt)—Rev W A, Wolcott, for self, L S and S B—D L, Middletown, (Vt)—W R, Bombay, for W W and W B—Rev C B B, Hastings, for G T—P S, Lyme, (O) for L E S, W H and H L—C B, Orin, for J M, J B and J W B—R G, Scipio, (O) for self, W L, N F, S W and E T W—Rev L C B, Troy, for T C E V—O B, Fitsfield, (O)—L C L, Brandon, (Vt)—W W, Newbury, (O) for S A, J H and A H B—P M, Cooperstown, for T L—J M C, Plainville, for J G—Miss O S, for D S, Peoria, (Ills)—A D B, Phœnix.

POETRY

For the Magazine and Advocate.

FEMALE ATTIRE.

BY REV. S. W. FULLER.

"Even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit; which is in the sight of God of great price."—PETER.

Yes! the worthless may flatter. the silly admire,
When woman is dressed in her gaudy attire,
When the gold on her bosom, and gems in her hair,
Are the only rich treasures she cherishes there.

But the choicest of gems, and the richest of gold,
May glow on a bosom all heartless and cold,
And the frail sons of earth, would, thrones to possess,
A brow sting with anguish, a heart with distress.

But the fairest of women, and wisest of them,
Adorn with a brighter and far nobler gem;
They clothe in a spirit all quiet and meek,
As the glorious apparel that beauty should seek.

And the Eye that looks down from the throne in the skies,
Beholds and approves the superlative prize;
And great in his sight is its price, we are told,
Above the rich brilliant in casket of gold.

To the peace of that bosom and light of that brow,
The hearts of the proudest and wealthiest bow;
For they feel that such beauty comes down from above,
And lends the fair wearer the magic of love.

[From the Edinburg Review.]

ASTONISHING FACTS RELATIVE TO A FORMER ORGANIC WORLD.

"It is marvellous, (says Dr. Buckland) that mankind should have gone on for so many centuries in ignorance of the fact, which is now so fully demonstrated, that no small part of the present surface of the earth is derived from the remains of animals that constituted the population of ancient seas. Many extensive plains and massive mountains, form, as it were, the great charnel-house of preceding generations, in which the petrified exuvæ of extinct races of animals and vegetables are piled into stupendous monuments of the operations of life and death, during almost immeasurable periods of past time. At the sight of a spectacle,' says Cuvier, 'so imposing, so terrible, as that of the wreck of animated forms forming almost the entire soil on which we tread, it is difficult to restrain the imagination from hazarding some conjectures as to the cause by which such great effects have been produced.' The deeper we descend into the strata of the earth, the higher do we ascend into the archæological history of past ages of creation. We find successive stages marked by varying forms of animal and vegetable life, and these generally differ more and more widely from existing species as we go further downwards into the receptacles of the wreck of more ancient creations.

* * * * * * * *

"Besides the more obvious remains of testacea and of larger animals, minute examinations disclose, occasionally, prodigious accumulations of microscopic shells, that surprise us no less by their extreme minuteness. The mode in which they are sometimes crowded together may be estimated from the fact that Soldani collected from less than an ounce and a half of stone, found in the hill of Casciana in Tuscany, 10,454 microscopic chambered shells. * * * * Of several species of shells, four or five hundred weigh but a single grain; of one species he calculated that a thousand individuals would scarcely weigh one grain."

Extraordinary as these phenomena must appear, the recent discoveries of Ehrenberg, made since the publication of Dr. Buckland's work, are still more marvellous and instructive. This eminent naturalist, whose discoveries respecting the existing infusorial animals we have already noticed, has discovered fossil animalcules, or infusorial organic remains; and not only has he discovered their existence by the microscope, but he has found that they form extensive strata of tripoli, or polishing slate, (polishing slate) at Franzenbad, in Bohemia—a substance supposed to have been formed of sediments of fine volcanic ashes to quiet waters. These animals belong to the genus Bacillaria, and inhabit siliceous shells, the accumulation of which form the strata of polished slate. The size of a single individual of these animalcules, is about 1.288th of a line, or the 3430th part of an inch. In the polishing slate from Bilin, in which there seems no extraneous matter, and no vacuities, a cubic line contains, in round numbers, 23,000,000 of these animals, and a cubic inch 41,000,000,000 of them. The weight of a cubic inch of the tripoli which contains them, is 170 grains. Hence there are 187,000,000 of these animalcules in a single grain, and the siliceous coat of one of these animals is the 18,000,000th part of a grain!

MARRIAGES.

In the Universalist church in this city, on Sunday morning, 7th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. ROBERT R. USHER, of East Hamilton, to Miss URSULA M. FELTON, of West Edmeston.

In Potsdam, September 12th, by Rev. F. J. Briggs, Mr. LUTHER PARMETER, to Miss EMILY FREEMAN.

In Canton, August 8th, by Rev. F. J. Briggs, Mr. JOSEPH CROWNER, of Carthage, to Miss BELINDA HODSKINS, of the former place.

In Shoreham, Vt., September 19th, by Mr. W. C. Wright, Esq., Mr. ASA W. BRIGGS, of Pierpont, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., to Miss AMELIA M. WILLSON, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Venice, Cayuga county, on the 21st ult., Miss CYNTHIA L. PORTER, in the 17th year of her age. She endured a lingering consumption without a murmur, and breathed out her life with all the resignation of a Christian. May God in his mercy and goodness, comfort those who are called to mourn. Sermon by Star in the West please copy. G. W. GAGE.

Just as our paper was going to press, a report reached us of the death of our very worthy and promising brother J. P. HARRIS, of New-Portland. We hear that he died at the house of his mother in Portland, some days since, being on a visit to that place. He was taken suddenly away by typus fever, in the midst of youth, and health, and usefulness. We suppose his age to have been less than thirty years. Of a handsome person, cultivated manners, dignified address, good literary acquirements, more than ordinary talents—and above all, a devoted Christian Universalist—by his death, our denomination in this State has lost one of its most decidedly useful and promising advocates. We can hardly realize the sad tidings of his decease. That he should thus be taken away in the midst of such bright expectations is a mystery of divine Providence, who will overrule all things for good. The society in New-Portland and the brethren in the neighboring towns, will mourn the loss of an excellent minister of Christ. As they were fortunate in securing his services, their affliction is now the greater at the loss of them.

Br. Harris was born in Poland, where he joined the orthodox church. After he came to manhood, he resided some time in Turner, where he removed to Waterville. In this place he connected himself with the orthodox Congregational church, of which Rev. T. Adams is pastor, and proved himself one of the most worthy members of that communion. Some two years ago his understanding was enlarged to receive the doctrine of universal grace, after which he became a member of Br. Gardner's society, and about a year since commenced preaching. We all regarded him as an acquisition on account of his character and talents. But he is gone—gone home to glory. Farewell! dear brother. A time of reunion shall come in a purer world.

Since the foregoing was written, we have received the following from Br. D. T. Stevens of Lewiston.

Br. DREW—I set down to communicate dreary tidings to you. Br. JOSEPH P. HARRIS is no more. The news of his departure reached me this morning; he died in Poland, the time I have not learned—but his funeral is to be attended Sunday next. I can tell you no more particulars, except that he died with a fever. Yes, our devoted, talented, zealous brother Harris has gone to his eternal rest. He has finished his labors on earth, and terminated his short, though brilliant course in the service of our common Master. Who would have thought that so soon, that bright star which shone with such glory in the moral and religious firmament, would go down in darkness? But no! it has not set to rise no more, but to rise in a clearer sky, and to shine with increased lustre. How inscrutable are the ways of Providence! We can not tell why our beloved Br. should have been cut down in the morning of life, in full vigor and increasing usefulness. All we can say is, "even so Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight—and let thy will be done."—Banner.

In Auburn, September 21st, SARAH JANE, aged 12 days—and on the 17th, SUSAN LOUISA, aged 3 years 8 months and 13 days; only children of Mr. and Mrs. Winsor. Thus, in a few days, were these parents stript of all the buds of their hope. But we trust that their consolation is in Christ, through whom their children have attained the better and happier land, where God resides. May the Lord bless the mourners.

G. W. M.

In Walton, Delaware county, in September last, of consumption, Miss MARIA EELS, aged 17 years. Miss Eels was a young lady, universally beloved by all with whom she had formed an acquaintance. Many were the tears that were shed at her departure. Her attachments to earth were many, and the prospects of her youth bright and sunny. But she seemed perfectly submissive to the will of her heavenly Father. May God bless the bereaved parents with the consolations of the Gospel, and comfort all who have been called to mourn. A sermon was delivered on the occasion by A. C. B. Union please copy.

In Genoa, Cayuga county, September 28th, Mr. PALMER HEWIT, Esq., aged 45 years. Mr. H. was thrown from his carriage last Winter, and received an injury in the back, which occasioned his death. He was a man who was looked up to by all classes for counsel and instruction. He has left a wife, a son, and two daughters, besides an extensive circle of relatives and friends to mourn his departure. May God comfort them in their affliction. Funeral services on the 29th by A. C. B.

In Rochester, on the 19th ult., of the croup, SUSAN, daughter of Samuel and Lucy Doty, aged 7 years.—Thus ends the bud, ere it hath spread its flowers in the sunbeams of human existence. But its spirit now lives in the kingdom of God. S. M.

In Rochester, 28th ult., of the canker rash, JULIA, first and only daughter of Miles and Mary Decker, aged 11 months and 14 days. Br. Decker had been called from Utica to this place, to behold his beloved, but afflicted child, and cherish her in his paternal arms. He arrived just in time to see her in the land of the living, and take the parting look. May the Lord bless, and finally bring them to partake of his undying love, where parting is no more. S. M.

In Watertown, August 22d, JOHN, son of Calvin Spaulding, aged 19 months.

Also, on the 25th, MARY, infant child of Dr. J. W. Sikes, aged 3 months.

"I saw two infants sleeping
Upon their mothers' breast,
The mothers now are weeping,
Their infants are at rest.
These babes so lately breathing,
Their soft and balmy breath,
The mothers are now grieving
Their young but happy death." W. H. W.

In Watertown, September 14th, SOLOMON, son of Simeon and Arbilla Lewis, aged 10 months. This is the fourth child these parents have been called to part with. Their only consolation is found in the Gospel of free grace. May this ever be precious to them.

W. H. W.

In Potsdam, on the 11th ult., of dropsy, Mrs. FISK, wife of Mr Varnum Fisk, in the 50th year of her age. "The death bed is the detecter of the heart." She was patient in sickness, and resigned in death. Sermon from John xiv: 27, by the writer. F. J. B.

In Hopkinton, St. Lawrence county, on the 27th ult., Mrs. RUTH DURFEY, consort of Capt. Phineas Durfey, aged 60 years. Her husband and children deeply feel their irreparable loss; yet being supported by the Gospel faith, "they mourn not as those who have no hope." Few have lived more beloved, or died more lamented. Emphatically may it be said, she lived and died a Christian. Sermon from 2 Cor. i: 3, 4; by

F. J. BRIGGS.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.

This valuable work, which has been favorably noticed in the N. Y. Mirror, New-Yorker, the Boston Pearl and Galaxy, and sundry other periodicals, may be had at our Bookstore, wholesale and retail—in cloth, $7.20 per dozen, or 75 cents single; in elegant morocco, $9.60 per dozen, or $1.00 single; morocco extra, $12.00 per dozen, or $1.25 single; Turkey and other morocco, extra and gilt edge, $15.00 per dozen, or $1.50 single.

Those who wish to make presents to their young friends, will not find a more beautiful and valuable gift than this work in these splendid bindings.

Orders respectfully solicited.

GROSH and HUTCHINSON.
41 Genesee-street.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1838. NUMBER 43.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ESSAY

ON THE BEST PRACTICABLE MEANS OF PROMOTING THE KNOWLEDGE AND PRACTICE OF UNIVERSALISM.

At a meeting of a small society of inquirers after truth, which took place on the evening of Christmas, of the past year, the above was the appointed subject for discussion and conversation. The business of the evening was commenced, and a foundation laid for future remarks and friendly discussion, by the reading of the following brief Essay, or Address.

Were I to put the question to you, my friends, or to any assemblage of professed Christians—What is the most important object of endeavor and pursuit; what the most exalted and worthy end which can be aimed at?—I would find all willing, yea, ready to admit, in words, that no higher object could be named, than the cultivation of pure and undefiled religion in our own bosoms, and the extension of its benefits to our brethren of mankind. This, every professed Christian is, at all times, quite ready to acknowledge. But if we were to deduce our answer from the tenor of the thoughts, conversation, and engagements of the same individuals, we would be led to conclude that their sentiments, their feelings, their motives of action, were at variance with their words—their doings with their sayings; and that they felt not as they spake. But there are seasons, when the hurry and bustle of ordinary pursuits are brought to a pause, when men's minds are snatched, as it were, and withdrawn from the current and vortex of their every-day and all-absorbing occupations; and if, at these seasons of sickness or otherwise-caused thoughtfulness, we were to put the same question to the same individuals, we should have the same answer, but made vivid and impressive from the fervid dictates of feeling and conviction, perhaps of regret and remorse. Yes! when arrested by disease, or forced to thoughtfulness by the death of those we hold dear, we estimate very differently and much more justly, the worth of human pursuits, than while engaged in the ceaseless whirl of worldly business and bustle. Oh! that a feeling of the momentous importance which, at such seasons of meditation, we may all have felt to belong to the cause for which Jesus, Paul, and the "noble army of martyrs," have labored and suffered, could accompany us continually, and have a practical influence upon our lives. Then would the consideration of the best means of promoting the best of causes, even the improvement and celestial exaltation of the human mind, be frequently the theme of our thoughts, and our efforts and exertions might be so directed, that our death bed moments might be less harassed by reflections of misspent time, and misdirected pursuits, yea, perhaps, might be cheered by the retrospect of noble aims, and efforts well-sustained.

The importance of our subject for this evening, will secure, I am well assured, your attention to the few thoughts which have occurred to me since our last monthly meeting.

There can not be much diversity of sentiment as to the meaning of the terms—"the knowledge and practice of Universalism." It may not be amiss, however, to express our meaning in terms more direct and distinct.

What is Universalism? It is Christianity as understood by men of liberal and enlightened minds—it is the summary of what the Sacred Writings teach, when interpreted by unprejudiced and well-disciplined reason, and by the rules of sound and thorough scholarship. Universalism is a system of celestial truths—a consistent and rational scheme, by which are taught such views of the paternal character and government of the Supreme, and of man's nature, destiny, duty and sources of well-being, as tend to interest, to purify, to ennoble, and to carry forward and heaven-ward the mind of man. Universalism is Christianity purged and purified from many, if not all, the corruptions and interpolations which men have attempted to incorporate with it during the ages of barbarism and imbecility, through which the mind of man has passed since it was first proclaimed. It is Christianity, pure and undefiled, freed from the many errors, the many adulterations, with which the pure metal refuses to amalgamate, but which have been too passively "received by tradition from the fathers." Partialism is that form of Christianity which sprung up in a dark and unenlightened age; Universalism is that form in which it was first taught, and which enlightened minds of an enlightened age, are rescuing from the cumbrous and incongruous lumber amongst which its beauties and excellences were well nigh concealed. Partialism is that form of Christianity which best suits the ignorant, the uninquiring, the enthralled, the timid; Universalism is that form which best corresponds, and is most acceptable, to those who do, and who dare to think, inquire, and decide for themselves—to the free, the enlightened, the fearless, who call no man on earth, Master. Partialism is the "Reign of Terror"; Universalism is the dominion of "love, power, and a sound mind." Partialism is the religion of mental slaves; Universalism of free and independent men. Partialism is the religion of past ages and of the childhood of the world; Universalism is the religion of the coming times, which shall flourish when mind has advanced from imbecility to power, vigor, freedom, and the ability of manhood.

The knowledge of Universalism may be said to include the knowledge of every thing which reason and revelation teach, when interpreted in accordance with the character of God, and the nature and destiny of man. "Nature, like Revelation, needs an intelligent interpreter; and when it has found one, it testifies of a wise and benignant Author." The knowledge of Universalism is also the knowledge of what it is not. And we all know, that it is not that which it has been represented to be, in certain pulpits, and by sundry persons. No! Universalism proclaims no immunity from the punishment of sin, until there is emancipation from its power and operation. It promises no peace, until there is purity. It gives no hope of seeing God until we are made like him. It assures not of happiness, until there is holiness. It tells of no forgiveness from God, until we have imbibed the spirit which can freely forgive men their tresspasses. But Universalism "has been made a term of so much reproach, and has been uttered in so many tones of alarm, horror, indignation, and scorn, that to many it gives only a vague impression of something monstrous, impious, unutterably perilous." The knowledge of Universalism is the knowledge of that which will banish this illusion.

By the practice of Universalism, I understand its practical influence. And what is its practical influence? Does it tend to encourage to indolence in the cultivation of a good spirit, or unfruitfulness in virtue? Does it lead to sin more, that grace may abound? God forbid! Nay, verily, we deem it highly conducive towards creating a right spirit within us, even that spirit of which the fruits are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, fidelity, (or uprightness,) meekness, temperance. We think Universalism powerfully tends, not to promote, but to destroy the works of the devil. We think that it promotes a pure, fervent, and enlightened piety, by inculcating exalted, heart-stirring, consoling, and animating views of God's character. It tends to produce an abiding love of God, as no other system of religion does. It tends to make us feel the dignity and the duties of being children of God, as no other system does. And, further, it tends to promote exalted, generous and lovely virtues, by inspiring its believers with the spirit of good-will to men. Love to God, and love to man, which are the foundation of all the virtues and all the excellences which can exalt and adorn human nature, are more effectually produced by the views embraced by Universalists, than by any other. We maintain, therefore, that the practical influence of Universalism is purifying, ennobling, perfecting.

This highly desirable influence we would earnestly promote. By what means shall we best do so? While endeavoring to resolve and determine this important question, let our thoughts dwell for a while upon the influence of a good example, of a pure and holy life.

The influence, yea, the contagiousness of example, is universally felt and acknowledged, and has become proverbial. And, I presume, it has been the good fortune of all of us, to have felt the attractive and animating power of a good example, of a holy life; for who can witness the heavenly spirit, and the beneficent deeds, and the self-denying virtues of One whom every one is ready to acknowledge as a Christian indeed, without loving the individual, and respecting, at least, that Christianity in which his many amiabilities have their source? Who can behold the Christian indeed, without the wish, if not the effort, to be like him? Moreover, those who have been fortunate to know intimately the goodness and worth of one to whom all are willing to accord the peculiarly expressive title of a Christian indeed, have sensibly felt that the power, the influence which emanates from such a character consists, not only in making us love him, but, also, in making us like him. We not only respect and reverence, but we imitate or become assimilated. This assimilating power of a good example, we have all, I presume, personally experienced. It is, at all events, indisputable, or rather incontrovertible. It is the uniform testimony of those who have experienced the influence of such example, that it inspires an increase of love of excellence, improvement, virtue, perfection; that it gives energy, encouragement, animation to our resolutions and endeavors, partly by sympathy, and partly by making evident and undeniable how much may be done by what has been already done; that while under this influence, they have felt as if more advanced, more elevated, more dignified beings; that they have been conscious, not only of a fresh impulse to virtue's ways, but of a strength unknown before; and, finally, that not only did the pursuit of excellence seem more inviting, and more practicable, as well as dignified and exalting, but, likewise, that this life-giving power made the pursuit and the attainment more easy, pleasant, and peaceful.

From each one of us may such an influence go forth. And what higher, more desirable object for ambition can we set before us, than to become like the venerated characters from whom we have derived so beneficent an influence? If we could make ourselves sensibly, vividly, enduringly to feel, that by perseverance in mortifying our evil propensities, and otherwise perfecting ourselves in virtue, we would eventually become such promiment objects of observation, that the young would love and venerate us, and would be encouraged to enter on the same upward path, and that both on young and old, we should exert an influence that would lead them nearer to God and to holiness, to purity and to peace, we could hardly refrain from the persevering exertions which are necessary to place us in so distinguished, exalted, and God-like a position.

And, on the supposition that there were many more examples than now are, of such eminent and contagious goodness, and that we were, happily, among the number, what would the consequences be?—how much would be accomplished towards promoting the knowledge and practical influence of pure Christianity, or Universalism, in its most extended sense?—how much, in promoting the cause of Universalism as one of the many modes of interpreting Christianity? Let us try to estimate and to realise how much.

It may be very confidently maintained, that in proportion as the number of men of eminent piety and goodness do increase, so will the host of prejudices and obstacles which prevent the knowledge, love, and practice of Universalism, or pure Christianity, vanish. For example: It is no uncommon sentiment which supposes Christianity a pure invention of the priesthood—"a cunningly devised fable"—a system upheld by terror, and propagated by priests and "knowing ones," merely to maintain their power and fill their pockets. As long as this sentiment prevails, it will cause those by whom it is entertained, to look askance, with contempt and indignation, upon every thing connected with Christianity. Now, what better way is there to remove this obstacle, than to exhibit the fruits of Christianity in the daily life and virtues of one eminently and acknowledgedly devout and good—one distinguished for showing forth the fruits of the Good Spirit? (Gal. v: 22.) Again: It is no uncommon sentiment which supposes that religion is but the resort of the weak-minded, or the cloak which hypocrites and evil-doers assume. To remove this and similar prejudices and obstacles in the way of the establishment of Christianity throughout the world, no more efficient weapon can be produced than the influence of a good example. The profession of Christianity, indeed, may comport with silliness and weak-mindedness, but do we ever see its genuine fruits save in sound-minded, if not strong-minded men? No! we have always, for our part, seen the virtues of the Christian united with the dignity, consistency, and good sense of a sound mind. The profession of Christianity is not inconsistent with deceit, hypocrisy, and many disgraceful vices; but its genuine indwelling and power, is altogether incompatible with any taint of dishonesty, deceit, or want of sterling uprightness. Again: Besides those who are opposed to every form of Christianity, there are some who are merely indifferent—who, like Gallio, "care for none of these things." The loveliness of a good example would remove this indifference also. It would prove, in the manner most likely to be impressive and undeniable, the value of that tree of which the fruits are so pleasing and beneficent. In fine, no hindrance to an examination and reception of Christianity, has been thought of or suggested to me, which the weapon whose value I am insisting on, would not overcome and remove. No eulogy of Christianity is at all equal to a life which daily exhibits some of the virtues which the spirit that was in Jesus doth engender. No evidence of Christianity so convincing as a holy life!

Let our attention be directed, for a little, to the lessons which experience has taught the friends of Christianity. What chiefly hinders the reception of Christianity among heathen nations? The immoral, unchristian lives of its professors and would-be propagators. "It is well known, that the greatest obstruction to Christianity in heathen countries, is the palpable and undeniable depravity of Christian nations. They abhor our religion, because we are such unhappy specimens of it.—They are unable to read our books, but they can read our lives; and what wonder if they reject with scorn a system under which the vices seem to have flourished so luxuriantly. The Indian of both hemispheres, has reason to set down the Christian as little better than himself. He associates with the name, perfidy, fraud, rapacity, and slaughter." Thus, you see, and missionary-loving enthusiasts might learn, that the greatest hindrance to the reception and propagation of Christianity, consists in the want of good men, good lives, good examples. Let it be demonstrated that Christianity makes us any better, before we feel so anxious to send it to heathen nations. The prejudices and antipathies of the Jew against Christianity, are, perhaps, more invincible than any other, national or individual. How are they to be evangelised? By controversy, by logic, by the written evidences of Christianity? Nay, verily. The Jew is surfeited with controversies; he is proof against logic and reasoning; but he is not proof against moral feeling, against the loveliness and the power of Christian example. Thus, and perhaps thus alone, will the Jew ever be led to embrace faith in Jesus as the Christ, and his precepts and example as his best guide to peace and happiness. To preach by example, is the best mode of addressing the children of Israel, and the most efficacious means of persuading them to embrace Jesus as a Teacher sent from heaven. Were the spirit and precepts of Christianity exemplified by professed Christians among whom the Jews are scattered abroad; were the piety, devotedness, charity, meekness, forgiveness, brotherly kindness inculcated by our Master, more frequently practised; in short, were the Christian manifestly better than the Jew, the latter would soon yield to the force of example. But save in one among a million (almost) of instances, where does the Jew see the virtues of Christianity—the fruits of the spirit of Jesus?

Having stated our impression as to the efficiency of a good example in those professing Christianity, upon the removal of the obstructions which arrest its visible progress throughout the world, we next consider the potency of a Christ-like life in subduing the more latent causes of obstruction, and in promoting the inward and unseen progress of Christianity among those who are professedly friendly, or at least, neither scoffers at, nor opposers of Christianity. Upon those out of the pale of the Christian church, a good example would operate so as to induce a favorable regard, and a candid, unprejudiced examination of what Christianity is; upon those who knew, in part, at least, what it was as exhibited in creeds, in pulpits, and in books, example would operate so as to produce a knowledge of what Christianity is in deed and in truth, in power and in the bosoms of its genuine disciples, and to extend, in this best sense, the number of those who compose the kingdom of heaven. From the many topics of consideration which this field presents, we will confine our attention to a few—chiefly to the following:—the efficacy of a good example in a public teacher of Christianity; in a parent; in one of influential station; of each of these, in recommending the subject to consideration; in prominently exhibiting the chief characteristics of Christianity; in promoting the practical influence of Christian principles; and, finally, in recommending the peculiar views or interpretation of Christianity which they are known to have embraced.

What would be the effect of an eminently pure and holy life in a public teacher of Christianity, in promoting the knowledge and influence of those views which he taught, and those principles which he exhibited? We are all, in the present state of society, well aware of the efficacy, for good or for evil, which emanates from each individual who makes a profession of Christianity. "Every man calling himself (in a special sense) a Christian, either saves or destroys those around him: such is the rule of the dispensation under which we have to act." This influence or efficacy is concentrated in its greatest degree in the person of a public teacher. From him men look for much; wisely or unwisely, yet they look for much. When clergymen come short of the spirit and the attainments which are generally expected of them, it is not exaggerated language to say, that the evil which their influence produces, is tremendous.—And, on the other hand, when the public teachers of Christianity do come up to the "stature of a perfect man in Christ," and to what is expected of them, their power of doing good is almost illimitable. Upon every one within the circle of their acquaintanceship, they leave a celestial influence, a touch of heaven. Have we not in our eye now one of this latter character—a teacher of liberal Christianity—a preacher of the "glad tidings which shall be unto all people"—one whom young and old, and those of every religious sect, do respect, love, and venerate? His character is so well established, that even from one who differs from him, toto cœlo, in religious creed, and who might be very glad to find "one hole in all his coat," we can not suppose that we could get any other than the subjoined answers to a few queries which we may be supposed to put to him in reference to our present subject. "Is not Mr. ——— a Christian indeed?" "O yes, I verily believe he is; for he could hardly have kept up the appearance so long as he has been among us." "Does not your own clergyman speak highly of him?" "Yes, I have heard him speak in terms of warmest admiration and affection, but lamenting that he should preach such dangerous doctrines. If he were only sound in the faith, he might be another apostle John." "Do you not now think very differently of Universalism than you did before knowing Mr. ———?" "Why, yes, somewhat. I used to think that it was only a way by which wicked men tried to pacify their consciences; but Mr. ———, and most of his church, are really as good men as we have among us. I used to think that it could only encourage those who believed it, to sin more egregiously and daringly; but now I know that it does not offer any such encouragement as Mr. ——— preaches it, and I see many of his hearers becoming better men." "Have you not known that the sentiments of many who once bitterly opposed Universalism, have become changed, and that in language similar to that of Festus, they might say of Mr. ———: Almost he persuades us to be Universalists?" "Yes, for who could oppose such a meek, gentle, good man. Those that go to hear him, have generally less to say against him; and he has persuaded over to his side some of our best and most sensible men. I believe them mistaken and almost bewitched; but then if he makes them as good men as himself, we may overlook their mistaken notions." Yes, we know at this distance from the scene of his labors, that many a thoughtless, giddy youth has become seriously disposed through his influence; that many, all of whose religion consisted in a weekly attendance at meeting, do now search the Scriptures daily, and are endeavoring daily to die unto sin, and live unto uprightness and well-doing; that in many families whom he visits, there is now seen less of an absorbing attention to making merchandise and money, and more to the improvement of the mind and character; that he seems to leave with every one with whom he associates, a portion of his own spirit—of the spirit of piety, gratitude, veneration towards God—of love, candor, gentleness, peace-making, brotherly-kindness towards men—and of cheerfulness, contentedness, activity, moderation, and self-command. We have good reason to fear that the tone of society would be lowered by his removal; that the interests of sociality, education, literature, morality, and religion would all materially feel his loss. So much does this venerable Christian do for the promotion of human improvement, and a slandered system of belief!

For Universalism, in its most restricted sense, as a name for the peculiarities of the faith of a "sect which is every where spoken against," our venerable friend has done immeasurable service. Honest misconceptions, as well as interested and malignant misrepresentations of his faith, he has scattered to the four winds, simply and chiefly by living them down. Having overcome much difficulty and opposition, he has established for Universalism a claim to respectful inquiry and a candid hearing. He is blessed and venerated by those who once thought lightly of his office, and all serious and unprejudiced persons admit that whatever peculiarities there may be in his opinions, yet no man teaches with greater authority and earnestness that religion which maintains "that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live righteously, soberly, and devoutly, in this present world, looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the Great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us, to deliver us from all iniquity, and to purify for himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."

Nor are the praises due to this good man and eminent servant of God complete, so far as they are related to our present subject, without mentioning his conduct as to controversy and proselyting. Neither in public nor in private is he given to disputation. In preaching, and also in conversation, he dwells chiefly on those great principles which have the most direct bearing on the heart and life. He seems of the opinion of John Newton, who tells us—"My principal method for defeating heresy, is by establishing truth. An individual proposes to fill a bushel with tares; now if I can fill it first with wheat, I defy his attempts." And he is far above the vulgar arts of proselyting. Believing that his views of Christianity are more favorable to piety and morality than those views generally prevalent, he ardently wishes their dissemination. But he cares more about their bearing fruit in the heart and life, than their dormant existence in a vain profession. To swell the numbers of his own sect, is less an object with him, than to see men of every denomination denying ungodliness, mortifying the flesh, and abounding more and more in the love of God and the fruits of his holy spirit. Under a race of such preachers, how would Christianity flourish!

Within a narrower sphere, the influence of the parent rivals that of the public teacher. The influence of parental example exceeds that of any other, and is quite familiar to all of us. All the weight of this mighty agent on rising mind and character, may be wielded either for or against Christianity. I do not think that we can conscientiously claim to be in earnest in our desires to propagate that form of Christianity which we esteem the purest, the most interesting, and possessing the happiest influence on character and happiness, if we neglect to take advantage of the very powerful instruments with which, as parents, we are intrusted. It should have been ere now, and it surely ought now, at least, to be our aim and our endeavor to form such habits and acquire such a power of acting upon the young mind, that we render our religious views interesting to, and operative upon, those committed to our charge. Youth, hitherto, have not generally felt much interest in the subject of religion. They generally wish to escape from every thing associated with it. Much of this distaste has arisen, we doubt not, from the repulsive aspect in which the character of God, his mode of government, the nature and destiny of man, together with many kindred subjects, have been presented to the minds of youth. While we knew no more of God than was taught us by Calvinists, we were wont to regard him as the GREAT UNINTELLIGIBLE, and his mode of government as the most obscure and puzzling of all subjects. Thank God! that we are able, on our part, to make these topics both more intelligible and more attractive to our children. We can not employ their minds on more interesting or ennobling subjects than those which our views of religious truth do furnish. Universalist parents, and all who have embraced liberal views of Christianity, can not consistently employ the language of our Lord's prayer, and say, "Thy kingdom come," if they do not use, to the utmost advantage, their powers of instructing and operating upon youthful minds, and render their thoughts familiar with those views which our own souls would not give up for any earthly consideration. Why have so many gone over to infidelity? Because their first and strongest impressions of religious subjects, were such as their unsophisticated judgment and feelings could not adopt. Rather would we believe the evidences of Christianity a stupendous fallacy, than that a true revelation could picture such a God as Calvinists find there. By giving the youth of the rising generation more interesting and just views of such subjects, we hope to prevent them from becoming victims of infidelity, or timid slaves to the propagators of a system against which their intellectual and moral natures revolt. Were the youth of the present age to adopt our views of Christianity, and be disciplined in the spirit and the duties which it inculcates, what a changed generation would the next one be! In proportion as we are able to impress upon our children such views, such a spirit, and such habits, will the next generation exhibit somewhat of the astonishing change to which we refer. Oh, then, let our example, our lives, and our instructions, make religion to our children a very different subject than it was as presented to us in our youth. Let them feel its loveliness, its dignity, and its power to make them nobler, purer, better beings. I know of no way in which we can more efficiently promote the cause of Christ—of the good news—of Universalism. And I would rejoice to know that many parents entertain such views, and act in correspondence with them.

Especially, would my heart leap for joy, could I be assured that every mother, who has adopted our religious views, was aware that with her resides the most powerful influence in the formation of the mind and character, and was well prepared, and still earnestly preparing further, to use that influence to the best advantage. They may find much calculated to awaken them to the importance of their influence, and to their responsibility in Abbot's "Mother at Home." We would that some mother among us would address her sex, and detail the methods that might be successfully adopted to imbue children with suitable religious views, and to form them to a Christian spirit and Christian virtues. Let her tell the little devices to render religious truths agreeable, and interesting, and intelligible, and of her plan for subduing the selfishness of our natures, and cultivating in the young mind a love to others like that entertained towards themselves, and habits of self-control, and of such virtues as love of God and our neighbor, would produce. I am well assured that mothers, who entertain liberal views of Christianity, can do more for the improvement of human nature, and for the promotion of the most enlightened and happifying form of Christianity, than any other agents or agency whatever. With this expression of my convictions, I must tear myself from a subject on which I could, with pleasure, indulge beyond the limits proper on this occasion.

Mothers! your sons and the next generation "will arise and call you blessed," if, to the best of your ability, you will lead your children—sweetly draw them by example, and urge them by instruction—to be like Christ, their elder Brother, and God, their Father in heaven.

Next to the influence of parents and preachers in promoting the cause of Universalism, may be ranked that possessed by men of liberal views and Christian lives, who are in eminent stations.—On such are men's eyes very generally turned, and hence their influence. If this were employed in extending and recommending liberal views in religion, and in cultivating the graces and virtues of liberal Christianity, our cause would mightily prosper. Let such as are set on a hill, whose light can not be hid, be very solicitious that their light may so shine as to lead men to think, to be virtuous, and eagerly to pursue the path that leads to perfection. By blameless and exemplary lives they can do more, than those in less eminent stations, for the promotion of their enlightened views, and of those virtues which these tend to produce.

But I must bring my observations to a close, for your patience would be exhausted and my limits be exceeded, were I to indulge in reflections upon the efficacy of Christian lives in promoting the great end for which Christ appeared—even the improvement and exaltation of our race. Perhaps to some it may appear as if I attributed too much importance to this instrument, and might have allowed other means a nearly equal share of importance and efficiency. There are, indeed, many other means, but I hold them so subordinate and inefficient, compared with this, that I do not regret having taken up the time allotted to me upon the influence of a holy life alone. Time indeed would fail us to speak of all the means which might be put into operation to promote our good cause.—Partly as an excuse for having occupied your time so long upon one topic—partly to show that I stand not alone in my estimate of the exceeding importance of this means—I will read you a few sentences from "Fanaticism," a work by the author of "Natural History of Enthusiasm," one of the most talented writers of the day. "The great work in an age of missions, should it be any thing else than the re-inauguration of Christianity among ourselves? If religion—religion we mean, not as found on parchments, or in creeds, but in the bosoms of men, were indeed what once it was, it would doubtless spread, as once it did, from heart to heart, and from city to city, and from shore to shore."—"Christianity, such as it actually exists in the bosoms of those who entertain it, is the instrument of God's mercy to the world:—and the effect in every age will be as the Instrument. In these times we have not quite lost sight of this great principle; much less do we deny it:—and yet every day we give more attention to other truths than to this. We honor the capital doctrine of the agency of the spirit of Grace in the conversion of men; and then we turn to proximate and visible means, and pay due regard to all the ordinary instruments of instruction. And thus having rendered homage in just proportion, to the Divine power and sovereignity on the one hand, and to human industry on the other, we think too little of that Middle Truth which, nevertheless, to ourselves is the most significant of the three, namely—That the moral and intelligent instrumentality from which the Sovereign grace refuses to sever itself, is nothing else than the vital force which animates each single believer. Does not the Omnipresent Spirit, rich in power to renovate human hearts, even now brood over the populous plains and crowded cities of India and of China, as well as over the cities and plains of England? Is not God—even our God, locally present among the dense myriads that tread the precincts of idol worship? Is he not ever and in all places at hand; and wherever at hand, able also to save? Yes, but alas! the moral and rational instrumentality is not present in those dark places; and the immutable law of the spiritual world forbids that, apart from this system of means, the souls of men should be rescued."

"Nor is the bare presence of the moral and rational instrument of conversion enough; for its POWER resides in its QUALITY. The very same law—awful and inviolable, which demands its presence, demands also its quality, as the condition of its efficiency. Yes, indeed, awful and inviolable law; awful, because inviolable; and awful to the church, because it makes the salvation of mankind, in each successive generation, to lean with undivided stress, upon the purity and vigor of faith and charity, as found in the hearts of the Christians of each age, severally and collectively!"—"Shall our thunders always have a distant aim? Alas! how many generations of men have already lived and died untaught, while the church has delicately smothered her failings, and has asked for an inobservant reverence from the profane world. True it is that the vices of heathens and infidels are grievous; but it is also true that the vices of the church, if much less flagrant, and less mischievous in their immediate operation, are loaded with a peculiar aggravation, inasmuch as they destroy or impair the ONLY EXISTING MEANS for the repression and extermination of all error and all vice."

A. N. S. S.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1838.

2 TIM. IV: 1-8.

In this paragraph we behold Paul, in the prospect of a near and violent death, giving to Timothy, his son in the faith, a solemn admonition regarding his conduct as an evangelist. We behold a dying apostle pouring out his most earnest desires for an adopted son and successor. To the admonitions and injunctions of the dying, we usually attach an uncommon interest: when permitted to listen to the last words of one so eminent as Paul, our attention should be secured. Being not inapplicable to our own case, these departing charges are still more worthy of consideration.—Let us then listen to a dying Paul, meanwhile applying his words to our own benefit.

Could there be a more solemn or impressive method of adjuring Timothy to a faithful discharge of the duties which had been explained to him—of the trust which had been committed to him, than that of Paul?—"I charge thee in the presence of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." We know of no more effectual method of preserving the conscience in influential authority—no more effectual method of keeping ourselves strictly and energetically to our pursuit of high, and exalted, and holy aims, than the maintenance of a constant sense of the presence of our Father above. We would, therefore, recommend to all with whom we have any influence, to endeavor to maintain this sense of God's constant presence, not only upon the great occasions of life, but upon all occasions, even habitually. Nor do we know a better guide in many of the perplexities of life than the asking ourselves what, under similar circumstances, would be the conduct of our unerring example. In his presence we should frequently place ourselves, therefore, and from his example take lessons for our guidance.

To the discharge of his whole duty Paul, in this solemn manner, charges Timothy, but he more particularly insists on the following.—The word—that is, the glad tidings communicated by Jesus to Paul, and by Paul to Timothy—the latter was to consider it the chief object of his life to proclaim and make known; and to the propagation and defence of these in their primitive purity, he was to attach such pre-eminent importance, that no considerations of personal ease, convenience, or comfort, were to be allowed to keep him from embracing every possible opportunity of making them known. When he had done nothing towards promoting the dissemination of the glad tidings, he might consider his time as lost, of such supreme moment was this duty to Timothy. A desire of interest betrays itself upon almost all occasions; Paul charges Timothy to let it be thus with him—to let men see that above every thing he desired that they should receive, and be made happy by, the recent announcements from Heaven. Such we take to be the amount of being "instant in season and out of season."

Those who taught, or were under the influence of error were to be confuted, reproved, and exhorted, "with the utmost patience of instruction."—Experience demonstrates that errors are not readily relinquished; and no qualities are more necessary in the management of errorists than patience and its parent kindness. It has been noticed that the apostle has often recommended this virtue to Timothy, (2 Tim. ii: 20; iii: 16,) whereas it is once mentioned in the directions given by the same apostle to Titus. It has been supposed that this might be owing to the differing dispositions of the two; and that Timothy being younger than Titus, was of a more ardent and impatient temper, and required to exercise more restraint upon his natural feelings. And observation teaches us that some of us have more need to apply to themselves, this admonition, than others. The evil treatment which he would receive from these errorists and opposers, he was to endure patiently.

Other charges of minor importance, we shall pass without remark, that we may dwell the more upon the sublime self-satisfaction with which Paul reflects upon his course, and the serenity with which he looks upon death. Read the 6th, 7th and 8th verses, and imagine to yourselves Paul in prison, and in expectation of a violent death, thus calmly, yea joyfully, reflecting.—"The time of my departure is speedily approaching, yea, I may say, my blood is already poured out. But this appals me not when I consider that in the cause of Jesus I have combated a good combat, like a successful competitor in the Olympic games, I have completed the race, and in all my engagements I have preserved my fidelity. Besides, there is now reserved for me a crown of righteousness, with which the Lord Jesus, the impartial umpire, will reward me at the day of his kingdom. Death, therefore, has no terrors for me." Who would not wish for such a latter end as this! As all must desire such an end, why is it not more frequently to be met with? There are two causes of this rarity which are found operating where they ought not, even among those who have a form of godliness, and a name to live. The first is a want of devotedness to high, conscience-approved, and God-approved aims—a grovelling contentedness with gratifying the lower propensities. The second is a want of energy, decision, perseverance when a high and worthy aim has been taken.—If we would have a latter end like Paul, let our aims be as disinterested, as much for Christ's cause, and our pursuit as resolute, and then conscious of good and faithful service, we may anticipate a crown, and long for the Judge's coming.

P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS, ETC.

To all Universalists, especially those within the bounds of the Genesee Association.

You will perceive by a reference to the minutes of the Genesee Association, which was held on the 20th and 21st days of June, 1838, that the following, amongst other resolutions, was passed by the council of that body.

1. Resolved, That we earnestly recommend to the Universalist community generally, and to the societies within this Association especially, the institution of Sunday schools, Bible classes, and conference meetings, in all places where it is practicable, and thus to cultivate the social and religious feelings among them.

2. That an article be prepared by Br. N. Sawyer, and published in our periodicals, recommendatory of Sunday schools, Bible classes, and conference meetings.

Thus you will see, my brethren, what has brought me before you in this public manner; to speak to you as men and Christians, on those points, which the council of the Genesee Association deemed of much and vital importance to the good of the rising generation, and the cultivation of our moral and intellectual faculties, as stewards of God's numerous blessings and bounties, which we are daily receiving from him.

When I say that this is an age of improvement, I tell you nothing more than you have been informed of in numerous ways, and you, who have come to years of manhood, can see the advancement of the arts and sciences, within your own recollections. And is there not yet room, as well as a need of an improvement, in our mental and moral faculties, as well as in the arts and sciences? I hardly need have proposed such a question to a community of Universalists, who are well informed in the knowledge of the holy Scriptures, and who profess to take them as the man of their counsel in all their intercourse in the human life.—But I put the question to you seriously, my brethren, is it not our duty, as well as our privilege, to attempt to improve the minds of our children, and of those who have been committed to our charge; and that we see that they are brought up in the fear and admonition of the Lord?

But the objection has been raised by some good men of our denomination, that others have made use of Sunday schools as nurseries of their particular faith, and the peculiarities which they attached to the same, and which we believe to be erroneous and not founded upon the Word of God; and if we begin to follow them in the establishment of Sabbath schools, we shall be as likely to run into sectarian principles, as they have done, and we shall become a sect among others, and cultivate our errors in our children as well as they.

Is it not the duty of every parent to bring his children up in a knowledge of the Word of God? I do not ask whether it is a privilege, for all to whom this friendly article is directed must be aware of that. But I do contend it is their imperative duty, and if they have even been initiated into the first principle of Universalism, which is supreme love to God, and love to our fellowmen as to ourselves, then the argument holds good—if knowledge is good for us, it is good for our children; if a knowledge of the holy Scriptures makes us wise unto salvation, it will have the same effect upon them.

The fact is universally admitted by all, that the first impressions made upon a child's mind are the most permanent and lasting. Therefore should every child be impressed with a knowledge and a belief in one God, who is the Father of all, and that he superintends the affairs of the whole world. And whilst the child is learning the great truths of divine Revelation, it will be laying the foundation of a consistent and scriptural religion which will stand by it through all its after life.. Children will increase in knowledge and wisdom, and become wiser and better, and when they go out into the world for themselves, they will be prepared with all that is necessary to make them devoted and consistent followers of our Lord Jesus Christ; for they "have known the Scriptures from their youth up."

The wise men has truly said, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." And there is nothing more true than if a child is properly informed as to the great and leading principles of the Christian religion whilst his mind is young and tender, that those principles will "grow with his growth, and strengthen with his strength;" and he will improve upon them in after life, and on this youthful but permanent foundation already laid, he will erect that superstructure of faith, hope and righteousness which shall adorn and beautify his whole life. And how, and when can this be done better than at a well organized Sabbath school, and when children shall be in the habit of coming together from week to week, for the purpose of receiving those salutary lessons of religion and morality which the Bible contains, and the teachers will feel anxious to have them learn and understand?

I appeal to you who are fathers and mothers, and to all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth; how much more comfort and consolation you would have experienced thus far in your life, if you had been in childhood instructed in the glorious Gospel of a world's salvation from sin through faith in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, than what you have by being brought up in the belief of a partial and selfish system?

Then be persuaded to enlist in this, one of the best of causes, by instructing your children and others in the knowledge of the Scriptures, well knowing that you are learning them, at the same time, how to be men and women, and how to be Christians; and thus you will prepare them for the faithful discharge of all the duties that await them. And in so doing, you will use your exertions for the promotion of the Sabbath school—in providing the necessary means for establishing the same, and seeing that your children do attend regularly on each returning Sabbath, where they will get a knowledge of the Word of the most High, and of his Son; and become meek and lowly followers of him "who came down from Heaven, not to do his own will, but the will of him that sent him," and who "hath done all things well."

Brethren and sisters—think of these things, and when your minds are settled on what is your duty, do it.

The next thing in order, is Bible classes. And to these, I hardly know where an objection can be raised. If it is necessary that we should study the Scriptures, to make us wiser and better; if they contain the mind and will of God; then there can not be one permanent and solid objection raised against them. The time that those classes will usually occupy, will be but short; perhaps on the Sabbath, after our minds have been engaged through the day by hearing the Word preached. We can thus come together and spend an hour or two, in the investigation of some portion of the divine Record. Then pastor and people will meet on an equal footing, each can propose to the rest of the class his doubts and objections, and the rest, with a true and philanthropic spirit will endeavor to remove those doubts and objections, and to lead the mind of all into a rational and scriptural interpretation of the same.

Thus, much useful and lasting information will be given and received, and many questions investigated, which will be a means to throw light upon the mind and design of the writer, and prepare us to give a reason of the hope that is in us with meekness and fear.

The young will, at the Bible class, be continually laying up a fund of useful and biblical information, that will last whilst they have their reason, fitting and preparing them at all future time in their lives, to meet the objections which may be brought against our particular views of a world's salvation. The older Christian will, as he is a regular attendant on those meetings, feel his growth in knowledge and grace, and his faith will be founded more and more firmly on the immutable principles of the word and will of our Heavenly Father. He will thus grow stronger and stronger in the Christian warfare, and become a better man in society, a more consistent and more devoted follower of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Then permit me, my brethren, to persuade you to think of these things, and if it is right and good, if it will make us wiser and better and advance the cause of virtue and truth, then let us enlist in the establishment of the Bible class; and when once established, let us never falter in the discharge of our duty, but always to be present to receive and impart that rich and durable instruction on this important subject, for we shall never be too old to learn, nor too young to impart that knowledge which we glean from the Word of God.

Conference meetings are the next thing embraced in the foregoing resolution. A Conference meeting is the assembling of ourselves together for the purpose of consulting on the present and future prospect of our earthly Zion, to strengthen the weak hearted, to confirm the feeble minded, and to remove the doubts of any in the great salvation, and to further us all on in the good way of virtue and holiness. To create more uniformity of feeling and action of all believers in the Gospel, and to build us up in a more connected action, and advance the pure worship of God our heavenly Father, whilst we are sojourners here in time.—At these meetings there will be a diversity of exercises—such as prayers, exhortations, and singing the praises of our God and his Son.

In the Conference room we shall hear the aged fathers and mothers in the church speak of the goodness of God, and how a faith in the world's salvation has sustained them through a long life—how they have been comforted under all the afflictive dispensations that they have been called to pass through here in time, and how the glorious day of their emancipation brighteus in their vision of faith, as the earthly scenes seem to recede before them—and that they feel willing to wait all their appointed time before they depart and be with Christ. There we shall also meet young Christians devoting themselves to the worship and service of God, and going on in the way of peace, and leading lives, devoted to the Giver of all grace, and putting their dependance on him, for their future usefulness in society and the advancement of righteousness on the earth. Then we shall become more and more acquainted with each other learn from each their several wants and situation in a more special manner than it can be done in almost any other way. And by becoming thus more intimately known to each other, there will be more union of feeling and concert of action, and a church or society thus blessed by these means, will grow stronger, and can move on in a more glorious and Christ-like course, building themselves up in the most holy faith of Jesus Christ and his apostles, whilst here below.

In fine, this will be a kind of centre, or in other words, a point where all will be informed of the necessities and wants of each, and they can all start from this place to perform those Christian duties which are incumbent on us, as individuals or as a society. By these remarks I do not intend to say that those duties can not be performed without the aid of a Conference meeting, or that this information can not be obtained by any other means; but I do contend that there will be the most convenient time and place to obtain this information, and the best place for any society to devise means for the relief of the same.

With these remarks, I leave these subjects with you, hoping that if any thing has been said which will have a bearing, if put into practice, to make us and the rising generation better and wiser, and promote the happiness of mankind whilst here below, and be a means of building up the Redeemer's kingdom on earth, my object will be fully accomplished; and may God bless us, keep us, sanctify and save us. Amen. N. Sawyer.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

N. Y. WESTERN CONFERENCE.

Though harmony and good feeling prevailed in the council of this Conference at its late session, yet I must be allowed here to remark, that our deliberations there, were to me, not very interesting or profitable—especially when we take into view the singular disposal of the question previously voted for discussion. But this is only "mine opinion," it may pass for what it is worth. I can not believe that a mere "expression of opinion" upon any so called important question, is calculated to elicit that light which a fair and candid "discussion" of the same would do. I am for open and untrammelled discussion, whether in political, secular, scientific or religious matters. This is in strict accordance with the rights of man, and the true genius of the Gospel. "Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good," is my religious motto in my investigations after truth.

The subject of the ordinances, especially that of the Lord's Supper, has been considerably agitated of late in western New-York. It has been the subject, and I believe the principal subject of "discussion," or rather examination, (vide, Minutes,) of each session of the Western Conference of Universalists. Some of our ministering brethren have, uncalled for, sounded the tocsin of alarm, that "great is the desolation of Zion in western New-York—that Universalism was here on the decline," etc.—and they have sagely undertaken to solve the great problem of the supposed "falling off," by imputing the difficulty to a total neglect, or at least a remissness, of attending to the ordinances of "meats and drinks!"

In answer to the first specification I would say, that I am, for one, unable to discover such a decline as some of our brethren have represented.—Universalism in western New-York is advancing as fast as can well be expected, considering the small number of preachers there, who have as faithfully and as thoroughly pioneered as has been their duty to do. I think that the difficulty is not by any means wholly on the part of our lay brethren. And as a preacher, I am willing to take my due share of remissness.

Another difficulty has grown out of the pecuniary embarassments which have, to a greater or esser extent, affected the whole community for a year or two past. Another—that some of our societies have been built up with unsuitable materials—have been built up by a too unwarrantable spirit of opposition, during the great religious new-light excitement which has afflicted our country for several years past.

In reply to the second specification, I remark, that the grand difficulty does not lie in a neglect of the mere ordinances, but in a neglect of greater matters. We should look well to the substance of our holy faith, before we reach forth our arms to embrace the mere shadow! The foundation of our prosperity as a denomination of Christians—the foundation of true piety and moral virtue, rests not upon the "baseless fabric of a vision." We must, in my humble opinion, depend upon more substantial materials with which to build up the fair temple of righteousness and truth, than mere forms and ceremonies—the letter which killeth.—See Col. ii: 14, 20. Let us attend, I say, to the greater and more important matters first; and then, if it is thought proper to attend to the lesser, I have no objections. Let every "man answer a good conscience towards God," and be "fully persuaded in his own mind." I am in favor of a thorough discipline, an efficient and a close organization—church organization, if you please; but under present circumstances, when so many of our lay and clerical brethren are divided in opinion in regard to the expediency and obligatory nature of the ordinances, we should be careful how we press this subject too fast. We have work enough before us of a more important nature—at least, for the present. I would therefore suggest to the Western Conference of New-York, the propriety of searching thoroughly into the cause of the supposed decline, before it pronounces a too hasty decision. These remarks in perfect good will. They are plain, I know; but I am a "plain, blunt man, and speak right on." N. Brown.

Salina, September 6, 1838.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. Grosh, Editor; A. R. Bartlett, Assistant Editor
G. W. Montgomery, E. H. Chapin, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1838.

DO WE WORSHIP CHRIST?

The Rev. Richard Roe, of Dublin, Ireland, was elected a Corresponding Secretary of the United States Universalist Historical Society, in 1837, and declined the appointment very respectfully, (with offers of personal services, however,) on the ground that his acceptance would be holding connexion with Unitarians—or persons holding Unitarian sentiments. Br. Whittemore, in the Trumpet of October 6th, examines the objection, and justly draws a marked line of distinction between the Universalist and the Unitarian denominations, and disavows most truly our holding those objectionable views of the divinity of Christ's mission, the inspiration of the Scriptures, etc., which are held by many Unitarians, and are but another form of infidelity. In all this I agree most cordially with Br. Whittemore—I believe he has truly represented the great leading views and feelings of the Universalists generally, on those subjects.

But not content with this, he evidently endeavors to convince Mr. Roe that he could be in our connexion without fear of being in connexion with persons holding to Unitarian sentiments. There is some disingenuousness apparent to my mind in this part of Br. Whittemore's article. He either uses terms in some other than their commonly understood meaning, or he misrepresents the views of all Universalists with whom I am acquainted. But hear him speak—

"Lastly, Jesus shall participate with the Father in receiving ascriptions of praise and glory from the boundless universe. When his work is fully done, when sin is finished, and transgression has an end, when all apparent evil is banished from the wide universe, then shall Jesus receive the homage of all. Universalists are clearly of opinion that Jesus Christ is an object of worship.

What passage of Scripture do they more frequently quote than the following? 'God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father." Phil. ii: 9-11. We are unable to understand this passage, if it does not describe the worship of Christ, by the assembled universe. Once more. See the following sublime passage in the book of Revelations: 'I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts and the elders; and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands, saying with a loud voice, WORTHY IS THE LAMB that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing. And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and UNTO THE LAMB forever and ever.' Rev. v: 11-13. It is the evident import of the above passages, that Jesus will at last participate with the Father, in receiving the ascriptions of praise from a redeemed and grateful universe forever."

There are some objectionable phrases in the preceding paragraph, but my comments on this will be sufficient to show my meaning. If by worship, Br. Whittemore means what all Unitarians understand by the term as used in the Scriptures, then not only do Universalists, but all Unitarians in America and in England, agree with him in believing that "Jesus Christ is an object of worship." But if he means by the term worship what our Trinitarian brethren generally understand by it, then do I, as one of the Universalist denomination, (and I know that I speak the feelings of very many others,) solemnly PROTEST against the foregoing article as expressing the opinions of Universalists. Br. Whittemore well knows that Universalists generally never pray to Jesus Christ—that we never ascribe salvation to him but as an instrument in the hands of his God and our God—that we never consider him as the source and origin of any benefits received from or by him—and that, therefore, we never worship Jesus Christ in the strictest, highest, and most common meaning of the word. To us there is but one God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and we bow the knee in religious adoration to none other. To us the time has come when we ask the Saviour for nothing, but ask the Father in his name. To us there is a period coming when even the power and office which Jesus now holds from the Supreme, will be delivered back to its Fountain, and Jesus himself become subject to God, with us, that God—and God alone—may be all in all.

These are the views of all Universalists (with one or two solitary exceptions) with whom I have ever conversed on the subject. These are the views I have always found inculcated in our periodicals, sermons and publications—with a very few exceptions. And if Br. Whittemore intended to convey any other impression, (as, from the object of his article, and the contrast he endeavors to render apparent, I think was his intention,) he has failed to express the opinions of Universalists generally. And if so, does not candor and justice require him to correct the wrong impression?

In conclusion Br. W. asks whether Universalists have given sufficient attention to this subject, and dwelt on it as much as they ought to have done? I think they have, comparatively speaking, and in reference to other subjects. The unity of God—the impropriety of paying adoration to any being save the Supreme Jehovah—the acknowledgment of the Father of our Lord Jesus as the only supreme object of adoration, the only Giver of all good, has always been a prominent subject in our prayers and our sermons—in our conversations and publications—as much so as was consistent with Christian charity and forbearance towards the very few Universalists who verge towards Trinitarianism in their opinions—and as much as was proper, in consistency with our more paramount duty to promulgate right views of the character of God, and the objects of Christ's mission.

If I have erred, or failed to state clearly the views of Universalists generally, I am subject to, and trust I will receive the correction I tender to Br. Whittemore; though I have no convert to win as my excuse for straining a point, or using terms in any equivocal sense. But of one thing I am certain, I have expressed the dissent of several brethren from Br. Whittemore's statement, and have stated my own opinions and feelings on the subject, as free from disguise as I could. Hence, to the Trinitarian, who would understand the word worship, as it is commonly understood, and not as I believe it is often used in the Scriptures, I would reply to the question—"Do Universalists worship Christ?"—IN THE NEGATIVE.

A. B. G.

THOMAS PAINE'S OBJECTION TO THE TIME OF THE CRUCIFIXION OF CHRIST.

Mr. Paine makes the following remark—"Mark says, he was crucified at the third hour, (nine in the morning,) and John says it was the sixth hour, (twelve at noon)." In a note, he further remarks—"According to John, the sentence was not passed till about the sixth hour, (noon,) and, consequently, the execution could not be till the afternoon; but Mark says expressly, that he was crucified at the third hour, (nine in the morning,) chap. xv: 25; John, chap. xix: 14."

In these statements Mr. Paine has fallen into a very great error. He would have us understand that John declares the crucifixion to have taken place at "the sixth hour;" whereas John does not even hint at such a declaration. The two passages are as follows:—

MARK XV: 25.	JOHN XIX: 14.
"And it was the third hour, and they crucified him."	"And it was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour; and he (Pilate) saith unto the Jews, behold your king."

The difference of these two statements is very obvious. After Mark had described the crucifixion of Christ, he then said that it was "the third hour;" that is, it was the "third hour" when Christ was nailed to the cross. But when John spoke of "the sixth hour," it was not immediately in reference to the crucifixion, but to the fact of Pilate's saying to the Jews, "behold your king." And after Pilate had said this, Jesus had to be delivered to the soldiers, the distance between the judgment hall and the place of crucifixion had to be traversed, and all preparations made when there, before Christ was crucified.—Now, if we can show, that by "the third hour" Mark means our 9 o'clock, and by "the sixth hour" John means our six o'clock in the morning, it will be obvious, that it would take about three hours from the time Pilate said, "behold your king," to the time of the crucifixion, for the intermediate preparations just mentioned to be accomplished. In showing this, there are three circumstances to be specially considered.

1. What did Mark mean by the phrase "third hour?" The Jews divided the time between sunrise and sunset, into four watches; the principal hours of which were as we learn by John, "the third, the sixth, and the ninth." "The third corresponded to the ninth of our reckoning, the sixth to our twelfth, and the ninth to 3 o'clock in the afternoon." Bib. Archeology, p. 108; § 101. When the disciples spake with "new tongues" on the day of Pentecost, to the strangers who were in Jerusalem, some of those strangers mocked and said, "these men are full of new wine." Acts ii: 13. Peter, in his defence, said, "these are not drunken, as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day." Verse 15. The "third hour" here denotes our 9 o'clock. Hence, Peter simply intended to affirm, that the supposition of their being intoxicated with new wine, was not true, on account of its being so early in the day; as "the Jews rarely, if ever, ate or drank till after the hour of prayer," which was "the third hour." See Acts x: 30; also a note in Horne's Introduction, vol. 3, p. 161. Hence, it is evident, that Mark, by using the phrase "third hour," meant to declare that Christ was crucified at a time, which is equivalent to our 9 o'clock.

2. John affirms that "it was the preparation of the passover," and about "the sixth hour," when Pilate said to the Jews, "behold your king." What are we to understand by "the preparation of the passover?"

The passover was instituted to commemorate the protection of the Israelites when the angel of the Lord smote all the first born of the Egyptians, and also their deliverance from the servitude of their tyrants. See 12th chap. of Exodus, and Deut. xvi: 1. This feast was observed once a year. The lamb was sacrificed between the sixth and ninth hour, and was eaten in the evening. Our Saviour observed this passover the evening before he was crucified. By his directions, the disciples prepared the passover, and Christ partook of it with them, and gave it a new direction, by exhorting the disciples to afterwards observe it in remembrance of him. See Matt. 26 chap. and the parallel passages in Mark, Luke, and John. It appears that Christ observed this feast, for the last time, on the evening before the Jews did; for they did not observe it until after the crucifixion. Now there was a beautiful propriety in this circumstance. Christ partook of it before the Jews did, that he, as the paschal lamb to be sacrificed for the sins of the world, might be enduring the agonies of the cross, at the very period when the Jews were sacrificing the lamb to commemorate their salvation in and their deliverance from Egypt. Concerning the phrase "preparation of the passover," the following note is judicious:—"During the third hour, from eight to nine, their morning sacrifice was prepared, offered up, and laid on the altar precisely at nine o'clock; this interval they termed the preparation. (Paraskeue, John xix: 14, where 'the preparation of the passover' fixes the precise time, when our Saviour was before Pilate)."—Horne's Introduction, vol. 3, p. 161. Now, as John was a Jew, and well acquainted with the customs of his people, would he, even admitting him to be an impostor, engaged in writing a fiction, have represented Pilate as saying to the Jews, "behold your king," at the time of preparation, which he knew to be before nine o'clock, and in the same breath represent it to be at the Jewish "sixth hour," or twelve o'clock? Had he been the veriest impostor that ever lived, he would have carefully avoided so glaring a contradiction. Thus far, the time of the "preparation of the passover" countenances the declaration of Mark, that Christ was crucified at nine o'clock.

There is another consideration of no small moment. The Jews were forbidden to work on the day of the passover. Exodus xii: 16. The Jewish day commenced at about our six o'clock. See Dr. A. Clarke on Exo. xii: 6. Accordingly, we find that nearly the whole of the trial, as well as the crowning of Christ with thorns, the mocking and the scourging, took place "early," John xviii: 28; in fact, before "the sixth hour" spoken of by John, for it was not until after these events, that Pilate brought him forth and said, "behold your king." Now, as the Jews were forbidden to work on the day of the passover, and consequently would not have engaged in the trial after that day had fairly commenced; as the trial and nearly all the accompanying events, transpired very "early," is it not presumptive evidence, that by "the sixth hour" John intends a period earlier than the "third hour" at which Mark affirms Christ was crucified? This consideration will appear more powerful by viewing

3. The phrase "sixth hour." The Roman division of a day into hours, was different from that of the Jews.—The Roman civil day was like ours, and commenced at twelve at night, instead of six in the morning.

John's Gospel was written after the destruction of Jerusalem. Dr. Clarke remarks that it was most probably written about the year 86. It is very natural to suppose that the Roman method of computing time took the place of the Jewish, after the Jews were destroyed as a nation.

Mark wrote when the Jewish method was in full vogue, and hence his "third hour" was equivalent to our nine o'clock. While John, writing after the overthrow, in this instance, uses the Roman method, and hence his "sixth hour" is equivalent to our six o'clock. This view of the subject accords with John's mention of "the preparation of the passover;" accords with the fact, that the Jews would not labor on the passover-day but little if any after six o'clock; and it perfectly agrees with Mark" declaration, that Christ was crucified at 9 o'clock. For, it allows three hours for the Roman soldiers to prepare the cross, to travel from the judgment-hall to Calvary, and go through with the drama of the crucifixion.

But, even if we admit that Mark affirms that Christ was crucified at nine, and John affirms at twelve o'clock, does that prove that he was not crucified at all? Then does the declaration of Mr. Weems, that fifteen hundred, and of Mr. Goodrich that but one thousand British soldiers attacked Bunker Hill, prove that no such battle was fought—for, discrepancy in one case proves as much as in the other.

From these considerations, we deem Mr. Paine's objection to be without foundation and of no worth. And it casts not even a feeble obstacle in the path of that divine revelation which brings life and immortality to light.

G. W. M.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS....NO. XII.

In delivering the Jews from the hands of the Egyptians, a series of miracles were performed to induce Pharaoh to dismiss them. Among the rest, was one described in the following language—"And the Lord said unto Moses, stretch out thy hand over the land of Egypt for the locusts, that they may come up upon the land of Egypt, and eat every herb of the land, even all that the hail hath left." Exo. x: 12.

We are informed that Moses did stretch out his hand, and the locusts came up so numerously with the "east wind," that the land was darkened and every green thing was destroyed.

To persons who had not informed themselves on this subject, the numbers in which locusts will gather in a swarm and the rapidity with which they will consume every green thing, is perfectly incredible. The worst kind of locust, is the brown locust, one of which I saw preserved several years since. It is about three inches in length, with four strong wings. Their ravages are so great, that the inhabitants of eastern nations dread their appearance, and anticipate a famine, whenever they spread over the land. They fly in such numbers, that Mr. Forbes, when he was in India, saw a flock of locusts which he calculated was one mile in length, and half a mile in breadth. At a distance, he observes, they appeared like a heavy cloud rising; but when they flew over him, they were so thick as to obscure the rays of the sun. When they alight, every green thing is entirely stripped in a short time, and left as desolate as Winter. About 123 years before Christ, the Africans were scourged with immense swarms of locusts, which consumed the leaves of the trees and every plant of the field. After a period of time, a high wind swept them into the sea, where their bodies floated to the shores in immense numbers, so that they affected the air in such a manner, that a pestilence arose, which swept away thousands of people. Volney and Shaw, when they were travelling in eastern nations, both saw flocks of locusts, and testify to the desolation which they spread, in whatever point they proceed. And we have accounts, that in all ages of the world, the locusts have appeared at different periods, and completely swept every vegetable production from the fields, as though a fire had passed over them. How great then must have been the consternation of the Egyptians, when they saw the terrible locusts appear in their land, to deprive it of every green thing.

In the 3d chap. of Matt., where an account is given of John the Baptist, it is said, that "his meat was locusts and wild honey." The locuts here mentioned, are undoubtedly the same as we have described. The Arabs use them in great numbers for food. They take them, partially roast them, and then dry them; when they are laid away for use, as occasion may require. This then was one article of the temperate food of the excellent prophet, who was a forerunner of Christ, the "Saviour of the world;"—while the remarks which we have made concerning the locusts, will serve to explain every instance in which the Scriptures refer to them.

G. W. M.

CHARITY.

There is probably not a Christian in the world but wishes to be a charitable person. It is the most desirable and excellent quality that can be cultivated in the heart of erring man. There is no one who has arrived to the age of manhood, but what has seen the time when the friendly smile of charity or love, was like balm to his sin wounded spirit. Hence we see the propriety of placing charity at the head of all the Christian virtues. We have all erred, and hence are all the subjects of that charity which "suffereth long," and which "thinketh no evil." Paul says, "though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." Charity, then, is an indispensable requisite, among the virtues which constitute the Christian character. Without it, all our boasting of piety, is but "sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." There is one trait about this qualification, to which I wish to direct the attention of the reader. "Charity seeketh not her own." The Christian is not satisfied with his or her own happiness, so long as there are those around them who are exposed to misery. I say, just so long as there is sin and misery, charity will prompt its possessor to strive for the amelioration of the sinner's condition. It will seek his good. Thus, boasting professors and [illegible] of our good Partialist brethren proves to be none. They [illegible] ty, and labor, and preach, and pray and [illegible] the wicked, by all the inducements which they are experimentally acquainted with, to forsake the evil of their ways, and turn to the Lord by righteousness. Now, if they should happen to find, when they get to heaven, that some one for whom they have wept and prayed so often, has been doomed to endless perdition, which will they do, apostatize from charity, or go on an errand of mercy to the miserable abode of the lost one? Will some one answer me?

Again, although charity "rejoiceth not in iniquity," yet the same author says, it "rejoiceth in the truth."—Whatever may be the truths of the Gospel, then, they are cause for rejoicing to the charitable man. This furnishes us with an unexceptionable rule, by which to determine whether our faith is true or false. If we possess Christian charity, and the doctrines which we believe, cause us to rejoice, then we may know, as certainly as we know that Paul spake the truth, that these doctrines are true. But if, on the contrary they give us pain—nay, we need not take an extreme—if they do not give us pleasure, we may know they are false. Now let us test our theories by this rule. Universalists believe that the inevitable consequence of sin is pain. But they believe that it will finally result in the sinner's good. Hence charity rejoiceth in it. But our Partialist brethren believe that the sinner who dies such, will experience eternal misery. Do they rejoice in view of this doctrine? If they do, they have not charity, and consequently are not Christians, for charity seeketh not her own. But they do not rejoice in it—they can not. The unavoidable conclusion then, is, that their doctrine is not the truth; for charity rejoiceth in the truth, but it can not rejoice in the doctrine of endless misery.

A. R. B.

NOTICE.

I believe, but am not certain, that a subscriber paid me $3 for the Advocate, at noon on the first day of the Ontario Association. If so, I gave him a receipt. His name I have lost. If that subscriber will drop a line to the Advocate office, the publishers will pay the postage, and give him credit. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

UNIVERSALISM IN AFFLICTION.

Extract from a letter from a bereaved mother.

BROTHER B.—Death has entered our habitation and taken from us our beloved child, our dear little G. She was taken on Sunday, and the next Saturday, at two o'clock in the morning, she was no more. She was spared but a little while to bless and comfort us, when God saw fit to take her. It was his will that she should go; therefore we ought not to complain or murmur. Yet we can not but deplore her loss, and feel that it can never be made up to us in this world. We shall go to her but she shall not come back to us. What a comfort, what a consolation, to believe that we shall all meet in heaven—that we shall there rejoin our babe, never more to be separated! But for this belief, my heart would sink under this deep affliction. J., [her husband,] is yet very feeble. He feels our loss very deeply, though he has borne it as well as I expected. Respectfully yours,

A. B.

TO OUR PATRONS WHO ARE YET INDEBTED TO US.

Brethren—we need our dues—we have heavy payments to meet next month, besides our current expenses, and what we now receive is not sufficient to pay our current expenses alone! Surely if you knew our wants—if you realized our necessities, you could not be as indifferent to them, as many of you appear to be, judging by your delay in sending us the needful. Do—every one of you that is able—do send us speedily what is our due. We are ashamed to dun thus, but what else can we do to reach you, and stir you up to your duty to us?

G. and H.

ONE MORE REQUEST.

It seems to be almost useless for me to remind my many delinquent debtors of their uncancelled obligations to me, which are now of many years standing, and of the necessity of having them immediately settled. I am now very soon to start for the far South, to spend the Winter for the benefit of my health; and as my voyage will be long and expensive, I shall need what has long been my due to meet those necessary expenses. Shall this not be given? I hope not. I have many accounts that must be left for legal adjudication if not paid immediately. Will my delinquent debtors remember this, and act accordingly, without further delay. D. SKINNER.

Utica, October 24, 1838.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. E. E. GUILD, in the school-house near Peter Hansen's in Meridith, at 10 o'clock, and at Colliersville, 3 o'clock, P. M.—Br. M. B. SMITH, at Salisbury—Br. MCADAM, in Clinton.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in November, by Br. DELONG, will supply for Br. C. S. Brown at Upper Lisle—Br. C. S. BROWN, at Lebanon—Br. E. E. GUILD, at Richmondville at 1 o'clock, and at Lawyersville in the evening—Dr. CLOWES, in Marshall—Br. MCADAM, in Clinton.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in November by Br. E. E. GUILD, at Jacksonboro', at 10 o'clock, and at the Academy at Worcester at 3 o'clock.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in November, by Br. E. E. Guild, at the Lutheran church in South Worcester, at 1 o'clock, and at the Quaker meeting-house in Harpersfield, in the evening.

Br. E. E. GUILD, will preach in November as follows: Thursday evening, 8th, in the stone school-house between Hobart and Harpersfield—Monday evening 12th, in the red school-house at Worcester Centre—Tuesday evening, 13th, in the school-house near Br. Brown's in Decator. ☞ Union please copy Br. Guild's notices.

N. B. The subscriber defers his intended visit to Harpersfield, from the first, to the third Sunday in November.

J. G. MCADAM.

The dedication of the Universalist meeting-house, recently erected in South Hartford, Washington county, will take place on Thursday, November 8th, at 10 A M. Sermons will be by Br. B. Hyde.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper

M A C, Fredericktown, (O,) for C A—Rev G W M, Auburn, for W H, G C, L C, W P, J E Jr, I F C, S R, J D H, G N, E W C, C S, S L and N B—P M, McLean, for W S C—R F, Schenectada, for H H—D R A, South Shaftsbury, (Vt) for D E, R F, G R D and R F—P M, Honeyoe, for A A A—P M, Hall's Corners—R C, Albion, for self, I C H, J H, C J and O W—P M, Laporte (O) for J W—E B V, Victor—W B W, for Z N E, Canton—B C, West Avon, for H C

POETRY

[From the Niles Intelligencer]

LINES

On the death of CHARLES A. MORTON, of St. Joseph, Mich.

Light be the sod that covers thee,
Youth of the noble brow—
Warm as the vows of lovers be,
The grief that mourns thee now—
Fresh as the mem'ry of thy worth,
Be the flow'rs o'er thy head—
Deeper than joy that hail'd thy birth,
The sorrow for thee, dead—
For there be none among us now,
Like thee, youth of the noble brow.

O'er his grave let the Jasmine grow,
Genius the Lupine rear,
And bid the blushing Moss-rose grow—
They tell of virtues dear,
"Few hearts like his with virtue warmed,"
Few to truth so inclined—
"Few heads with knowledge so informed,"
And few his peers we'll find—
O'er thy temples truth's wreath we'll bind,
Youth of the pure and noble mind.

Oh had the earth no joy for thee!
A mother's love no spell!—
How could'st thou from that fond breast flee!
From all that lov'd thee well!—
And hide thee in the cold, cold grave!
O'er thee at eventide,
Kindred dear, mourn they could not save—
And many a friend beside,
Felt Pity's tear from its fountain flow
For MORTON in thy dark house low.

Niles, 1838.

[From the Olive Branch.]

REV. T. F. NORRIS—SIR: If this extract from a letter (addressed by a gentleman of this city to his wife) merits a place in the Olive Branch, it is at your service. Yours, etc. A SUBSCRIBER.

It is a curious reflection that we can not remain stationary any considerable time. We are either learning something, or forgetting some thing we have learnt.—We are either accumulating something, or spending something that we have accumulated. We are alternately receiving and bestowing favors; influencing others, and being influenced by others. This last needs some consideration. I believe that half the errors committed at the present day, of which we are sensible, are those encouraged, approved and sanctioned by custom, by fashion, or by some popular sect or denomination.—But can it be any satisfaction to us, when we are sensible of an error, to say—"it is customary"—or, "it is fashionable"—or, "it is approved by a respectable individual, or popular denomination?" Certainly not!—Then my dear C———, as for you and I, whatever our Bible tells us is right, and whatever we feel and know in our consciences to be right, that let us fearlessly do, and act up to, the custom, fashion, and the opinion of any individual or denomination to the contrary notwithstanding. Let us judge all the trees by their fruits; and let not a popular title, or a great name, or great numbers, by which any sentiment or measure may be held up or propagated, bear more weight with us, if we believe it to be erroneous, than if it was preached up by a person as humble and as lowly as our Saviour was upon this earth, who was supported only by a few poor fishermen. Let us be charitable to all—but not support nor aid any denomination in any measures beyond what in our judgment are right. Let us exclude none on account of their sentiments—there is no religion in this. If any exclude and denounce us on this ground, claiming to themselves infallibility and the right of judgment; on our part, instead of asserting and approving what the Bible disapproves, which says—"Who art thou that setteth thyself up to judge another"—and "Judge not that ye be not judged," let us treat them with merited indifference, for acting from a spirit so contrary to every principle of Christianity. I am aware how hard this duty is in some situations. Even as good a man as St. Peter, who told his Master, that if all others denied him he would not, yet, when he found himself in a small minority, he did deny him. Some persons consider St. Peter's peculiar situation at the time, a sufficient excuse for his conduct. For my part, I think it was inconsistent, and by no means commendable. Such is the power and influence of popular opinion, at the present day, in religion and politics, (which, by the bye, are so blended together in some places, that it is difficult to separate them;) that the situations and circumstances of many persons are not much pleasanter than St. Peter's were—and we sometimes see them "go out and weep" as "bitterly."

Do not infer from what I have said, that I think it our duty to contend, and oppose those who take the responsibility of judging and excluding us because we can not, without a sacrifice of principle, adopt their sentiments and measures—I do not! I think it our duty not to aid nor support them. And if they press upon us, to manifest and act our sentiments independently. In short, let us be prudent and wise as possible; consistent without being superstitious; and wherever, and whenever it is necessary and proper to act at all, let us act independently—agreeably to the dictates of conscience.

POETRY.

A smile, a tear, a glory, a longing after the things of eternity! It lives in all created existence, in man and every object that surrounds him. There is poetry in the gentle influence of love and affection, in the quiet brooding of his soul over the memory of early years, and in the thoughts of that glory that chains our spirits to the gates of paradise. There is poetry, too, in the harmonies of nature. It glitters in the wave, the rainbow, the lightning and star; its cadence is heard in the thunder and the cataract, its softer tones go sweetly up from the thousand-voiced harp of the wind, the rivulet, and forest, and the cloud and sky go floating over us, to the music of its melodies. There's not a moonlight ray that comes down upon the stream or hill, not a breeze falling from its blue air, thrown to the birds of the Summer valleys, or sounding through the midnight rains, its mournful dirge of the perishing flowers of Spring, not a cloud bathing itself like an angel vision in the rose bushes of Autumn twilight, nor a rock glowing in the star-light, as if dreaming of the Eden-land,—but is full of the beautiful influence of poetry. It is the soul of being. The earth and heaven are quickened by its spirit; and the great deep in tempest and in calm, are but its accents and mysterious workings.—Prentice.

BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATION.

The following beautiful illustration of the existence of God, is extracted from Mr. Addison's work concerning Damascus and Palmyra. G. W. M.

"The Musselman writers speak of an ignorant Arab, who being asked how he knew any thing about the existence of God, replied—Just as I know by the tracks in the sand whether a man or beast has past there; so, when I survey the heaven with its bright stars, and earth with its productions, do I feel the existence and power of God."

The demoralizing practice of betting on elections, is fast gaining ground in this country. The New-York Express says: "One of the most melancholy signs of the times that we have seen, is the fact, that over HALF A MILLION OF DOLLARS are staked in bets in Pennsylvania, on the result of the election. We trust in God the day is coming when it will be a State's Prison offence to bet on the result of an election. It is odious, wicked gambling, ten thousand times more fearful to the morals of community than all the Roulette Tables or Gambling Hells in Paris, or London."

The following extraordinary Anagram, has recently been discovered in Pilate's famous question, St. John, chap. xviii: verse 38, which in the Latin vulgate stands thus:—"Quid est veritas?"—What is truth? A simple transposition of the letters, gives the following answer: "Est vir qui adest!" The man who stands before you!

"Experience teaches that the sword, the faggot, exile, and proscription, are better calculated to irritate than to heal a disease which, having its source in the mind, can not be relieved by remedies that act only on the body. The most efficacious means are sound doctrines and repeated instructions, which make a ready impression, when inculcated with mildness. Every thing else bows to the sovereign authority of the laws; but religion alone is not to be commanded."

A salute was fired at Wheeling, Va., on the appearance of the late rain there, after the long drought which had suspended the navigation of the Ohio.

The Buffalonian says—"Our jail must be in a sinking condition. It is always more or less full, though people are constantly bailing out."

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 15th inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Rev. EDWIN H. CHAPIN, Corresponding Editor of this paper, and pastor of the First Independent Church of Christ, in Richmond, Va., to Miss HANNAH NEWLAND, of this city.

In this city, on the 18th inst., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. THOMAS WHITE, of Deerfield, to Miss HESTER JANE COLE, of this city.

In North Bloomfield, August 19th, by Rev. J. Chase, Mr. RICHARD M. JOHNSON, to Miss RACHEL TREED, (name not legible,) all of Mendon.

In Deposit, on the 26th ult., by Rev. Mr. Richardson, Mr. JOHN B. GERRARD, of this city, to Miss ANTOINETTE, daughter of the late Silas Crandall, of the former place.

In Oxford, September 20th, by Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Mr. CHARLES MCNEAL, to Miss JANE DENISON, both of Oxford.

At the residence of Mr. Sylvester Doolittle, Oswego, September 25th, by Rev. Mr. Condit, Mr. AMASA COLBURN, to Miss ANN HEARTLEY, both of this city.

In Barre, Mass., on the evening of the 27th ult., by Rev. S. Thompson, (Unitarian,) Rev. HARVEY BOUGHTON, of Scipio, N. Y., to Miss ALICE P. WOODBURY, daughter of Capt. Hubbard Woodbury, of the former place.

In Auburn, Cayuga county, September 2d, by Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Mr. WM. VAN CAMP, of Skeneateles, to Miss HENRIETTA D. WATERS, of Elbridge.

In Aurelius, September 20th, by the same, Mr. DAVID FORSHEE, Jr., to Miss MARY ANN JENKS.

In Stark, Herkimer county, September 23d, by Rev. J. D. Hicks, Mr JAMES LATHROP, to Miss MARY SIVER, both of Stark.

Also, in Fort Plain, October 14th, by the same, Mr. ELISHA W. WILLIAMS, of Dudley, Mass., to Miss LOUISA M. DAVIS, of St. Johnsville, Montgomery county, N. Y.

DEATHS.

In Bennington, Vt., on the 8th of September, GERTRUDE, only child of Rev. Jesse and Adeka Bushnell, aged 2 years and 8 days; after an illness of one week.

The circumstances of this obituary are unusually afflictive. Br. Bushnell, in the prime of life and usefulness, with the most ardent and unanimous attachment of a large society, and in the morning of a most happy domestic union, was prostrated by an almost total nervous debility. He has lain for two years and a half, a great portion of the time, helpless, speechless and sightless.—Gertrude bore a strong resemblance to her father, and both he and sister Bushnell doated on her with an extravagance of affection which the circumstances naturally elicited. Yet there is consolation. "Clouds and darkness are round about him," yet, "righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne."

L. C. B.

In St. Josephs, Mich., August 23d, CHARLES A. MORTON, eldest son of Eleazer Morton, Esq., aged 28 years, (and of the firm of Britain, Sanger and Co., forwarding merchants.) His death is deeply lamented by all who knew him.

In Westfield, on the 5th inst., of consumption, Mrs. SALLY, wife of Lory Harrington, in the 34th year of her age. Mrs. H. was an amiable woman, beloved and esteemed by all who knew her. She died in the full assurance that she should live again in a purer world.—Funeral on the 7th. Discourse by the writer.

T. C. E.

In Oxford, on the 26th ult., JOHN FREDERICK, an interesting son of the Hon. Harry and Mary Balcom, aged 5 months. Funeral on the 27th. Sermon on the following Sunday, from Ps. viii: 4, by J. T. GOODRICH.

In McDonough, September 21st, Mrs. P. JACOBS, aged 62 years. She bore a lingering illness with the resignation of a Christian, and was supported by the belief that she should meet all mankind on the blissful plains of immortality and eternal life. Funeral on the 23d, and a discourse by W. H. G.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1838. NUMBER 44.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 35.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

Utica, September 26, 1838.

DEAR SIR—Your letters 30 and 32 are now before me. In No. 30, you say my "grand proposition, that 'eternal life (meaning thereby holiness and happiness) shall be the ultimate destiny of all mankind,' is not a single, but a compound proposition." With all due deference to your superior learning and skill, I must take the liberty of dissenting from this statement. The proposition, in my opinion, is perfectly simple. In order to avoid ambiguity, the parenthesis is thrown in explaining the sense in which the phrase "eternal life" is meant to be used in the predicate of the proposition. But, Sir, does an explanation of the terms of a proposition change a simple into a compound proposition? Your laws of logic must be peculiar to yourself if you affirm it.

2. After cutting up and dividing my simple proposition to your liking, you next accuse me and Universalists generally, of stupidity in not being aware that we have several propositions to prove, in order to make out the simple one of universal salvation, and of quoting texts to prove it that have no bearing on either predicate which you say I am to prove. Now, Sir, waiving all further dispute about simple and compound propositions, and the several different predicates which you say I must prove, I will here simply state, that, if I prove the final salvation of all mankind, in a Gospel sense, I thereby prove their final holiness and happiness; for holiness and happiness are necessarily implied in the Gospel sense of salvation. If I prove the ultimate happiness of all, it is proof of the salvation of all, and the holiness of all; for we both agree that holiness is essential to true happiness; and I desire no other salvation but holiness and happiness. And if I prove the holiness of all, no enlightened Christian will ask further evidence of happiness or salvation; for holiness and happiness are inseparably united. The proof therefore of either of your subdivided predicates is sufficient for the whole.

3. But you say my "thus saith the Lord," is but the "thus saith of Mr. Skinner." Your proof of it is that I quoted the text where God says, "all souls are mine," and thence showed that God "could not suffer his property to be irrecoverably lost." You then artfully ask, "are not all sheep and cattle the Lord's? Does this prove their final salvation?" Why did you, Sir, change the subject of the predicate? Why not ask, according to the tenor of my position, Will God suffer all sheep and cattle to be irrecoverably lost? My answer then, is, No, he will not suffer them to be irrecoverably lost in the sense you use the word lost, i. e. to signify endless misery. But further, the text I quoted says, "all souls [not mere brutes] are mine." Now if you will prove that all sheep and cattle have immortal souls, I will take the ground of their salvation against your necessary inference from your question, that they will suffer endless damnation!

4. You admit paragraph 5, my proof that all, without exception, are given to Christ: but you contend that this is no proof of the ultimate holiness and happiness of all. Had you forgotten, Sir, that in the same paragraph, and directly connected with that proof, I also proved that all who were given to Christ should have "eternal life," should be drawn to him, and should so come to him as "not to be cast out?" Your affected obtuseness here in neither seeing nor noticing the most positive proof, is only equalled by your extraordinary acumen in your sixth paragraph, where you discover and divulge the momentous fact that all, all men, every man, the world, and the whole world, don't mean all men, but signify far less than they express!

5. Now my rule for understanding all these terms of universality, is this: When there is nothing in the text, the context, or nature of the subject, which necessarily limits their meaning to less than the whole, the terms are used in their most extensive and unlimited, because their most obvious and natural sense: but when the text, context, or nature of the subject, forbids this, they are of necessity to be understood in a restricted sense.—Can you object to this, or find a better rule?—Now in every text you adduce, where these terms occur, in the last part of your 5th and in your 6th paragraphs, there is something in the text, context, or subject which necessarily restricts the meaning to less than all men. But when we read that God created all, is the Father of all, wills and purposes the salvation of all, is the Saviour of all, that Christ died for all, gave himself a ransom for all, tasted death for every man, is a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, taketh away the sin of the world, is the Saviour of the world, will draw all men unto him, etc., etc., etc., there is nothing in text, context, or subject, that forbids, but every thing requires, that the terms should be understood in their broadest and most unlimited sense. And, Sir, dare you risk your reputation, either as a scholar or a biblical critic, by denying it?

6. You pass over my 23d, 25th, 27th, and 29th, letters, where the strongest and most incontestable proof of the final salvation of all men is adduced, drawn from the attributes of God, the reason and nature of things, the character, advent, teachings and labors of Christ, and scores upon scores of direct and unequivocal scriptures, without an effort to set aside or refute that proof, or at most but a mere feint at it. I confess I should not know how even to express the sentiment of universal salvation, if that evidence does not clearly express and fully prove it. Yet you seem disposed to let the whole pass unrefuted and almost unnoticed! and for want of other business, attempt to prove the negative of the proposition!! Beware, Sir, lest your readers embrace this "awful heresy" for want of an effort on your part to refute it. Now, if the Bible clearly prove the final salvation of all men, it certainly can not prove the negative of this doctrine, if it be divine. And so far as any thing yet appears from your pen on the subject, it is fairly presumable the negative can not be proved. And of all the attempts at proof of the negative which I have seen for years from any respectable source, yours is the weakest.

7. Of the six examples you give to prove that "the language and style of the Bible are at war with Universalism," five are taken from the Apocalypse! a book, the very authority of which, many eminent biblical critics call in question, and many more, admitting its authority, confess their ignorance of its meaning, especially of its high wrought metaphors and figures. Dr. A. Clarke says of it, "I do not understand it, and—I dare not indulge in conjectures."—"I repeat it, I do not understand the book; and I am satisfied that not one who has written on the subject knows any thing more of it than myself." But though I admit its divine authority, I think, with the most eminent critics, that it ought not, on account of its highly figurative style, and its undetermined application, to be relied on, of itself alone, as sufficient to establish the truth of any important doctrine, especially so grave and awful a doctrine as that of endless wo. I am also satisfied that, rightly interpreted, it furnishes no evidence of any such doctrine, nor in the least militates against the salvation of all men.

8. To me the internal evidence is abundantly satisfactory, that the Apocalypse was written prior to the overthrow of Jerusalem and the abrogation of the Jewish polity; the signs, wonders and commotions in the heavens and earth, relate to the revolutions and changes of the political and religious world; the New-Jerusalem, the heavenly city, denotes the Gospel covenant, or Christian economy, which was fully established at the cessation of the old dispensation, and succeeded it at that time; ancient Jerusalem being most probably the Babylon of the Apocalypse. To the New-Jerusalem the faithful followers of Jesus were admitted, were saved from the calamities that fell on his enemies, walked in the light of it, had their names written in the Lamb's book of life, did his commandments, had right to the tree of life, and entered through the gates into the city; while dogs and sorcerers and the unclean that had not these qualifications, but were unjust still, [not to all eternity, as you say,] were excluded therefrom, and on them fell the awful judgments described in the book. But not a syllable is hinted about their endless exclusion from immortal bliss. So far from the judgment mentioned Rev. xxii: 11, being the "final judgment," as you term it, the context clearly shows that it was then, (nearly 1800 years ago,) about to take place, and history proves that it did. The verse before it says "the time is at hand," and the verse after it says, "and behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me," etc.

9. According to your definition of the word still, i. e. forever, in the text, "he that is unjust, let him be unjust still," the following text must read thus: "It pleased Silas to abide there forever." "Silas and Timothy abode there forever." Acts xv: 34; and xvii: 14. "I besought thee to abide forever at Ephesus." 1 Tim. i: 3. It does not follow, because some had not at that time their names written in the Lamb's book of life, that therefore they never would be there written: for we read that "they shall obtain mercy that had not obtained mercy," "she shall be called beloved that was not beloved," and "it shall come to pass that where it was said, ye are not my people, there shall they be called the children of the living God."

10. Your 6th example is "the elect of God."—Wonderful evidence this! Pray, Sir, will you be so good as to take the Calvinistic counterpart of election, viz., the eternal reprobation of some men and angels to endless wo? I admit and believe in election. Christ is called the elect precious, and in the sense he was elected, the whole human family are non-elect. The twelve apostles were elect; and in that sense all other men were non-elect. The seventy disciples were elect, and all others non-elect in that sense. But are the elect chosen for their own exclusive benefit? or for the good of the non-elect? For what are the officers of churches chosen? For what are city, town, county, state, and national officers elected? Your answer will correctly state the object of election.

11. Because Dr. Geo. Campbell could see "no meaning at all" in the expression, "restitution of all things," Acts iii: 21, you are willing to believe there is none. But if either he or you could, like Abraham, lay hold on the exceeding great and precious promises of God, and believe that he who had promised was able also to perform, you would see meaning, beauty, sublimity and glory in the text. May the Lord open your eyes to see them in all their loveliness. You call on me to produce one text proving my sentiment. I have given you many scores, not one of which you have shown or can show to be irrelevant or wanting in evidence. Try a few of them, friend, and see. For example, try Psa. xxii: 27; cxlv: 9; or Isa. xlv: 22-24; or 1 Cor. xv: 22; or Philip. ii: 10. 11; or 1 Tim. iv: 4. When you have disposed of these I will name as many more as you wish.

12. You occupy several pages in belaboring your brother Destructionists. This, (though my friends are perfectly at a loss to know why you should introduce this utterly irrelevant subject,) I conclude is for the especial edification and correction of your Br. Shepard of the Auburn "Primitive Christian;" who, although a true yoke-fellow with you in "restoring the Primitive doctrine," the "ancient order of things," in the church, has schismatically gone over to the defence of Destructionism or annihilation, in a set controversy with Mr. Montgomery. What the "true doctrine" will be when you and he get it restored, doth not yet appear. It will doubtless be very harmonious!—I have no objections to your arguments on this subject, except so far as you attempt to make them bear against the doctrine of the restitution; and then your labor is like "kicking against the pricks." The reason why I was glad you did not take the ground of the Destructionist, was, that should this prevail to any considerable extent, it would be likely to hold out against the true doctrine of the restitution much longer than that of endless misery can; for the former is less revolting to reason, humanity, justice, and benevolence; and the latter is now on its last legs. But both are equally opposed to truth and the general voice of revelation; and both consequently must soon go down to the "tomb of the capulets."

13. You say my reference to the Christian Fathers as having been Universalists "is all a hoax;" and you say, "give us the primitive apostles," etc., Sir, I have given you, 1st. The ancient patriarchs and prophets, and the words of God spoken through them; 2d. The character and express teachings of Christ himself; 3d. The positive and unequivocal testimony of the apostles; and lastly the fact that the most eminent of the Christian Fathers were believers and teachers of the restitution. Is not this sufficient? What would you have more? There is no "hoax" about it. But you say, "the truly primitive fathers speak of eternal or everlasting punishment." All this Sir, I very well know; and I know also (and can you be ignorant of the fact?) that those very Fathers believed and strenuously maintained the final salvation of all men, thereby clearly showing that everlasting, [age-lasting] punishment was not used by them to signify endless misery. How will you account for the fact? In reply to your very kind admonition in the close of your 30th letter, I will only say, "Physician, heal thyself."

14. I now come to your 32d letter, or what should be such. On perusing the first three paragraphs, I fell into a sort of reverie. I imagined myself transported to Bethany, Va., seated in a room adjoining your study. There was a small aperture looking directly into your apartment, where, unseen, I could observe your every movement. You sat before a large mirror, in which you could see yourself from head to foot. After surveying yourself for some time with great complacency, and even with extatic delight, you burst forth in the following soliloquy:—"I am Alexander Campbell, the Great. I am 'a man, a full grown man,' the pink of a gentleman, the prince of philosophers, the generalissimo of theological combatants, the leader and founder of a new sect, (though I don't exactly dare call it such,) the Pope of my people, (or should be, were it not for Dr. Thomas and Br. Shepard.) 'I have been too long before the public—have had too many controversies,' to dread any thing, or even the doing or saying any thing that is vulgar. I have killed the giant of Atheism, divided the Baptist churches, out-bishoped the Bishop of Rome, that I might enjoy the papal See quietly myself, 'prostrated the whole citadel of Universalism,' (though it be 'the weakest of all causes,' and no gentleman ever advocated it,) and more than all, and above all, I understand all about Hebrew, Greek, and Latin—even more—I understand the King's English! I have"——

15. Here you were interrupted by the arrival of a messenger bringing in my letter No. 31. Your appearance, and the effect of the letter on you, can not be better described than in the following language of Milton:—

"——— Distempered, discontented thoughts,
Vain hopes, vain aims, inordinate desires,
Blown up with high conceits, engendering pride.
Him thus intent, Ithuriel with his spear
Touch'd lightly; for no falsehood can endure
Touch of celestial temper, but returns
Of force to its own likeness: up he starts,
Discovered and surprized. As when a spark
Lights on a heap of nitrous powder, laid
Fit for the tun some magazine to store,
Against a rumor'd war, the smutty grain,
With sudden flame diffused, inflames the air;
So started up in his own shape the fiend."

16. The faithful exposure that letter contained of the verbiage of your pedantry, the gasconade of your learning, the sophistry of your reasoning, and the insulting and personal abuse of your style, was too much even for your good temper to endure. You actually exploded before my eyes, quicker than one could say Hebrew, Greek, and Latin—the vision vanished, and I found myself composedly seated at my table to notice further the contents of your extraordinary letter.

17. Seriously, Mr. Campbell, I do exceedingly regret, for your sake and the general reputation of this discussion, the low and vulgar style, and the vaunting, and bitter, and undignified spirit of the letter before me. When this controversy began, I hoped it might, throughout, be so conducted as to secure the respect for both parties, of all who should read it, especially of the higher classes, the literary, the critical, the theological, the serious, and the candidly judging reader. But, Sir, how would you feel to have your Letter 32, now before me, read publicly before all the professors in our colleges, and grave theological and literary writers and critics in America? If, Sir, you could feel no shame for yourself, I should fain blush for you. But I waste time in saying more to you on this subject.

18. As to argument, your letter contains none against either of my propositions, or any position I have taken in this discussion. You complain, paragraph 4. of my publishing the two notes from your Appendix to your version of the New Testament, in a place by themselves in our paper, and ask why I did not quote them all into my letter! Why should I quote them all into my letter, to occupy my space thereby? It was unnecessary. I gave them entire by themselves, that our readers might all see them, and I asked you twice to do the same in your Harbinger, that your readers might all see them too. Have you done it? Will you do it? If not, what will your readers think? Publish them, Sir—publish them entire, either in your letters or elsewhere, as you please, so all may see them. I will guarantee that all Universalist papers that copy this discussion, shall copy them. It is in vain for you to pretend that they do not contradict the positions you have taken in this discussion. If the "radical idea" of aion, as your note of definition says, "is indefinite duration," by what process can you show that when applied to punishment, it is necessarily definite, and must signify absolutely endless duration? Who is in "perplexity," Sir, on this subject—you or I?

19. From your 5th to the end of your 12th paragraph, there is not a sentence relating to the subject or proposition under discussion. It is all made up of false attributions to me of doctrines I never held, and positions I never assumed. God knows, and you know, and I know, and all our readers know, that I have never argued nor assumed the doctrines of purgatory that you charge me with—nor that hell expiates sin—that punishment sanctifies the sinner, or supersedes the necessity of salvation by Christ—that men will stop sinning when God begins punishing—that they become holy the moment they enter purgatory, etc., etc., etc.—though you have attempted fixing these charges upon me by CAPITALISING YOUR OWN ACCUSATIONS!!! Quote, if you can, a single sentence or word of mine, that authorises any of these charges. The truth is, you are hard run, and know not what to do. I will tell you what you ought to do—you should either give up the controversy, or fairly meet my arguments, rather than spend your time in conjuring up false charges—making men of straw, and then exhibiting your adroitness in tearing them to pieces. I have amply proved, from Scripture, the final holiness and happiness of all men. You make no attempt to refute it.

20. It is true, I have informed you that I believe (though I have not argued it in this discussion, for it was unnecessary) that punishment will in some instances, extend beyond the present state. You insist that it shall be called purgatory! Why not call it what I call it—punishment? You next insist I shall tell you its location, duration, termination, etc., etc. The subject, Sir, is not embraced in either of our propositions; and if it were, I am under no more obligation to tell you these particulars, than you are to tell me exactly how many and what proportion of mankind will be finally saved, what portion damned, when the last soul shall enter heaven, whether your God and your devil shall harmoniously unite in endlessly tormenting the damned, and whether the ceaseless groans of the latter are to constitute the principal music to gratify your delighted ears in heaven. Will you explain all these particulars?

21. If punishment extend beyond the present state, I know not that it will be different in character, design, or tendency, from present punishment. The same benevolent God presides over all worlds, all states, and all beings. I do not profess to be "wise above what is written." It is not for me "to know the times and seasons which the Father hath put in his own power." His "words shall be fulfilled in their season." "In the dispensation of the fulness of times God will gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him." What particular period or periods may be meant by this phraseology, I know not. I am content to believe most firmly, that when that time arrives, all shall be new creatures in Christ, sin and misery and death shall cease, and "God shall be all in all."

22. In your 13th paragraph, you again unblushingly advocate the serpent's doctrine, "Ye shall not surely die," and recede from, and now oppose what you once undertook to sustain, viz., that God "will by no means clear the guilty," but "will render to every man according to his deeds." You say truly that I maintain, and that the position is the true result of my system, that "God does and will punish every sinner according to the full demerit of his crimes, and there is no escape." I thank you, Sir, for once fairly quoting my words and representing truly my sentiments. I hope you will not again charge the serpent's doctrine upon me; but ponder seriously on its just application to yourself. But you ask, if all are to be punished according to the full demerits of their crimes, "then where is the mercy of God? Why talk of mercy?" I answer in the language of David, Ps. lxii: 12, "Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy: for thou renderest to every man according to his works." But you appear strangely ignorant of Universalism, or the Bible doctrine of punishment and forgiveness, or remission of sins, in supposing that these are inconsistent with each other. For your special benefit, then, permit me to inform you, that the Bible does not in one single instance speak of the punishment of sin being forgiven. It speaks often of the pardon, remission, and forgiveness of sin, but never of the forgiveness of punishment.

23. To forgive, (Greek aphemi,) signifies "to send away, dismiss, remit, send forth, divorce, put away," etc. When sin, therefore, is forgiven, it is put away, removed. Sin is a moral disease. Punishment is the effect, the pain, or suffering consequent of the disease. Remove or put away the disease, and its effect, punishment, ceases of course. But it would be as unscriptural and as unreasonable to talk of forgiving the punishment of sin, as it would for a physician to talk of forgiving his patient his pain, or remitting his sufferings. without removing his disease. If disease exist, the consequent pain must be endured, "and there is no escape." This view of the subject will perfectly harmonise all those scriptures (without driving us to the serpent's doctrine) that speak of the absolute certainty of punishment in all cases, and of the forgiveness or remission of sin. Scripture history and facts also confirm it. Joseph's unnatural brethren suffered for many long years the bitter but just punishment of their sin, and yet their sin was forgiven, remitted, or the disease cured on the heartfelt application of the grace of Joseph. David was sorely punished for his sin, and yet forgiven. The Prodigal Son suffered the condign punishment of his guilt so long as he continued a sinner—his punishment did not sanctify him, but brought him to reflection, humbled his pride, and induced him to return to his father's house, and there he was met with that sanctifying grace that could pardon his guilt and completely cure his moral disease.

24. You make no effort to demolish my second trilemma, paragraph 15, Letter 31. Of course you deem it unanswerable. You say I misrepresent you in stating that you hold the "greatest possible good of the universe to consist in the salvation of a minority, and the least possible expense of evil in the eternal damnation of a majority," and add, that "for any thing that appears to the contrary, in" your "premises, nine-tenths of human kind may be saved." Very well—then my friend Campbell wants but a tenth part of being a Universalist—you are nine-tenths gained over to my side. Take care, or the other tenth will come soon. But now I bethink me, you quoted only in your previous letter, (30,) paragraph 33, the text about the strait and narrow way that leadeth to life, which few find, and the broad way that leadeth to destruction, whereat many go in. Did you intend by this quotation, that only the few there mentioned should ever be saved in the eternal world, and that the many would be endlessly damned? If so, does the word few mean nine-tenths of mankind, (which you now think may be saved,) and the word many, only the other tenth? Please answer the question. If you now think that nine-tenths of human kind will be saved, you must either reverse the definitions of few and many in the text, or allow, with me, that it has no reference to the final destiny of man, but only to the comparatively small number that embraced the religion of Christ while he was on earth, and the many that rejected him and went the broad way to the temporal destruction that came on that nation.

25. Your last five paragraphs in the letter before me, on the alleged tendencies of my system, are entirely foreign from the propositions we agreed to discuss, and are utterly irrelevant, being wholly based on your falsely attributing to me sentiments I never held, nor before thought of. I will only say on these, that I never held that punishment could sanctify the sinner—nor that it alone could save mankind—nor that it in any way did or could supersede the necessity of salvation by the grace of God and the mediation of Christ. Indeed, so far from being opposed to, or extraneous from, or inconsistent with the latter, punishment, whether it be inflicted here or hereafter, is one of the means of God's grace—one of the means employed by Christ in his mediatorial reign, to subdue and bring sinners to him. For Christ expressly declared that he would "reward every man according to his works," and also that he would "draw all men unto him."—Matt. xvi: 27; John xii: 32. My system then does not make void and useless, but establishes, and in the highest possible degree honors, the Gospel of Christ.

26. One word, Sir, respecting your own system and its tendencies. You say, "those who are born and brought up in gross darkness, as to the Gospel, are liable to the least imaginable quantum of punishment," and that "the doom of those who hear the Gospel and turn away from it, will be inexpressibly more fearful, woful and wretched than the doom of the Indian and Pagan who heard it not." You add, "there are more who reject than obey the Gospel." How, then, Sir, in the name of reason and humanity, dare you try to enlighten any of the human family? Why not suffer them to remain forever in Pagan darkness? Why give them a chance to reject the Gospel and thereby greatly enhance, not merely their temporal, but their endless wretchedness and immortal woe! Your system of promulgating the Gospel and enlightening mankind, if your doctrine be true, will forever add to the endless woe and immortal pangs of millions on millions of human souls! Pause, my friend, I beseech you, pause a moment, and think on the dreadful position you occupy. Examine your moral portrait, and that of your system, in this mirror of your own make, and may God assist you to grow "wise unto salvation."

Yours, most truly, D. SKINNER.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE HUMAN HEART.

A dark, inexplicable mystery overshadows thy resting place; a deep, unfathomable obscurity; a dim, impenetrable darkness overhangs thee, thou very common, yet strange—familiar, yet unknown thing! Who has power to divest thee of thy envelope and expose thee to the naked gaze? None, save him "in whom we live, move, and have our being." He alone can cast aside the dimming veil, and show the world its "secret workings."

ASA.

[From the Universa'ist Union.]

NEW-YORK ASSOCIATION—1838.

The New-York Association convened according to adjournment, at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., October 3d, 1838; and after uniting in prayer with Br. C. F. Le Fevre, organized the Council by appointing Br. William Pirsson, Moderator, and Br. S. J. Hillyer, Clerk.

The committee of discipline for the previous year, reported that no cause of complaint had come before them. Appointed Brs. T. J. Sawyer, I. D. Williamson, and S. J. Hillyer, Committee of discipline for the year ensuing; and C. F. Le Fevre, Wm. Whittaker, and I. D. Williamson, Committee on fellowship and ordination.

Appointed Brs. P. Price, and Wm. Howe, lay, and C. F. Le Fevre and I. D. Williamson, clerical delegates to the next State Convention; and S. J. Hillyer to preach the occasional sermon before the next session of this Association.

Resolved, That the Standing Clerk be authorized to appoint one or more Conference meetings of this Association during the present year, at such time and place as may be deemed advisable.

The following resolution having been passed at the last New-York State Convention:

Resolved, That we recommend to each of the Associations in our fellowship to consider the propriety of so altering its modes of granting fellowship as to require candidates to signify to the Association, at its regular session, their intention to preach; which intention shall be entered on the Minutes, or otherwise published, if thought proper; and that the Committee on fellowship be required to ascertain that the candidate has preached, and conducted to the acceptance of the people among whom he has labored, and possesses a good moral character, before they report in favor of granting him a letter of fellowship at the next session of the Association.

Therefore, Resolved, That this Association highly approves of this recommendation, and will be governed by it.

Resolved, That the Standing Clerk be authorized to designate the time and place of the next meeting of this Association. Adjourned.

WILLIAM PIRSSON, Moderator.

S. J HILLYER, Clerk.

Lay delegates present.—Matthew Bird of the 2d Society, and Wm. Pirsson of the 2d, New-York; Wm. Howe, and Samuel Hunt, North Salem; Wm. H. Slater and Benj. Gile, Poughkeepsie. Clerical—C. F. Le Fevre, I. D. Williamson, and S. J. Hillyer.

Visiting brethren.—F. Hitchcock and D. Ackley.

The Council met in friendship, deliberated in charity, harmony and love, and parted in peace. The societies or friends within the limits of this Association, desiring its next session in their neighborhood, will please make timely application to the Standing Clerk, Br. T. J. Sawyer, New-York.

Sermons were preached by Brs. Hitchcock, Le Fevre, Hillyer, and Ackley. The weather was pleasant, the congregations were respectable, and devout attention was given to the word preached. And under the Divine blessing, it is believed that this meeting will be instrumental in the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom.

S. J. HILLYER.

HUDSON RIVER ASSOCIATION—1838.

Convened at West Fort Ann, Wednesday, October 3d, 1838.

APPOINTMENTS.—Br. L. C. Browne, Moderator, Br. Joseph Bacon, Clerk. Br. Smith to deliver next occasional sermon. Br. Rayner to prepare and publish the Minutes.

REPORTS.—(Com. discipline. Not present. Com. fellowship and ordination—"conferred ordination on Brs. Hathaway, Cook and Brooks, since last session."

NEW COMMITTEES.—Br. Hollister, of Granville; Powel Howland, Halfmoon; and Marvin, Duanesburg, on discipline. Brs. Smith, of Albany; Browne, of Troy; and Spencer, of Lansingburg, fellowship and ordination. Brs. Rayner, Spencer and Hollister, to nominate delegates to the State Convention. Brs. Rayner, Browne, and Van Schaack, to report a Constitution for a Relief Society.

RESOLUTIONS.—1. That the Constitution of this Association be so modified, at the next annual session, as to require that all persons desiring the fellowship of this body, as clergymen, shall signify such request to the Committee on fellowship and ordination, one year previous to the time at which they shall receive fellowship; and that said Committee publish all such requests immediately after their reception, in one or more of the Universalist periodicals in this State.

2. That the doctrine of impartial grace is progressing; and that the state of our cause, in general, requires in our ministers, a decided course of alternate doctrinal and practical preaching.

3. That we tender to Br. Grosh the warmest thanks of this Association for the excellent discourse, delivered at the opening session; that believing the same to be eminently calculated to do good in our denomination, we respectfully request that Br. G. publish it in pamphlet form; and that we will exert ourselves, as far as possible, to give it an extensive circulation.

4. That this Association recommend to each society within its limits, to take up a collection, in the month of January next, for defraying the expense of our delegation to the N. Y. State Convention, and transmit the same to the Standing Clerk of this body, to be, by him, equitably applied, according to the amount of expense actually incurred.

5. That this body adjourn to meet in Lansingburgh on the first Wednesday in October, 1839, and then and there consider the expediency of making that the constitutional time for its regular annual sessions.

RECEIVED INTO FELLOWSHIP, the Universalist society in Nassau—the Sacondaga Universalist society—and the Independent society at Bolton.

DELEGATES TO THE N. Y. STATE CONVENTION—Laymen: Brs. Silas Harvey, Lansingburgh, and Stephen Van Schaack, Albany.—Clergymen: Brs. M. Rayner, Troy, and P. Hathaway, Saratoga.

LAY DELEGATES PRESENT.—Henry Spencer and Thomas Gwin, Lansingburgh: Artemus Childs and Lyman Cook, Saratoga Springs; Joseph Bacon and Abiah Kingsley, Fort Ann; Stephen Dewel and Powel Howland, Halfmoon and Stillwater; Henry Barton and John Harris, Greenfield; John W. Creel, and Truman B. Hicks, Sacondaga; Calvin Tounson and Benjamin Hyde, Hartford; John B. Prosser and Warren Thomas, Bolton.

CLERICAL DELEGATES PRESENT.—G. Brooks, Athol; P. Hathaway, Saratoga Springs; M. Rayner, L. C. Browne, Troy; C. Hollister, Granville.

VISITING CLERGY.—A. B. Grosh, Utica, Rev. Mr. Harrington, Fort Ann.

PUBLIC SERVICES.—Sermons were preached by Brs. Browne, Grosh, Hathaway and Rayner. Addresses by Br. Browne. Brs. Brooks, Hollister and Harrington, [a Baptist brother] took parts in the exercises. There was a conference meeting on Wednesday evening, in which Brs. Hathaway, Browne, Grosh, Rayner, Hollister and Brooks, participated. It was a season of much interest.

Adjourned, (on Thursday afternoon) to meet in Lansingburg, on the first Wednesday in October, 1839

J. BACON, Clerk. L. C. BROWNE, Moderator.

For the Magazine and Advocate

MORAL RELATION OF GOD AND MAN.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

The subject of the moral relation existing between God and mankind, is one of the most interesting that the mind can contemplate. It is found on almost every page of the sacred writings. It is indeed the foundation of our obedience. It is the tie that binds earth to heaven. It is the golden chain that binds the universe to the great Creator. Let us contemplate the origin of this connection and its permanency. God is the Creator of all things. He formed man in his own image; gave him all his possessions of body and mind; and has given him all the blessings which he enjoys. But the Scriptures present God in a more amiable light than as a Creator. True, there is something sublime in contemplating God, rising in his strength and might, and creating unnumbered worlds. But then we must look further before we can decide whether this is an act of benevolence—we must look at the character of such a Being; and here we shall find that we are not left to mere conjecture. Jesus has directed us in prayer to say, "our Father." And a more endearing name, could not be given to the Author of our being. We feel, at once, that we are his children, and objects of his care. There can be no scene in life where a father's eye will not be upon us, and where his friendly hand will not be extended for our protection. Blessed and happy thought! May it ever lead us to put entire confidence in the Father of mercies and the God of hope.

This revelation is of a permanent character.—Nothing in heaven or earth can dissolve the connection existing between God and the human race, for man is a child of Heaven under all circumstances. He may be sunk in the very depths of depravity, or debased by superstition; yet the relationship is the same. Hence the reason why God calls on man to return to him and be saved. Let us look at the divine Word now, for directions—"My people have committed two evils: they have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and hewn out to themselves cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." Jer. ii: 13. "I have nourished and brought up children and they have rebelled against me." Isa. i: 2.

It may be said in objection to this, that Jesus says to the Jews, "ye are of your father, the devil;" and that John speaks of the "children of the devil." Such expressions are designed to show that men may, in character, belong to the devil, but then, not in reality, for God is certainly the Father of all by the act of creation. If there be a personal devil, and he has made creatures, then he has a right to their obedience, and God can not consistently interfere in the regulation of the subjects of his kingdom.

But God is the rightful owner of man, and he will claim the hearts of all. Contemplating him in this light, it becomes all to pay him the homage and love due unto his name. Man is certainly ungrateful, to treat the Author of his being with neglect, when he has received so many tokens of his goodness from his Word. Let all, then, serve the Creator faithfully, and they will find permanent happiness and joy.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE KINGDOM AND THE JUDGMENT.

BY REV. S. MILES.

The first resurrection brings us to the kingdom of Christ, or in other words, to the Holy City, New-Jerusalem, "which came down from God out of heaven," as may be seen Rev. xx: 5, 6, compared with Rev. xxi: 1–4, which reads as follows—"But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. And I John, saw the holy city, New-Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband."—Nothing is here said of the final resurrection to a state of immortality, when "death the last enemy shall be destroyed." The writer has here confined himself to the description of the first resurrection and the day of judgment by the Son of God.

The dead here spoken of, are not judged worthy, or unworthy, of going into heaven, but whether they are worthy of going into the holy city which came down from God out of heaven. The writer does not say; "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into heaven" as those would have it, that pervert the word. But, blessed, etc., are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city. This city came from heaven when Christ came in his kingdom as described in the following words. "I go to prepare a place for you, and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also."—John xiv: 2, 3. "So likewise, ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled." Luke xxi: 31, 32. "And he said unto them, verily I say unto you, that there be some of them that stand here, which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power." Mark ix: 1. "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his holy angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works." "Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom." Matt. xvi: 27, 28.—Now nothing can be more evident, than that Christ did come in his kingdom in the lifetime of some of his disciples who were with him at the time of his death. He came, and rewarded every man according to his works. So that none were admitted into the "holy city which came down from God out of heaven," except those who had done good. None were admitted into the kingdom of God except those who were blessed because they had done his commandments, and had a right to the tree of life within the city. "They that have done good shall come forth to the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil shall come forth to the resurrection of damnation." By the holy city, New-Jerusalem, I understand the new covenant. There are two covenants spoken of. See Gal. iv: 22–26. Paul says, "Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all." All are not yet brought forth to the light; but one thing is certain, that a child is just as nearly related to its mother before it arrives to that perfect knowledge which induces obedience to her will, as it is afterwards. Jerusalem, that makes us free, is the same forever; she is the mother of us all; and all men shall be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth, as it is in Christ, the way, the truth and the life. All who are unworthy of the life enjoyed by the saints in the Gospel, are out of the light, and are in darkness and bondage.

There are two resurrections, the first brings us to Christ, the truth and life in the new covenant. The second resurrection will bring us into a state of immortality beyond the cold grave. That the first resurrection is by Christ through his word, is testified by Christ himself—"For as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth whom he will." John v: 21. "For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son." "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come unto condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." Verses 22, 24. The first resurrection had commenced. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live." "Now is the judgment of this world."—John xii: 31, 48; xvi: 11; 1 Peter iv: 17. The prophet Daniel has shown us that the day of judgment was to take place when the saints came into possession of the kingdom, and not as some who have erred concerning the truth, will have it, who say that the day of judgment is in eternity, and to take place at the time when Christ is to deliver up the kingdom to the Father. See Daniel vii: 9, 10, 13, 14, 21, 22, 26, 27. Nothing is said in the Bible of a day of judgment, at the time when Christ shall deliver up the kingdom, and God be all in all. There will then be no more death; because the last enemy death will then be swallowed up in victory, and tears will then be wiped from every weeping eye. Isa. xxv: 6, 7, 8, compared with 1 Cor. xv: 53, 54, 55. The kingdom was given to Christ "that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him." Dan. vii: 14.—"And all dominions shall serve and obey him." Dan. vii: 27. By adding these together it will stand thus—"All people, nations, and languages should serve him," and "All dominions shall serve and obey him." They shall do that which they should do. "The kingdom is the Lord's, and he is the Governor among the nations." Ps. xxii: 27, 28.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1838.

TITUS II: 1–15.

The first converts to Christianity in the island of Crete, where Titus labored, were Jews. It appears that when Gentile or idolatrous converts were added to the church, they were assailed by their Jewish brethren with great warmth, in order to persuade them to a sense of the necessity of conforming themselves to the laws of Moses.—"Moreover" says Dr. Macknight of these judaizing teachers, "to render the law acceptable to these new converts, they no doubt followed the course in which their brethren in other churches walked. They amused the new converts with vain talking, and Jewish fables, and commandments of men, and foolish questions about the law. Nay, they went so far as to affirm that the sacrifices and purifications enjoined by the law, duly performed, would procure pardon for them, though they continued in the practice of sin. To this doctrine, the Cretians, many of whom were very wicked, lent a willing ear." Such errors and such teachers the apostle ordered Titus to expose and rebuke sharply, in the first chapter, and now in this he gives Titus a sketch of those opinions and precepts which he is to inculcate in conformity with sound Christianity, and in opposition to judaizing teachers. It will be observed, upon a survey of this chapter, that the burden of Titus' preaching was to consist in the inculcation of the appropriate duties of the young and the aged, of husband and wife, and lastly of the slaves, whom the Jewish errorists endeavored to seduce to their party, by teaching that under the Gospel slaves were free. Upon such topics he was to insist with frequency, using exhortation and encouragement where needed, and refutation and rebuke where error and obstinacy required.

In what terms would such a preacher of relative duties and moral virtues be denounced by the self-styled orthodox in modern times? As one of the self-righteous, as a preacher of morality, not of Christ, as the recommender of filthy rags, not of heavenly righteousness. These would be the least abusive, the least contemptuous epithets.—Who is the best judge of Christian preaching, Paul, or the orthodox? There is among those who deem themselves the "unco guid"—the most orthodox of the orthodox—the evangelical par excellence—a most complete and lamentable neglect of giving instruction upon these duties, upon which Paul desired Titus to insist, and an utter deficiency in pointing out the most successful methods of fulfilling them. But this ought not so to be, for what honest Christian has ever found a harder task than the application of Christian truth to the regulation and improvement of his daily duties, of his intercourse with his brethren in the various relations of life? In the words of an Edinburg Review, (Edin. Rev. No. 130, Jan. 1837,) "What can possibly be a more imperious duty on a Christian minister, than that of describing the various insidious forms in which temptation presents itself—of exposing the pretexts under which men reconcile themselves to breaches of the laws of morality—of showing the hollowness of the enjoyments which vice yields, and the miseries it entails—of smoothing the path to virtue by reducing apparent difficulties to their real size, and by pointing out the aids to be employed, and the encouragements to be found in following a virtuous course? Who ever hears instruction on these topics from an evangelical pulpit? What have we instead?—Minute systematic arrangements of articles of faith—building up of paradoxes, to be pulled down by explanations—elaborate proofs of mere truisms, where the conclusions are just as readily admitted as the premises—consolations of factitious griefs—solutions of imaginary difficulties—removals of fears which nobody ever felt—warning against dangers which nobody ever fell into—fitting of allegories—discoveries of hidden meanings, and new applications of texts. A man shall be informed, to the most minute particulars, in what respects Christ executed the functions of a prophet, those of a priest, those of a king; and never hear a word about his own duties as a master, a servant, a neighbor, a citizen. The respective offices performed by the Father, the Son, and the Spirit, in the work of salvation, are here defined with metaphysical precision—what a man is to do in it himself, he is never intelligibly told; or rather, he is led to understand that he has nothing at all to do in the matter. He whose difficulties in embracing a religious life are how to brave ridicule—how to forsake vicious habits, how to combat infidel arguments, how to break from worldly entanglements, shall be left without encouragement, help, or direction: but should any one chance to find himself obstructed by suspicions as to how far God's veracity may be safely trusted, or how far Christ is in all points rightly qualified, or fully empowered, or sufficiently disposed to be a Saviour (or any other such likely or reasonable scruples), he shall have ample testimonials produced for his satisfaction. And this is spiritual preaching!—truly if we take spiritual as opposed in meaning to substantial or solid, such instruction is spiritual indeed. And we have spiritual preachers wondering at the immorality of their flocks—wondering, namely, that they can not gather figs of thorns, or grapes of thistles!"

We have indulged in this long extract because it is such an admirable and striking hit against a style of preaching, unsanctioned by Paul or any other good authority, and pregnant with most pernicious consequences. If we have herewith given any aid towards the superannuation and extinction of such preaching, and the introduction of better, our labor shall not be in vain. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

NATURE, ANIMATE AND INANIMATE.

BY D. F. YOUNG.

Does there not, gentle reader, a glowing sensibility at times pervade my breast, as, apart from the bustling scenes of a busy world, the mind reverts to those periods in thy existence which nicely correspond to green spots in a gloomy desert, animating and cheering the weary traveller as he pursues his journey, and without which, life would lose its charms, and cease to be worth possessing? Methinks you will respond affirmatively. And who is so truly a misanthrope—so stern a stoic, as not, at such times, to yearn over the sufferings of his kindred nature, or be moved by the unaffected simplicity, the simple grandeur, and the silent eloquence of the scenes with which he is surrounded? There is implanted in the human breast, that which more than incites to "feel for others' woes" and "weep for others' tears"—yea, the sympathies of our common nature stimulate to privations and sacrifices of the dearest personal interests, to alleviate the distresses and assuage the sorrows of a fellow-being; and this is but the sacred performance of a common duty—a noble discharge of the obligations which bind mind to mind, and man to his Maker, while it invariably tends to enhance the sublunary enjoyments of him who is the willing subject of such divine benignity. How soothing is that sensibility of satisfaction and unsophisticated pleasure, which flows to the generous soul of him, whose kindest sympathies are ever enlisted, and who cheerfully administers the balm of consolation wherever he beholds indigence and want craving the offices of a charitable humanity. And this, we believe, is the grand incentive to deeds of kindness and charity; and while we contemplate this noble trait of the human character, untrammelled by the shackles of vice and ignorance, the spirit expands into song and we respond to the dictates of the muse:—

There is a sympathetic soul
To ev'ry mortal given,
Whose promptings he can not control,
Because they are of Heaven.

Who can behold his fellow's grief,
Or smile upon his wo,
And coldly pass without relief,
A man—a brother too?

Ah! there are none—we all can feel
For other's pain and wo;
And those who do those sorrows heal,
Unearthly pleasures know!

The miser thinks with sordid wealth,
Unsullied joys to buy,
And for this idol barters health,
Yet all his hopes must die.

And not unlike his fate who bleeds
Upon the battle field,
Or thinks the fame of valiant deeds
Will lasting pleasures yield.

And so are other joys, compar'd
With those we feel and know,
When want and indigence have shared
Of what we own below:

Such joys, are prelibations of
The happiness, that reigns
Within those holy courts above,
A ransom'd world obtains!

There is an eloquence in the handy-works of a munificent Creator, and the multifarious scenes of a variegated existence, which overwhelms by the grandness of its own simplicity, the proud monumental productions of man's most perfect attainments. Who can gaze upon the thundering cataract of the proud Niagara, and contemplate the vastness of that grand column of disturbed waters, which, as if in mockery of man's insignificance, have for ages tumbled over its lofty summit, with a mind, conscious of its own comparative imbecility, not involuntarily drawn out in admiration of the greatness of that Being who "measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance"; who said to the waters of the mighty deep, "thus far shalt thou go and no farther, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed."! We can not envy the sensibility of that man, who can gaze with a fixed attention upon the works of nature, and contemplate the mighty wonders of creation, with his faculties transfixed with the deepest emotion, and his soul ravished by the sublimity of the scenes which every where meet his vision, while he attributes all to the production of chance—yea, blind chance. The unfading splendor of the golden king of day—the silvery brightness of night's pale queen—the countless myriads of twinkling luminaries which bespangle the cerulean vault of heaven, proclaim, as in a voice of thunder, that there is a God who placed them there, and whose power sustains and governs them as they wheel their stated course through the boundless space of infinitude! There is, indeed, sublimity in the conception, that the sun, with all its retinue of planetary worlds, is the habitation of some order of intelligences whose constitutional organs are nicely adapted to their peculiar circumstances; and who, in contemplating the immensity of the universe—the countless number of habitable worlds, which must needs be under the superintending providence of God, can wonder and admire with the emotion which dictated the exclamation of the Psalmist, "What is man that thou art mindful of him!"—And here, gentle reader, we again crave thy pardon while we, for a few moments, indulge the dictates of poetic fancy:—

Is there a God whose nature is divine,
Who makes the sun on good and evil shine;
Pervading all things—rules and governs all
From the small atom to the pond'rous ball?
There is a God, who rules the day and night—
The deep proclaims the power of his might!
There is a God, the voice of nature cries—
Behold his glories in the glowing skies!
The gentle breeze that sweeps across the plain,
The rippling waves that dance upon the main,
The mighty tempest that „old ocean" heaves,
The plaintive rattle of the falling leaves,
The vivid lightnings dashing thwart the sky—
Celestial wonders nightly we descry,
Alike declare the instance of a mind;
Wise, uncreated, self-existent, kind.
His spirit rides upon the hurricane,
And Heaven's artill'ry thunders forth his name;
When storms subside he bends his ample bow
Along the sky, his constancy to show.
It can not be—I ever must disown
The skeptic's creed, that chance—blind chance alone,
Had, of itself, a power to create
From matter dead, all things inanimate;
Yet were this true, I question still the whole—
For whence did matter first receive a soul?
Not from blind chance—this were absurd indeed!
Whence was it then—say, whence did it proceed?
The thing is clear—enough for us to know
'Twas God who did th' immortal mind bestow.
'Twas him who first from chaos did create
All things, both living and inanimate!
Wise as benignant, merciful as just,
He breath'd his spirit into lifelesss dust,
When man came forth, the image of his God,
As pure and sinless as the earth he trod!
Great God I own thee as a Father kind:
To thee I bend the powers of my mind;
Give me thy spirit, and in mercy save
Me from the horrors of the skeptic's grave!

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1838.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.—NO. XIII.

"For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." Matt. xviii: 20.

The view generally taken of this language is this—that where two or three are gathered together in a conference meeting or a prayer meeting, there Christ will be in the midst of them. But though it is a touching idea to think our Saviour is with us, when we engage in divine worship; and though it is a fact, that the spirit of Christ, such as animated him to forgive his enemies, dwells in the midst of all his true followers, yet, I am satisfied that the explanation generally given of this passage, is not correct.

Again, when our Saviour sat at the Supper with his apostles, he said to them, "I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom." Matt. xxvi: 29. The idea which many people have of this passage, is, that it refers to meeting Christ in heaven. But if it be carefully remembered, that wine was to be used at this meeting, it will be seen that it can not have reference to heaven, since no wine can or will be found in the abodes of immortality.

It appears to me, that the two passages quoted, have reference to facts which transpired during the forty days that Christ was on earth, between his resurrection from the tomb, and his ascension to heaven. To prove this statement a few quotations will be made to the point.—When the apostles had gathered together to hear the account of two of the disciples, who had seen Christ after his resurrection, we read, "and as they thus spake, Jesus himself stood in the midst of them and saith unto them, peace be unto you." Luke xxiv: 36. Again we read, "And after eight days, again his disciples were within, and Thomas with them; then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, peace be unto you." John xx: 26. In these instances it will be discovered, that Christ literally appeared among his disciples, when a few of them were together. Could he have allusion to other than these literal appearances, when he said, "For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them?"

Let another quotation be introduced touching the last passage. After Christ had escaped from the chains of death, and by a series of appearances, endeavored to convince his disciples of his triumph over the tomb, he said to them on one of his meetings with them "Have ye here any meat? and they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honey-comb. And he took it and did eat before them." Luke xxiv: 41–43. Here the fact is evident that he did dine with his disciples after his resurrection. Can we suppose that he referred to any other circumstance than this, when he said, "I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom?" It was emphatically partaking with them under new auspices. He had drunk the cup of affliction to its very dregs; he had dared the death of the cross, and felt the sting of the dark monster; he had realized what it was to die without an earthly friend around him, and amid the cruel contempt of his murderers. But he had overcome the evil; he had triumphed over the forces of darkness; he had lighted a brilliant hope of immortality amid the gloom of the grave; he had put off the shackles of mortality, and earned the singularly peculiar name, "the first born from the dead." And now, for the first time, after his noble victory over the tomb, he partook with his disciples, before his ascension to the glory of a higher order of being, where, in the presence of the Deity, he is mediator between God and men. Yes, now did he partake with his disciples "in his Father's kingdom;" for that kingdom of grace and salvation was established by the resurrection, which has gone forth a consecrated friend of the world, bearing virtue to the sinner, wisdom to the prosperous, truth to the errorist, comfort to the mourning, and immortality to the dying. Then, while convincing his disciples of his actual escape from death, the peerless truths of that divine system began to unfold themselves, which will not cease their onward power to universal dominion, until a redeemed world shall sing the praise of the most high God. And while he was partaking, it must have brought vividly to the remembrance of the disciples, what the Saviour said to them at the last Supper, previous to his crucifixion. And when it gradually dawned on their minds, that Christ had indeed burst the gates of death, can we wonder at the relation of the historian?—"And it came to pass, while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven. And they worshipped him, and returned to Jerusalem with great joy; and were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God." Luke xxiv: 51–53. Not only their's, but our hearts should burn within us, when we remember that our destiny is, to rise as Christ has risen, and partake of the blessings of immortality with a ransomed world. G. W. M.

Auburn, October 16, 1838.

Br. J. P. Atkinson:—On page 317 of the present volume of the Advocate, there is a note addressed to me, from your pen, concerning the phrases "kingdom of God," and "kingdom of heaven." The substance of the note, is as follows:—I take the position, that "there is not a single instance in the New Testament, where the phrase 'kingdom of God,' or 'kingdom of heaven' occurs, that has any other allusion than to the Gospel dispensation." If this position is correct, you inquire, "what is the meaning of the declaration of St. Paul, contained in his first letter to the Corinthians, xv: 50? 'Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.'" This inquiry shall be answered in the same brotherly spirit which is breathed in your whole note.

I formerly believed, as you now do, that the phrase "kingdom of God," 1 Cor. xv: 50, referred to that immortal state in which the whole human family shall ultimately be fixed; but subsequent consideration has changed that belief. Some of the causes of that change will now be presented.

1. It is contended by our brethren, and with good success, that the phrases "kingdom of God," and "kingdom of heaven" mean one and the same thing; viz., the reign of Christ, the Gospel dispensation. The only exception, to my knowledge, which is made to this application, is the single instance in 1 Cor. xv: 50; there, they suppose, that the phrase "kingdom of God," signifies the final state of human beings. But, is there sufficient proof to admit of giving that phrase, in a single instance, an entire different meaning from what it possesses in every other instance? And have not our Limitarian brethren as much testimony for applying the phrase "kingdom of God," to a future world of immortality, especially as it occurs in the conversation between Christ and Nicodemus, as we have to so apply it in 1 Cor. xv: 50? This view possessed some little influence in forming my opinion.

2. The phrase "kingdom of God," occurs four times in the 1st epistle to Cor.; in three of which instances it plainly refers to the reign of Messiah—and I have no proof that it refers to any other reign in the fourth instance. See 1 Cor. iv: 20—vi: 9, 10—xv: 50.

3. In Dan. vii: 13, 14, we are certified that a kingdom was given to Christ, that all nations might serve him. In Matt. iv: 17, Christ affirms that his kingdom was at hand. In 1 Cor. xv, we are assured that the reign of the Messiah will have an end—for, having accomplished the object of subduing all things to Christ; the laws of the kingdom, its spiritual throne and judgment-seat, and its rewards and punishments will cease, because, all people having become obedient to Christ, there will no longer be a necessity for their continuance. Now, I find no biblical proof for applying the phrase "kingdom of God" to any other period, than that which exists between the commencement and the end of Messiah's reign. Beyond that period, Christ will possess no kingdom; for, becoming himself subject to the Father, God will be all in all.

4. What then did Paul mean, when he said, "flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God?" 1 Cor. xv: 50. In Gal. v: 19–21, Paul affirms that the "works of the flesh" are adultery, lasciviousness, murders, drunkenness and many other evils. But in verses 22 and 23, he affirms that the fruit of the spirit is love, joy, goodness, temperance and other virtues. By this view, it is evident, that the flesh and its works can not inherit the "kingdom of God" or Gospel-truth, "for the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit." Rom. xiv: 17.—Man comes into the enjoyment and possession of truth through his spirit or mind; and when his mind bows to the reign of Christ, then his flesh and passions are made subject to "the law of the spirit of life." This is precisely the idea expressed by Paul in 1 Cor. xv: 50.—And he had prepared his brethren for his application of the idea, by introducing it in 1 Cor. vi: 9, 10. "Knowing that Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more: death hath no more dominion over him. For in that he died, he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God." Those who are subject to the works of the flesh can not inherit or enter into the spiritual kingdom or truth of Christ.

5. For what object did Paul introduce this idea?—The whole 15th chap. was written for the purpose of combatting the notion, that there was no resurrection, and of proving that all men should rise in Christ and become subject to his reign. In effecting this purpose, the apostle uses a number of comparisons as illustrations of his subject. The 50th verse is made up of one of these comparisons. The first limb of the verse. "flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God," contains a fact with which the last limb of the verse is compared, "corruption can not inherit incorruption;" thus—

"Flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God"—or the flesh and its works can not enter into the reception and enjoyment of the truth embraced in Messiah's reign.	"Neither doth corruption inherit incorruption"—or, it is as much impossible for the corruptible body to enter the incorruptible state of immortality, as it is for the flesh and its works to inherit the blessings of the Gospel reign

This, I think, is the comparison used by Paul; and is another illustration of the fact, that, before the spirit returns to God who gave it, the dust must return to the earth as it was. All of which is submitted for your consideration by your brother in Christ. G. W. M.

BR. ROGERS,

Our readers may remember a letter of mine, addressed to this brother, some weeks ago, in reply to some charges against me in a communication intended for this paper. The following reply to it is copied from the Star in the West. It was received during my absence from home, and not seen until this late period. Of the severe tone of my remarks, the reader must judge, whether severe charges, affecting my character individually and professionally, did not call for earnestness—all anger I disclaimed at the time. I might have suppressed the offensive paragraph, it is true; but to do so, would have been a virtual acknowledgment, that I had reasons for fearing to publish it, if not that it was true. No, when charges are made, I prefer meeting them—and I would rather have them made, even published to the world, than to have them circulated privately, far from my knowledge of even their existence; for then I can grapple with them.

The apology of Br. Rogers, as well as his explanation, is perfectly satisfactory—perfectly so. I could not imagine why he should mean what he said of me, and am too pleased to find that he did not mean it, to care how "meagre" is the explanation, satisfied that it is sincere. That he did consider me an opposer of nearly all church ceremonies, was to me evident; and this alone justified me in calling for an explanation of that part of his letter. But enough. Here is his reply. A. B. G.

Br. Grosh—I will not directly disclaim the offensive sense, which your scrutinizing eye—aided by spectacles (steel-cased, if I remember aright) has detected in my recent letter to you, of which you complain in the Magazine of September 7th. I will not directly disclaim it, I say, lest it might seem that I was lashed into the doing so by the severe tone of your remarks thereupon: and it is not in my nature to be lashed into any thing. My letter to you (of which I retained no copy—I never do) was your private property, to do with, as seemed unto you best—you might have suppressed the offending paragraph, and I should most probably have forgotten that I ever wrote it. Truth is, that my letter (as you were notified in a postscript) was written in extreme haste—and in the spirit of familiar and careless confidence usual with me in that kind of effusions: God help me! I should be sorry to be held to a rigorous answering for all the nonsense, which my wayward quill throws off when I am in such moods. Thus much for apology—now for explanation.

The paragraph complained of is poorly written,—poorly, for it is a main object in writing to express one's meaning, and that does not express mine. I no more intended to charge upon you the several negative characteristics enumerated, in connection with the church proposed to be "drilled into your notions," (although the italicised words here quoted from said paragraph seems clearly to imply the contrary,) than I designed to appropriate to myself the affirmative characteristics opposed to them, and proposed to be embraced in mine, or Br. Messinger's church—I have never baptized any, neither have I had my "children dedicated to God," nor have I ever but once attended a praise meeting, (for want of opportunity, however,) nor but twice took part in the eucharistic rite, (for the same reason,) none acquainted with me will suspect that, in that article, I was advocating the things which I myself do—but those only which I more and more feel ought to be done. So on the other hand, I but made you to personate the advocate for opposite principles—I singled you out for this purpose, because to you my letter was addressed, and because, also, I did consider you an opposer of nearly all church usages of a ceremonious kind. I am happy to find you less so than (I can not tell from what cause) I had been led to suppose.—Still, be assured, that were the contrary the cause, it would not in the least affect my personal regards toward you. I set too high a price on my own liberty of conscience to wish, in the smallest degree, to interfere with that of another.

Touching the term philosopher in said paragraph, it must be evident to every one, I think, that I used it in a different sense in regard to you, from that which I intended by it in its other application—in the former its true—in the latter its pseudo sense is apparent. The language, "I think better of you as a philosopher," implies a philosophy of which I think well—whereas the philosophy which I speak of as being "so cheap and plentiful," is a sort of stuff, which is constantly setting itself and the world agape with astonishment at the pretended profundity of its researches—which is constantly arraying its gratuitous or "old wives' fables," against the well-authenticated truths of the Bible, and which, in fact, is no philosophy at all. Such, Br. Grosh, is my explanation—it may seem meagre, but it is true, and sincere, nevertheless. Your remarks have drawn from me a longer reply than I designed when I commenced it; but I could not well compress within narrower limits what I conceived it expedient to say. Yours, in sincere affection,

Cincinnati, September 20. GEORGE RODGERS.

VISIT TO NEWARK, WAYNE COUNTY, N. Y.

On Tuesday the 9th, I visited Newark, for the purpose of attending the session of the Ontario Association, and the dedication of the Universalist church in that place. And truly, my expectations in reference to the prosperity of the cause there, were far more than realized.

Notwithstanding the derangement of business matters for the last two years, our friends in Newark have erected a beautiful brick church, 56 by 44 feet in size, with an excellent basement story, and a marble slab in front, designating the time of erection, and bearing the sublime declaration, "God is love." There are three aisles in the church, one in the centre, and one at each side wall.—There is a gallery, over the entry, for the singers.—Neither the desk nor slips are painted. They are made of butternut wood, varnished; which has a very beautiful appearance, being as handsome as walnut. There is a small organ in the church.

On the morning of the 10th, the church was solemnly dedicated to the only living and true God. Of the excellent dedication sermon, (which was delivered by Br. K. Townsend) it becomes me not to speak, as the readers of the Advocate will soon have the pleasure of perusing it. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, the house was crowded in every part, by an attentive congregation. Indeed, throughout the session, we had excellent congregations, whose tears of joy showed their pleasure in hearing the word of salvation and in meeting so many friends of the Restitution. It was a refreshing season, and it was good that we were there.

The success of the cause in Newark, is no longer problematical, either as it regards moral influence or pecuniary matters. Their church is owned among themselves. Their slips, of which there are 58, are rented for the support of the preached word. All the slips were rented the first week, with the exception of six; and there were yet twelve friends to supply. They will raise by pew-rent about $900 per year. And, when I consider how nobly our very excellent friends have done their duty, and in spite of every obstacle, have built them a temple of worship—when I consider the state of the cause a few years since in Newark, feeble as it was; and now see there a society of virtuous believers—when I consider that they are blest with the labors of an efficient and energetic preacher (Br. K. Townsend)—I see yet greater things coming for Zion in the beautiful village of Newark; for the past is an earnest, that in future our friends will go onward, until the light of their example will incite other villages to go and do likewise.

May the Lord bless both pastor and people with all needed blessing; strengthen them in every good word and work; and richly reward them for their hospitality to visiting friends, and generous exertions in the advancement of truth. G. W. M.

Auburn, October 18, 1838.

W O*.

By these initials and marks, in No. 39, current volume, I designated an impostor, who had palmed himself off as a Universalist preacher, in Jefferson, Oswego and Onondaga counties. Since then several letters from respectable ministering and lay brethren, have been received, assuring me that he is, without doubt, a deceiving, and intemperate man, utterly unworthy the countenance of our friends, and possessing no claim to our fellowship, even as the member of one of our societies. The fellow has a decent family, and I do not, for their sakes, desire to expose him further. But if any one of our friends should hear that he yet attempts to palm himself off as a preacher of the Gospel, and will give me information of the fact, he will oblige me and our friends, and will render it my duty to give a full description of the man, with his name in full.

As I am informed that his certificates have been taken from him, so that he can not easily use the names of others to countenance his impositions on the public, it is very probable to my mind, that he will be willing to save himself further exposure and me the painful necessity of making it. But if not, I will do my duty.

A. B. G.

UNIVERSALIST BOOKS.

Br. Chapin has for sale, at Mr. R. Poore's, Government-st., Richmond, Va., a good assortment of Universalist books, among which are Ely and Thomas' Discussion; Williamson's Arguments for Christianity; Voice to Youth, in various bindings suitable for gifts; etc., etc. Also, the Universalist Register and Almanac for 1839, and a few other pamphlets.

As Br. Chapin is one of the Corresponding Editors of the Magazine and Advocate, any business concerning this establishment will be the same as if transacted with us. He is also appointed an agent for the Universalist Union. A. B. G.

HUDSON RIVER ASSOCIATION.

One word of explanation. I left on the morning of the second day. After I left, the resolution was passed as I was given to understand it would be, notwithstanding my expressed wishes that nothing might be done—for if the sermon was really wanted, I would publish it without a public request. They had their reasons—I had mine,—and though opposed to each other, no blame can be attached to either. The sermon will be published as soon as I can find leisure to rewrite it.

A. B. G.

THIS CITY.

I should have stated earlier, what it gives me much pleasure to announce, that Br. T. D. Cook, of Gaines, Orleans county, has received and accepted an invitation to become the pastor of the Universalist church and society in Utica. He will remove here, and commence his labors with them, the first of January next. This arrangement will give me my whole time to bestow undividedly on our publications, when necessary—and I flatter myself that it will enable me to render them more interesting to our readers. A. B. G.

UNIVERSALISM: What it is not, and what it is—A Discourse by Rev. E. H. Chapin.—As copious extracts were published in this paper, it is only necessary to inform our readers that the entire sermon, in pamphlet form, is for sale at this office. Price 6 cts. single—63 cts. per dozen.

It may also be had of P. Price, 130 Fulton-st., New-York, and of the author, at Mr. R. Poore's, Government-st., Richmond, Va. A. B. G.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

As times improve, and our subscribers pay off the arrears to us, they will find some loose change remaining for literary uses. Those who love a solid; serious monthly, with a sprinkling of the light and playful, can not do better than to send a V to "Clark and Edson, 161 Broadway, New-York," ordering the Knickerbocker.—I. Tiffany, Esq., is the agent for this city—or we will order it for our friends, if they prefer our agency.

Of the October number, to notice specks on the Sun's disc, we would remark that some of the poetry is very inferior—so much so, that we wonder how it found a place. To that on p. 333, particularly that at the foot of the page, the Epigram on page 332, is very applicable. A short piece of poetry should be all point—all goodness—there is not room in it for faults—one large fault makes it all fault. Interest in the poetry of the present number there are some beautiful articles—"The Logger's journey" heading the list. The prose articles are as usual good—not as solid, however, as in some numbers.

The criticisms on Walter Scott's morality is able, and if the facts are not mis-stated, the Great Unknown was rather obtuse in his moral feelings, and basely loose in conniving at the wrong doings of——those on whom he depended for favors. I have seen it stated that Mr. Cooper is the author, and has indulged his mortified pride in the manner in which Sir Walter named Mr. C. in his Diary. If mortified pride was the motive of the Reviewer, his morality is as questionable as Scott's—and his republicanism, which feels such deep mortification and revenge at the neglect of the nobility, is scarcely less so. It is to be desired, however, if Scott was really defective in uprightness of character, that a nobler motive than revenge for a slight, has led to the exposure and censure offered. A. B. G.

NEW AGENTS.

L. Stratton, P. M., Richmond Dale, O.; Isaac A. Brooks, Portage, Mich.; D. S. Brazzell, P. M., Harmony; A. W. Tompkins, P. M., Wolcott, in connection with Brs. Andrews and Landin; Wm. E. Young, Milton, Ky.; Rev. Wm. Wilcox, Alps; Luke Frame, Lafargeville; George Walton, Philadelphia; James Livingston, P. M., South Canton; O. Wheelock, Felts Mills; S. Walrath, Morristown; J. Griggs, Jamesville; A. J. Waldron, Linden; C. B. Dunbar, Varysburg; J. Corey, Plainville; A. M. Johnson, Port Gibson.

NOTICE.

We regret that Br. Landers' notices were unintentionally overlooked until too late for insertion. We will try to do better next time.

NEW BOOKS.

Just received, a new lot of Life of Murray, Palfreys, Horne's Introduction, Mrs. Sigourney's Letters to Mothers, Paige's Questions for Sunday schools and Bible classes.

REMOVAL.

Br. W. E. Manley has removed to Gainesville, Genesee county, and requests that all letters and papers intended for him should be directed to that place.

Br. Tompkins—Send Repository to J. M. Clark, Watertown, Jefferson county, N. Y.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. Guild, at Jacksonboro', at 10 o'clock, and at the Academy at Worcester at 3 o'clock—Br. Eddy, at Ericville.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. Guild, at the Lutheran church in South Worcester, at 1 o'clock, and at the Quaker meeting-house in Harpersfield, in the evening—B. Eddy, at Clockville—Br. Bartlett, at Munsville.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper

P M, North Adams, (Mass) for W B—P M, Union village, (Vt) for U W—P M, Akron, (O) for A S N—Dr P C, Hull, (L C)—P M, Farmington, for R A—H C S, Warsaw—J J Q, Minerville, for W H D.

POETRY

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE WANDERER'S HOME.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

Let us go, let us go to the green woodland bowers,
We joyfully roamed through in life's early dawn—
Where we wreath'd our young brows with the sweet scented flowers,
That bloom'd on the hill-side and spangled the lawn.
Where the strawberry bright, 'mid the clover was blushing;
Where the pure sparkling rill o'er the steep cascade gushing
And the fresh mountain breezes at eventide rushing,
Blent the whippoorwill's note with the songs of our home.

O how bright were those hours when the syren was wreathing
Her garlands of glory for youth's sunny prime;
When in fancy's bright halls, magic voices were breathing
Those numbers ne'er heard in the dim aftertime;
When hope her glad flight o'er the future was winging,
And joy's golden harps to wild measures were ringing,
And amaranth flowers, by crystal founts springing,
Added beauty and bliss to the joys of our home.

Ah, no! let us seek those glad bowers no more;
The home of our childhood is moss-grown and old,
And the night breezes sigh through the half ruined door,
While sadly the moon lights the hearth-stone so cold.
Airy forms o'er the lone, dreary wainscot seem straying,
As the weeds by the window are fitfully swaying,
And saddening shades on the streamlets are playing,
And blighted hopes flit o'er the mem'ry of home.

But, behold, far beyond the blue ether is gleaming
A haven of rest—the sad wanderer's home;
Where the pure crystal waters of life, ever beaming
In truth's sunny light, woo the weary to come,
There the flowers ne'er fade—the young buds never wither,
The skies brightly glow in love's radiance forever,
And the songs of the harpers by the sweet flowing river,
Melodiously ring through our heavenly home.

Great Protector, who rid'st on the storm's whirling billows,
And guidest the hurricane's steeds in their flight;
Whose pavilion is rear'd on the lightning's red pillars,
O cheer the lone pilgrim through time's dreary night!
When the coil of despair round the crush'd heart is twining,
And no star on the dark wave of sorrow is shining,
Bid the white wand of faith with hope's roses entwining,
Point the vision afar to the wanderer's home.

See the flame-pinion'd cohorts of seraphs surrounding
In circles of glory the emerald throne,
And list to the deep-rolling anthems resounding
Through the pearl-spangled domes of eternity's zone.
O'er the pavements of gold, see the armies advancing,
While on the soft air, the love-banners are glancing,
And the diamond-like waves of the pure river dancing,
Blend their chimes with the songs of the wanderer's home.

THE GREAT FIRST CAUSE.—John Mason Good, author of the Book of Nature, and the Translation of the Book of Job, has in four stanzas stated the argument in favor of an intelligent First Cause—the wise contriver of all the arrangements of this material world, as strikingly as it could be stated in a whole volume.

THE DAISY.

Not worlds on worlds, in phalanx deep,
Need we to tell a God is here:
The daisy fresh from Winter's sleep,
Tells of his hand in lines so clear.

What power but his who arched the skies,
And poured the day-spring's purple flood,
Wondrous alike in all it tries,
Could rear the daisy's curious bud;

Mould its green cup, its wiry stem,
Its fringed border nicely spin,
And cut the gold embossed gem,
That set in silver gleams within;

And fling it with a hand so free,
O'er hill, and dale, and desert sod,
That man, where'er he walks, may see,
In every step, the stamp of God?

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE CARIBS

The race of Caribs having now almost disappeared, it is interesting to go back a hundred and seventy years to the pages of an author who gathered his information from persons who lived amongst them while their numbers were still great, and their natural character comparatively pure. Even at this time, indeed, they had been driven from several of the islands by the fire-arm and superior intelligence of the whites; but they still abounded in St. Vincent's and a few other places, in each of which, modifications of character were to be found. The author warns the reader that his description is applicable, chiefly, to the Caribs of St. Vincent's.

Our readers are well acquainted with the flattened and unintellectual forehead presented by the Carib skull.—The author says—Admiration being the daughter of ignorance, we ought not to be surprised that the Caribs should be seized with a profound astonishment at every thing, of which they can not see the cause, and that they should be brought up in so much simplicity, that in the greater number of this poor people, one would take it for brutal stupidity. Most of them were persuaded that gunpowder was the seed of a plant, and many insisted on having some to sow in their gardens, where they thought it would grow like cabbage. They never could get over their astonishment at muskets, or conceive how they were discharged. They saw the match applied to the cannons, and thus accounted for their discharge; but believed that Matoya, their evil God set fire to the muskets. The Caribs are as bad as those American Indians, who, being employed by the Spaniards to carry letters and despatches, could not conceive how the news contained in them was conveyed, and at last fancied the letters to have eyes and ears, and to tell what they saw. Acting on this belief, a party in charge of a letter, fearing its watchfulness, hid it below a stone, that it might not see them steal and eat some of their master's melons!

Our author notices the inability of the Caribs to count beyond the number of their fingers. Their extraordinary deficiency of causality, or reasoning power, proved an insuperable obstacle to their forming any conception of an omnipotent and omnipresent God; and when the admirable arrangements of Providence were pointed out as proofs, they listened patiently and answered, my friend, you are very eloquent, I wish I could speak like you; and then added, that it was the earth, and not God, that gave every thing. Monsieur de Montel, finding a Carib at work on a Sunday, told him that the Being who made the heaven and the earth, would be angry with him, as he had set apart that day for his own service. The Carib, unable to penetrate beyond what he saw with his eyes, replied coarsely, I am angry at your God; you say he is the ruler of the world and the seasons;—it is he, then, who has not sent rain in due season, and has caused my manioc and potatoes to die. Since he has used me so ill, I shall work all Sunday to vex him. This brutality, the author remarks, is like that of another savage, who, when told that God was the author of thunder, remarked that he could not be good, since he took such pleasure in terrifying them with it. Remarks like these, could proceed only from minds incapable of embracing general principles, or following out a chain of reasoning to its proper results. They possess only that kind of acuteness which proceeds from active knowing faculties, jumping to a visible conclusion. The Caribs were never able to comprehend the doctrine of Christianity, and although many were baptized as a means of protection against one of their own demons, they always considered Christianity as ridiculous and unworthy of men.

Justice was not publicly administered amongst them. Every one was his own avenger, and was held in contempt if he did not resent injuries. They almost never stole from each other; so that when any thing was missing from their huts, their first exclamation was, a Christian has been here. * * * * * *

The Caribs were extremely fond of their children, and the mothers were tender and excellent nurses; which trait corresponds with the great development of Philoprogenitiveness in all Carib skulls without exception, of which the Phrenological Society possesses casts. They were scarcely less kind to the children of their neighbors, when the parents were absent in war. They left the infant the free use of its limbs, and allowed it to roll about on the ground; and by this constant exercise most of them were able to walk at six months old, and all of them were finely formed,—deformity, except from wounds, being unknown amongst them. They were carefully taught the various qualifications of an able warrior; to draw the bow, endure hunger and fatigue, and cherish revenge against their enemies. To fit them for the first of these duties, it was a common practice for the parents, almost as soon as the child was able to walk, to tie its basket by a thread to the branch of a tree, put a bow and arrow into its hands, and tell it to eat when it could bring it down; and no pity was shown them if it failed. As the children grew older, the breakfast was suspended from a higher branch, till at last their dexterity in cutting the thread became almost incredibly great. This may serve as a hint in our systems of education.

In accordance with their deficient reasoning powers, the author remarks, that their language can not express any relation which does not fall under their five senses, except the names of some good and evil spirits; but beyond this they have no word to express any thing spiritual, such as understanding, memory, or will, and they have no comparatives or superlatives. They have names for only four colors, white, black, yellow, red. Can this last have relation to a small development of the organ of coloring? They are easily managed by kindness, but harshness totally fails. They have strict regard for cleanliness, which, he says, is extraordinary in savages.

The naiveté of the author in commenting on the omission of swaddling in treatment of infants, as was the universal custom in Europe when he wrote, is very amusing. He says that the Carib mothers allow their infants to tumble about on beds of cotton or dried leaves, without either bandage or swaddling clothes; and that nevertheless (neantmoins) they do not become deformed, but grow marvellously well, and most of them become so robust that they can walk when six months old, and all of them are straight and well made! This he seems to have considered a truly marvellous result, and it never once occurred to his simple and civilized understanding, that the savages were in this respect reaping the reward of fulfilling the intentions of nature, while his deformed country-women were enjoying the necessary fruits of their own absurd aberrations. The modern Europeans may gather an useful lesson from the testimony now quoted, if they choose to avail themselves of it.— Annals of Phrenology.

MARRIAGES.

In Newport, Herkimer county, October 21st, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. Wm. S. Benchley, to Miss Roxy Ann Post, daughter of Dan Post, Esq., all of that town.

In Duanesburgh, Schenectada county, on the 18th inst., by Rev. Mr. Thomas, Mr. Robert C. Chapman, of this city, to Miss Ann Sorenda Whipple, of the former place.

In Grove, Allegany county, October 14th, by Rev. W. E. Manley, Mr. James H. Kellogg, to Miss Sally Wilson, both of Grove.

DEATHS.

In Dover, Cuyahoga county, O., October 3d, Mrs. Anna Taylor, wife of Mr. Jonathan Taylor, aged 50 years. The deceased was a firm believer in the restitution of all things. Though subject to severe attacks of a lingering complaint, she endured her lot with resignation and fortitude, and retained her reason to the last.

A. M. Coe.

In Morristown, St. Lawrence county, August 10th, Mary J. Wallrath, aged 5 years, 6 months, and 5 days. Funeral services on the 19th, when the consolations of the Gospel were presented to the parents, and a large and attentive audience by the writer.

O. Wilcox.

In Depeyster, on the 15th of September, Joseph Rounds, one of the oldest and most respected citizens of that town. In this dispensation of divine Providence, an aged companion and a numerous circle of children and friends are left to mourn their loss. Services by the writer.

O. Wilcox.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.

This valuable work, which has been favorably noticed in the N. Y. Mirror, New-Yorker, the Boston Pearl and Galaxy, and sundry other periodicals, may be had at our Bookstore, wholesale and retail—in cloth, $7.20 per dozen, or 75 cents single; in elegant morocco, $9.60 per dozen, or $1.00 single; morocco extra, $12.00 per dozen, or $1.25 single; Turkey and other morocco, extra and gilt edge, $15.00 per dozen, or $1.50 single.

Those who wish to make presents to their young friends, will not find a more beautiful and valuable gift than this work in these splendid bindings.

Orders respectfully solicited.

Grosh and Hutchinson.
41 Genesee-street.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

Terms.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. Grosh, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1838. NUMBER 45.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;
FOR SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1838.

HEB. XII: 1-14.

The attentive reader of these "Sunday Mails" may have noticed that the general plan of our remarks has been, firstly, to investigate for what objects and in what circumstances the passage under consideration was originally spoken or written, and thus determine its real and primitive import or meaning; and, secondly, to turn the passage thus correctly interpreted to some useful account for our own case—to build up in our most holy faith, to remind us of our duty, or generally, to edify in righteousness. Such is an outline of the course which we will pursue in the illustration of the present passage, and such seems the plan most conducive to make the New Testament scriptures, what Paul affirmed those of the Old Dispensation to be—"profitable for teaching, for confutation, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, for making the man of God perfect, and thoroughly fitted for every good work."

The first converts to Christianity were generally Jews, either those resident in their own land, Judea, or those "dispersed abroad" among whom it was a custom to come up to Jerusalem at the great festivals. Those who lived in Judea were called Hebrews, to distinguish them from their brethren in Gentile countries, who were called Hellenists or Grecians. This remark will illustrate, and be illustrated by the following passages. Acts vi: 1; ix: 29; xi: 20.

From the records of ecclesiastical history we learn, that these first converts to Christianity were subjected to virulent and unceasing persecution by their brethren who still adhered to the institutions of Moses. This persecution commenced soon after the ascension of Jesus, (indeed, those who professed their faith in Jesus as the Messiah were persecuted during his life-time,) and was open and violent at the time we first hear of Paul as a forward actor in the scenes. From that time to the time at which this epistle was written, about A. D. 61 or 62, those who professed their faith in Jesus were assailed by their brethren with outrage, threats, ridicule, argument,—in every form they were persecuted, to withdraw them from the profession of Christianity. To these persecuted Hebrews this epistle was addressed, to refute the arguments of their opposers, and to encourage them to steadfastness in their profession.

In the former part of the epistle, the apostle had refuted all the arguments alleged by the persecuting Jews to withdraw their converted brethren from the profession of Christianity. From the tenor of the argument, we may infer that the objections of the unconverted were, chiefly, these:—that the law of Moses was given by the ministration of angels; that Moses, himself, was far superior to Jesus Christ, who suffered an ignominious death; that the public worship of God, instituted by their great legislator and prophet, was truly splendid and worthy of Jehovah, while the Christians, on the contrary, had no established priesthood, no temple, no altars, no victims, etc. In opposition to such arrangements, the apostle proves that Jesus of Nazareth, was the Messiah, the Son of God, and far superior to the angels, to Moses, to the high-priest of the Old Testament, and to all the other priests; and the Gospel, superior to the law.

Having thus obviated the insinuations, and answered the arguments of the unbelieving Jews against the Gospel of Christ, as inferior to the dispensation of Moses, by proving, from their own scriptures, its transcendent excellence, the apostle proceeds to fortify the minds of the believing Hebrews against the persecutions which they were obliged to endure, on account of their adherence to their belief in Jesus. For this purpose, he reminds them of the sufferings they had already endured for the sake of the Gospel, and of the pernicious consequences of apostatizing from their faith. Chap. x: 26, to the end. In the 11th chapter, the apostle adduces examples from their own scriptures and history, of persons who had resisted great temptations, endured heavy persecutions, and triumphantly overcome the most formidable difficulties and dangers. These patriarchs, kings, prophets and righteous men, whose faithfulness and fortitude, the apostle had celebrated in the preceding chapter, we find him, in the commencement of our paragraph, representing as a company of spectators looking upon the Hebrews in their present combat. In the presence of such eminent spectators he exhorts them to exert themselves to the utmost, so as to deserve their approbation, taking strength and encouragement from the example of these distinguished persons, and more especially from the example of Jesus, whom he represents as also looking on, and whose virtues and sufferings were more particularly worthy of imitation, and more applicable to their own case and circumstances.

As a further encouragement to persons in their afflicted and persecuted circumstances, the apostle calls to their remembrance those consolatory views of affliction which their own scriptures furnished them with. In accordance with the teachings of these, the difficulties and afflictions, with which it has pleased the All-wise Disposer to encompass our lot in this life, are to be regarded as the provisions of a Father's wisdom and love for our improvement in virtue and happiness. These chastisements were not dictated by caprice, as are many of the punishments of earthly parents, but by unerring wisdom and infinite kindness, and are all intended for our profit. By such considerations the apostle seeks to render his Hebrew brethren resigned and submissive to the arrangements of divine Providence, and calmly courageous to bear the evils to which they were exposed on account of a good cause—for Christ's sake and his Gospel. Such is a brief outline of the object and argument of the epistle at large, and of our paragraph in particular.

Now, what is the application of all this to ourselves? If we see it not, let us ask ourselves what we can do to promote the great cause for which Jesus came into this world. That cause was the moral improvement, advancement, and regeneration of his brethren. For this cause did God set up for him a kingdom ever-enlarging, ever-enduring.—This cause we can do something to forward, if not in a wider sphere, at least in our own breasts, and in our families. Whatever we can do in promoting this cause, and in whatever sphere, we are called upon to do, that we ought to do; and the considerations suggested to the Hebrews to support and animate them, may be usefully employed for our own benefit. If we have no outward enemies or opposers, we have not a few internally. Old habits, love of ease, love of money, love of the world, want of persevering endeavors, are as hard to overcome, as the ridicule or the reasonings of adversaries. Let us bind ourselves to the prosecution of this great work, so deeply impressed with its importance, that we shall be able to conquer all difficulties, all dangers, all obstacles, that we may be worthy followers of the Captain of our salvation, and merit at the last his applause.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

JESUS, A COVERT.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"And a man shall be as a hiding-place from the wind, and as a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place; as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." ISAIAH xxxii: 2.

The above passage contains a variety of rich and pleasing imagery, designed to show the serenity that shall be enjoyed under the kingdom of the Messiah. A single metaphor is all we design to present. He is "a covert from the tempest."—On this word, Cruden presents the following:—"1. An umbrage, or shady place, 1 Sam. xxv: 20. 2. A thicket for wild beasts, Job xxxviii: 40. 3. Something made to shelter the people from the weather on the Sabbath; or some costly chair of state, wherein the kings of Judah used to hear the priests expound the law on the Sabbath, 2 Kings xvi: 18. 4. Christ Jesus, the saints' shelter, defence, or refuge, Isa. xxxii: 2."

David applies this figure to the Almighty, when speaking of the confidence which he reposed in him: "For thou hast been a shelter for me, and a strong tower from the enemy. I will abide in thy tabernacle forever. I will trust in the covert of thy wings."—Psalms lxi: 3, 4. It is very probable that the prophet drew this figure from a custom in the East, where travellers find it very necessary and refreshing, "in a weary land," to erect a shelter, or covert. To such places there is an evident allusion. They are to be met with in every part of Arabia and Egypt.

Jesus, then, is "a covert from the tempest." Happy thought! When, in the journey of life, storms beat upon us, we may find in him permanent rest and security. Hear him speaking to the weary and the afflicted: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." "Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God; believe also in me." Such truths in affliction are indeed consoling to the mind; like the gentle dew upon the tender plant; like the calm sunshine after the convulsion of a tempest; like water to a thirsty soul. In Jesus every want is supplied. There is no wound which he can not heal; no cloud so dark that he can not paint the bow of hope upon it; no tempest so severe that he can not succeed it by clear skies. And when we have passed through the "weary land," he will bear us in his arms to that world where storms and tempests are never known, and where we shall dwell around the throne of love and purity forever more.

"In him the naked soul shall find
A hiding-place from chilling wind;
Or, when the raging tempests beat,
A covert warm, a safe retreat.

"In burning sands, and thirsty ground,
He like a river shall be found;
Or lofty rock, beneath whose shade
The weary traveller rests his head."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

REFLECTIONS.

BY. J. S. KIBBE.

When the last beams of the bright king of day have vanished from the horizon, and descended the western declivity, to awaken into life and beauty the gloomy aspect of other climes, and night's sable curtains are gently spread over the landscape, or darker still, when despair sits brooding upon the brow of humanity, and corroding anguish poisons the pleasures of life, and the soul is tossed upon the dark rolling wave of affliction, then it is that man needs an angel of peace to soothe his troubled bosom, and quell the tempest that rages around his lonely spirit. And then it is that hope enchanting smiles, and lends her golden pinions to waft his sinking spirit upwards. She beguiles the sorrowing heart, and soothes the soul of anguish—as > ——"her glittering wings explore

> Earth's loneliest bounds, and ocean's wildest shore."

Hope is a star, lighted up in the pathway of human existence, whose radiant beams illuminate the dark recesses of the soul, and relume with life and joy, the lone tenant of this earthly frame. There is no gloom which her light can not scatter, and no darkness so dense that her melting beams can not penetrate it. She is an angel of relief, hovering over the mansions of sorrow, whose siren voice falls upon the ear as gently as the moonbeams upon the western wave. There is no grief that she can not alleviate, and no misery so intense that she can not blend with it some pleasure to beguile its sting—some joy to evade its shafts.

Give man but the radiant light of Hope's beaming star, and he will pursue it with as much eagerness as does the child the painted insect. But extinguish the last remaining spark, and he sinks, without a struggle, the hapless child of wo, and the sacrificial offering upon the burning altar of hopeless despondency. Let the merciless waves of sorrow and oppression beat with the fierceness of the rolling tempest upon his soul, yet, if one solitary gleam finds way to his bosom, to warm and cheer his drooping spirit, it will awake with new life and strength; but let Hope's bright star be blotted from the firmament of human existence, and man sinks in despair. It is the beacon of joy, lighted up to cheer the pilgrims of earth, and guide them across life's gloomy waste—to dispel the darkness which gathers around the tomb, and light the lamp of immortal bliss over the wreck of mortal man.

> Who can "expanding truth invidious view,
> And think or wish the song of Hope untrue?"

It is, in fact, the bright spirit which has ever lingered in the bosom of humanity, and refused to desert them in their utmost extremity, and which still soothes their sorrows in the lap of peace, and points the spirit, longing for immortality, to the realms of endless day beyond the tomb. And it inspires mankind with a desire to prolong their existence through eternity; and promises them that when life's last flickering ray is glimmering by, and all earthly pleasures have vanished, and gone faintly shining to the dust, we shall live again in fadeless bloom, where bliss immortal never dies. So strongly is this desire implanted in the human breast, and so fondly cherished, that were it extinguished, mankind would be but a blank in creation—a bubble thrown up by the ocean of time, to glitter and dazzle a moment, and sink forever in the gulf of hopeless despair. But with the consolation it imparts, man can exclaim,

> "What is the bigot's torch, the tyrant's chain—
> I smile on death, if heaven-ward Hope remain!"

Clinton, October, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate

EFFECTS OF SIN AND RIGHTEOUSNESS.

BY REV. H. TORREY.

"Thy wickedness may hurt a man as thou art; and thy righteousness may profit the son of man." JOB XXXV: 8.

A truth so important and momentous as is contained in the above passage of Scripture, is deemed worthy of notice. It should be impressed upon the heart, there to remain as a monitor within.—There are but few in Christendom, who correctly understand the legitimate effects of sin—the consequences resulting from a course of wickedness and crime. Contention in the mind of the Christian church, ever has, and does still, exist in relation to this subject: the opinions of men are greatly at variance with regard to the natural effect of the commission of sin; and, hence, if we can establish the truth by an appeal to the Holy Bible, it will be very essential and altogether satisfactory.

Before men engage in the performance of any labor, they cast the perceptive eye forward to the result—to the probable effect of their work; and if they conceive it to be good, to be beneficial in the promotion of their best interest, they will pursue their purposes with unrelenting vigor, having a fair prospect as an incentive to action. But if they should see evil, misery, and wretchedness, as the inevitable consequence of their operations, they would immediately cease from carrying into execution their previous designs. So with a sinner—if he is permitted to scan the awful effects of sin—to imagine the piercing pangs of conscious guilt, which he would necessarily experience after the commission of crime—he would revolt from wickedness, detest a course of sin, and turn from the evil of his ways. And hence, it is very important that men should become acquainted with the natural and necessary effects of sin, lest, like the blind, they should, unawares, fall into the miry ditch of human iniquity.

"Thy wickedness may hurt a man as thou art." Now, there are many persons who suppose that the wicked actions of men greatly affect the God of heaven—that the small sins of finite man, agitate an infinite and eternal Jehovah with fury and malevolence. Such a notion I consider vain and preposterous, because it is written, "If thou sinnest, what doest thou against him? or if thy transgressions be multiplied, what doest thou unto him?" Thus we perceive that our wickedness does not have the least effect upon an almighty and immutable God; but that the evil influence of sinful indulgences, is alone exerted upon vain mortals. Again: others suppose that a course of wickedness affords great pleasure and happiness to the sinner, while in this life; that he can run counter to the just commands of Heaven—trample the precepts of Jesus as dust and ashes under his feet, and violate all the laws of religion and morality, with a joyful heart and a quiet mind. And thus, while revelling in the haunts of vice—grovelling in detestable darkness—sunk into the most cruel debauchery, and pursuing the road to ruin and destruction, they are told by the preacher, that in such a course, their hearts will be filled with joy extatic, and their bosoms beat with emotions of gladness; for which they will receive, in the future state of existence, their reward amidst the endless burnings of hell! But such a supposition would be erroneous in the extreme; for "the wicked are like the troubled sea," whose waters can not rest—there is no peace to a guilty soul—the wicked shall be recompensed in the earth, and their damnation slumbereth not. Their wickedness hurteth no one but themselves—they alone experience the gnawings of the worm that never dies—it corrodes the heart, and pours its showers of vengeance there!

"Thy wickedness may hurt a man as thou art." From this I would argue, that the effects of sin must be experienced in the present state of existence, because, when we pass through the shadow of death, we become changed from corruption to incorruption, from mortal to immortality—and hence we are immortal and incorruptible beings. And now, Elihu, in speaking to Job, says, "wickedness may hurt a man as thou art. What was Job? A mortal. And as wickedness can hurt only such a man as Job, who was mortal, we can no longer feel its poignant daggers than while bound in the shackles of mortality; for at the last trump we shall be changed into beings, as the angels of heaven, quite different from what we now are; and as the effects of sin can hurt only mortals such as Job, we are very sure that in the world of immortal bliss, the wicked will cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest.

If the sinner can be convinced that misery follows crime in quick succession—that the just recompense of reward shall be given him on the very day of transgression—that by doing wrong, he will "hurt" himself in the opinion of a virtuous public—that he will be "lightly esteemed" by the honest and upright of all who know him, in view of his degradation; and that "God will by no means clear the guilty"—will he not be induced to "cease to do evil, and learn to do well"? Believing, also, that "the soul that sinneth, it shall die," let us not lull to repose the guilty conscience, by singing the siren song of "peace, peace, when there is no peace," saith my God to the wicked. These truths should be enforced upon the mind, until every sinner shall repentingly exclaim, "If I have done iniquity, I will do so no more."

"And thy righteousness may profit the son of man." Man only is to be profited by his righteousness: by doing good, we benefit ourselves, our neighbors, and the community at large. The effect of "doing as you would be done by," is wholly upon man; it does not profit God nor Jesus Christ, in the least, for us to be righteous, but it adds to our own enjoyment, increases our happiness. We should live the religion of Jesus—practice his precepts, and obey his commands; for it is said, "If they obey and serve him, they shall spend their days in prosperity, and their years in pleasure." Thus our minds would be elevated by the glorious effects resulting from a course of righteousness—our feelings refined by the ennobling principles of Christianity—our hearts purified by the love of God, and constituted the altar of pure devotion—our minds enriched by a knowledge of the Lord, and our whole soul would feel to exclaim, "Glory to God in the highest."

How sad and deplorable the effects of sin!—how transcendantly glorious and lovely the effects of righteousness! Remember, reader, that the path of wickedness is strewn with thorns and thistles, which tear the bosom in agony, and rankle cruelly there; but that peace, tranquillity, and happiness spread their balmy wings over the man of righteousness, calming his bosom by the soft tones of affection—leading him by the still waters of love, into the Gospel path of holiness and truth, where the sweet flowers of faith, hope, and charity are so abundantly dispensed—and where, too, the afflicted mourner can alleviate his sorrow by drinking of that water, of which if any man drink, he shall never thirst—drawn from the wells of salvation. Oh! yes—the righteous man findeth a consolation in the Gospel of Jesus, sufficiently glorious to soften all the ills of life! And, therefore, reader, in view of these things, "go and sin no more"; and by thy "daily walk and conversation," hasten on that blissful period, when

> "From every place below the skies,
> The ardent song, the fervent prayer,
> The incense of the heart, shall rise
> To heaven, and find acceptance there."

Ravenna, Ohio, October, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PLEASURES OF SIN.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

How often are we told that there is pleasure to be derived from a course of vicious habits; that there is happiness to be found in the paths of transgression, and peace and joy to the soul in the corrupt and loathsome haunts of sin! Even from the sacred desk, where religion should be exalted, and vice degraded, we are told that the way of the transgressor is easy; that flowers of happiness spring up on every side, and fountains of pleasure gush forth on every hand; that there is nothing there to disturb "the soul's calm sunshine, and the heartfelt joy"—but that the sun shines there with a serener ray, and the birds have a sweeter song!

Now, we must expect to see vice and infidelity stalking abroad at noon-day, so long as so pernicious a sentiment is taught from the sacred desk. No wonder that man quaffs of the poisonous bowl, alienates himself from kindred and kind, degrades himself below a level with the beasts that perish, and at last ends a career of infamy in despair, and fills a drunkard's grave, so long as he is told, by pretended embassadors from God, that there is pleasure in sin, and joy in the sparkling wine! No wonder that man indulges in the lowest of vicious habits, and pursues the highway of crime and blood, while he is taught in the temple of the Most High, that there is misery in the practice of religion! No wonder that the most unheard of crimes are committed; that lewdness and libertinism are practised under the very droppings of the sanctuary of God, so long as it is preached and believed, that peace and joy slumber in the bosoms of the unrighteous and the ungodly! Sin and wickedness will continue to infest every walk of life, and every avenue of society, so long as they find such able advocates in these professed preachers of the Gospel—iniquity and crime will continue to abound, entering even into the church of God, and degrading its altars of worship!

I can not conceive of a sentiment more licentious in its tendency, more demoralizing in its influence, than that which I have been portraying. If we wish for vice and iniquity to disappear from our midst, we must tell mankind, that if happiness is their object, they must seek it in the religion of Christ, and not in sinful indulgences. We must tell them that religion is the one thing needful; that it is an angel of peace, sent to cheer the benighted and wandering; a messenger despatched from the regions of glory, to proclaim joy to the world, to invite the weary to repose, to heal the wounds that sin and grief have made, to sing a song of gladness in the ears of the disconsolate, to impart hope and confidence to the soul, to be our stay and support through life, and when we come to die, to put a song of triumph on our lips. We must likewise tell them that sin is an enemy of the human race; that under a robe of smiles it conceals the venom of asps, and allures to its embraces only to destroy; that it places in the sinner's bosom, a hell to scathe and wither every joy, and blast and destroy every hope; and that there is no peace, no happiness, no rest, no joy, in the ways of vice; but, on the contrary, that the sin of man will assuredly find him out, and bring tribulation and anguish to his soul!

Harford, October, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

WHAT IS MAN THAT THOU ART MINDFUL OF HIM?

"Father," said a young man who was daily in the habit of recapitulating to his parents the sum and substance of his reading and reflections—"Father, I was reading to-day the 8th Psalm, and endeavoring to represent to myself the state of David's mind, when, as he viewed by night the starry heavens with their innumerable orbs of light, and thought of the immensity of that universe over which God's providence and care extended, and of the insignificance of man in such a widely-extended creation, he exclaimed, 'What is man that thou, God, art mindful of him; or the son of man that thou visitest him?' Judging after the manner of men, David must have felt that if such an immensity of objects were committed to the care of a man, so small a speck, as it were, as the place which man holds in such an universe, must be often, if not altogether, overlooked. Do you think, father, that David had any idea that the moon and stars were the abodes of habitation for sentient and intellectual beings as this globe is?"

"It is possible, but I think it very little probable, that such an idea should be entertained by David. I think it was quite sufficient to have produced the feeling to which David gave expression, in the sentence which has arrested your attention, that he should think of the numberless objects of God's care upon the earth, and then, as he looked up to the magnificent and widely-extended firmament, should be impressed with the feeling that these remote and seemingly more glorious objects would claim more of the attention and the care of the Almighty. His own experience, as a king, of his aptitude to neglect the interests and the welfare of remote or obscure subjects, would suggest the thought of surprise that it was not so with God. David felt as if this world was the remotest of God's dominions, and so liable to be forgotten or neglected."

"I think, then, father, if the contemplation of the vastness of creation, could have produced such devout sentiments in one unacquainted with astronomical discoveries, no one, now, can escape having similar feelings forced upon him, when he thinks of the wonders of modern discovery. If David had thought of the moon's being habitable, it would have heightened his surprise."

"For years we have seldom looked upon the firmament above, in a contemplative mood, without some conception of the infinity of beings, sentient and intelligent, who, in these countless worlds, are drinking of the rivers of enjoyment which flow from the Ocean of Love, and expressing their well-feeling or their gratitude in playful or useful activity, or in such devotional language as that of David. We have thought that probably each of our twelve planets were as full of life as our own, and where life is, there is enjoyment. We have thought that each of these stars was the sun of another system of planets and their moons or satellites. Of the distance of our own sun, we could form some faint conception—of 95,000,000 miles; but of the distance of the fixed stars, or of the nearest of these suns of other worlds, we could form no imagination. They have been supposed, you know, to be about 400,000 times further from us than we are from the sun, that is 38,000,000 of millions of miles, and that it would take a cannon ball between four and five millions of years to reach one of them, and probably as many more to reach another. Such distances exceed the utmost efforts of our imagination, and we are lost in the infinity and immensity of such conceptions. When we think of the prodigious number of these suns of other worlds, we are again forced to remember the littleness of the tenants of ours. It is said 3,000 are visible to the naked eye, but when the heavens are viewed through the telescope, the stars become visible in numbers wholly incalculable. Two thousand have been counted in the small space of one of the constellations. When we call to mind these and similar revelations of modern astronomy, our imaginations labor in the vain endeavor to conceive such vastness, and would not the hearts of the children of men sink within them, as insignificant atoms in such immensity, were not each of us supported and consoled by the assurance, that 'OUR FATHER made them all.'"

A. N. S. S.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PENMANSHIP.

This is an art which comes within the province of every man—an art truly useful and ornamental, which all desire, and which all may attain.—To write with facility and ease, neatness and elegance, is certainly an attainment worth seeking for, and without which, no one can be said to be fully accomplished; for penmanship stands pre-eminent in the list of accomplishments, if not first in point of utility. When I speak of penmanship, I have reference to first-rate writing; not the illegible scribbling of the present day which almost supersedes the use of letters, syllables and words. Nothing can be more vexatious than to peruse the written composition of the really learned. Yes, those who rank highest in the circles of literature, are the most deficient in this art. Whether it is considered of minor importance as an accomplishment, or as of little value to themselves, or beneath their dignity, is more than I know; but this much we do know, that our poorest writers are our best scholars. Collegiates, those who are to figure conspicuously in the halls of science, neglect this important branch above all others. It may be said that all can not make good writers, but to this doctrine I can not subscribe. I believe all who have the free use of those instruments nature gave them, (their hands) can make good penmen.—It is practice which gives one man a superiority over another in this branch. Practice, indeed, here makes perfect. Our farmers and mechanics can not be expected to write always with the same facility, but they may all write a fair hand—generally speaking, our farmers and mechanics are better writers than the lawyers and M. D.'s, and the whole fraternity of literati. Contributors to periodicals should be the best of penmen.—By writing a neat and legible hand, we will save our Editors much labor and anxiety, ourselves the mortification of having our communications altered or misconstrued from badness of penmanship, amounting sometimes to an entire rejection. It is to be hoped that there will be a new action in this branch of instruction; more and better cultivation, than it has received for some years past. Our school teachers, it stands them in hand to practice this highly useful art—to become themselves good penmen. For a few years this branch of instruction has been entirely overlooked in our common schools, either from an incapacity to teach it, or from the misjudged notion of its not being a proper place. This inattention and neglect to one of the most useful, elegant and important arts, calls loudly for reform. Every person may become a penman by his own exertions. All the necessary requisites, are attention, practice, and a model of imitation. These surely offer great inducements—incentives of the most flattering kind to prompt to action, perseverance, and finally perfection.

ASA.

South Venice, N. Y., September 4, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

MINUTES OF THE CAYUGA ASSOCIATION FOR 1838.

The council convened, according to adjournment, in Speedsville, Tompkins county, September 26th, and organized by choosing Br. J. Badgley, Moderator, and Br. N. Brown, Clerk. Prayer by Dr. Green. Read the minutes for 1837. The Committee of discipline, who were instructed to consider the case of Br. John Annear, reported as follows:—That as Br. Annear was induced to surrender his letter of fellowship last Spring to Br. West of Cincinnati, this Association no longer has any jurisdiction over him; and therefore, as he has ceased to be a preacher among us, the denomination is no longer responsible for his conduct. Report accepted. The society in Salina was received into the fellowship of the Association. Brs. A. G. Clark, Aikin and Jenks were appointed to arrange the public services.—Brs. G. W. Montgomery, W. Bullard, and W. Babcock, of Scipio, were appointed the Committee of discipline for the ensuing year. Brs. Berry, of Homer, Montgomery, and Green, were appointed the Committee on fellowship and ordination for the ensuing year. This Committee reported in favor of granting a letter of fellowship to Br. N. Brown, of Salina; which was unanimously adopted. Brs. S. Larned, of Groton, and A. Clark, of Elbridge. W. Bullard and N. Brown, were chosen as delegates to the next State Convention. Br. N. Brown was chosen to deliver the next occasional sermon, with power to choose a substitute. The council adjourned to meet in Genoa, Cayuga county, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in September, 1839. During the session, Brs. W. Babcock, N. Brown and G. W. Montgomery, were appointed to draw up a new article to be added to the Constitution. Their report was adopted. The new article is this:—When any candidate shall signify his intention to preach, that intention shall be entered on the records and published minutes of the session of the Association at which such signification is made. And the Committee on fellowship shall be required to ascertain that he has preached and conducted to the acceptance of the people among whom he has labored, before they report in favor of granting him a letter of fellowship at a subsequent session of the Association. But if a preacher has labored in the bounds of another Association for one year, and then removes into this Association, he shall, on application at any session of the Association, receive a letter of fellowship, provided he produces satisfactory testimony of the above qualifications, by letters or from friends at the session acquainted with him.

PREACHERS PRESENT.—N. Brown, Salina; S. Barnes, Perry; A. G. Clark, Upper Lisle; C. S. Brown, Lisle; G. Sanderson, at large; Dr. Green and H. Green, Virgil; ——— Gage, Clinton; W. Bullard, Cortland; A. C. Barray, at large; G. W. Montgomery, Auburn.

DELEGATES PRESENT.—J. Badgley, B. Roberts, Cortland; T. Simonds, H. H. Watson, Genoa; T. Moore, T. Green, Virgil Corners; I. E. Cook, E. Taintor, Harford; L. P. Aikins, C. Jenks, Speedsville; W. Babcock, L. Birch, Scipio.

REMARKS.—Eight sermons were preached to good acceptance. Peace was in our councils, devotion and piety in our worship, and praise in our hearts. Our Speedsville friends exhibited the kind and warm hospitalities of brethren and sisters, for which, we hope, they felt themselves repaid. All went on harmoniously, and we separated with the hope of ultimately joining in the association of the whole world in the presence of God and the Lamb. G. W. MONTGOMERY, Standing Clerk.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 34.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Bethany, Va., September 30, 1838.

Mr. SKINNER—If not a logical you are certainly an ingenious disputant. Foreseeing the conclusion of our debate, you voluntarily threw yourself three months behind me, instead of keeping one month before me. Thus your last letter of September 7th is a professed reply to my June letter, No. 26. This interposes a threefold veil between you and your readers, and hides the irrelevancy and imbecility of your defence. Few of them, you know, will put themselves to the trouble to look back and read a letter three months on file. If they do in the present case, they will leave me little to do: they will readily perceive that it meets not fairly a single point; or that it is a mere feint—a mock assault upon my outposts. How tame you have become! From standing before me sword in hand to assail my approach to your mighty bulwarks, you have thrown away your sword, taken your bow and arrow, and retreated a hundred yards behind me, and, with an empty quiver, you are now fixing your strings and shooting feathers, instead of feathered arrows, into the air. Such are my unfeigned views of your present attitude—if the above figure is only tolerably expounded.

2. Your first six paragraphs, (except your denial of the existence of satan and his angels,) in which you have placed yourself where I have long thought you ought to stand—with the skeptics of the present day; have not a single word deserving a reply; they are all mere assertion without fact, and without reason to support them. He that denies or doubts the existence of satan, and his history as given in the Bible, may as well deny the Messiah whom he tempted, and ease his conscience of all the restraints of the Old Testament and New. I was scarcely prepared for such a candid avowal of your infidelity as the fifth paragraph unfolds.

3. I did not think but that there was at least one among the leading Universalists, that, however hardly pressed, would still save appearances and respect the Bible and the common sense of Christendom. But it seems you feel yourself driven beyond those precincts, and fearlessly avow your disbelief in the existence of satan and his angels. You regard a real, a personal being called satan, as the work of poets—as a centaur, a sphynx, a chimera. You have so far thrown off the mask, and jeeringly spoken of satan as Paine, Hume, and Voltaire were wont to do. With you, they sneeringly asked, "Is the devil self-existent?—Who made satan? Is he omnipotent? Is he omnipresent?" If I can not sympathize with you in your hard destiny and present distress, I can nevertheless admire your temerity!

4. After this, I do not wonder at the liberties you take with what I have written, when you respect so little the word of my Lord. There are more misrepresentations than paragraphs in your letter before me. You say Solomon never said that there was no work nor device, nor knowledge nor wisdom, in hades, or the world of spirits.—Open the Septuagint and see "hades" with your eyes; open Adam Clarke and read his old manuscript Bible, and see the identical word transferred—"There is no work," etc. "in hell whither thou art going." You formerly approved my version of hades as the place of departed spirits.—Now you recant, do you! But you assume that Solomon called the whole man the body, and said, there is no wisdom, etc. whither thou (thy body) goest. Your bold contradiction is therefore returned to your own bosom.

5. Your exposition of the end of Christ's death is just what I anticipated. You do not believe that he died "to expiate sin:" for among the ends of his death you never name it, paragraph 10.—You say he died for the joy set before him!!—he died to show the love of God—he died that he might destroy the devil, and you have denied his existence!—he died that he might succor the tempted, and you have no other tempter than lust!! This is all the use you have for the Messiah. I do not wonder at it. You have annihilated satan to get rid of hell; and now you have made foolish the death of Christ to obviate both punishment and pardon.

6. In the 11th paragraph you give us a sublime view of the reason of the hope that is in you. It might have been more clearly told, though not so verbosely eloquent, in one breath:—"I rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory in the hope of heaven, because there is no real satan, no devil, no hell." Yes, Sir, your hope of heaven is founded on your glorious Gospel that satan and hell are mere bugbears—like the tales of ghosts and witches, etc., etc.

7. Your united strength of Calvinism and Arminianism reminds me of a popular mode of quoting Scripture. One Scripture says, "Judas went and hanged himself:" another Scripture says, "Go, thou, and do likewise." Now, says Mr. Skinner, he that does not go and hang himself has resisted the united strength of Christ and his apostles! This is a just comment on your 12th paragraph.

8. The remainder of your letter has nothing worthy of reply. It is a distortion or misrepresentation of the few points to which reference is had in it. You have only fully proved your disbelief in the death of Christ as an expiation of sin, and of forgivness, and re-asserted what you will find amply anticipated and refuted in my last letter, forwarded about the time your present epistle seems to have been written. The points in my last, which cover all that remains in your present letter, are found in the eight following points deduced from your former assertions, which are only once more repeated in the present communication:—

9. 1st. Paul says, "Jesus expiated or purged away our sins." Mr. Skinner says, The sinner's own sufferings expiate his sins. 2d. John says, "We love him because he first loved us." Mr. Skinner says, After the post mortem suffering, all sinners will love him, because he has first punished them for all their sins. 3d. Paul says, "After death the judgment:" Mr. Skinner says, After death the expiation and purification of sin. 4th. David and Paul say, "Blessed are they whose iniquities are pardoned:" Mr. Skinner says, Blessed are they whose sins are fully punished, "because God does and will punish every sinner according to the full demerit of his crimes, and there is no escape." 5th. David says, "There is forgiveness with God," and Daniel says, "To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgiveness:" Mr. Skinner says, he punishes every sinner and there is no escape; consequently no mercy nor forgiveness with God. 6th. Paul asks, "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" Mr. Skinner answers, Under another dispensation after death. 7th. Christ says, "Work while it is day—the night cometh [death and hades] in which no man can work:" Mr. Skinner says, All who die in their sins can work out their own salvation by suffering in purgatory according to their deeds. 8th. And to consummate the whole, Mr. Skinner represents God as punishing those who love him with all their hearts, souls, mind and strength: or, in other words, those who "have ceased to do evil and learned to do well," those who have entered purgatory and left off sinning, contrary to the whole Bible, Old Testament and New.

10. If in your defence of yourself in any one point in the remainder of your letter, you have succeeded in the estimation of any one who reads the articles to which you pretend to reply, I would not spend a sentence to recover him from your snare. He is not worth saving from your system. The best defence of yourself is in paragraphs 20, 21, and 22. In paragraph 20 you say, "Sin is a disease; Christ is a physician: punishment is one of the various kinds of medicines he administers to cure the patient." But is not punishment the only medicine used in purgatory—the grand specific which saves all the incurable cases that die in their sins!—Sin a disease! Christ a physician! punishment his mild medicine, his sovereign specific, in hades! What an imagination! What should we think of a physician who healed our physical diseases by punishment! Yet these are your splendid conceptions of sin, Christ, and punishment!! How much it relieves your system to ask, "Is satan self-existent, omnipotent, omnipresent!" Substitute sin, and your wisdom will be more wonderful. Is sin a misfortune, a self-existent, an omnipotent, omnipresent evil, which can be cured by mercy or wrath—by medicines as antipodal as light and darkness, as sweet and bitter, as heaven and hell!!

11. Paragraph 21. "Did I find peace," you ask, "in obeying a violated law?" What a sage question truly! Did Mr. D. who last night owed Mr. C. a thousand talents, find peace in paying off the debts of to-day? Did he find a liquidation of the ten thousand talents of by-gone years, by paying every evening the debts of that day! Save me from such debtors as take their lessons of justice and moral right from you, Sir! This, Sir, is your satisfaction for sin—this is your honoring and magnifying of the divine law! Reader, examine Mr. Skinner's 21st paragraph for a clear indication of his views of getting rid of sin. If you violated a commandment ten thousand times, and then obey it once, this one act of obedience atones for ten thousand offences, clears off the whole score, "brings peace, happiness, and salvation from your former guilty disobedience"! I thank Mr. Skinner, however gratuitous it may be, for this full disclosure of his system. And to help out the free grace of this system, if a person should violate any commandment according to his ability all the days of his life, and only once obey it after death—for instance, the 7th or 8th of the decalogue—that one act of obedience in purgatory gives him peace, holiness, and happiness: for, continues Mr. Skinner, "are God's character and government the reverse in another world from what they are in this? Does death dissolve the tie between the creature and the Creator?" If this be Universalism defended by a giant, what shall we think of it in weaker hands! This is some of Mr. Skinner's mortar which strengthens his wall! Solomon's Temple had no mortar—consequently it was weak.

12. In answer to the question in paragraph 22, I state, That the Scriptures adduced in Letter 28 are intended to show that the ultimate destiny of the wicked shall not be as the righteous.—Mr. Skinner presumes that his post mortem punishment ending in holiness saves him from the force of those passages which bear only, as he would have us think, upon the ultra Universalist, who makes death the final end of all punishment. But this is fallacious in the extreme—for two reasons:—1st. His purgatory is a perfect assumption, for which he has not pretended to give one word of proof, except from the Apocrypha or his own reasoning, and no reasoning can prove a positive institution. What text avows that those who go into eternal punishment, shall get out of it? Aye, that is the question. Captain Symmes' hollow spheres, the Pope's limbo puerorum, and your imaginative Orcus, Pandemonium, or Purgatory, are equally without a fact or a "thus saith the Lord" to support them. Your frequent evasions of this matter show you are conscious that it is wholly unfounded on scriptural testimony.

13. In the second place, a temporary post mortem punishment ending in bliss, makes the ultimate destiny of the wicked and the righteous the same: for the man who lives to be a hundred years old, though he may suffer more than he who dies at twenty-five, they both arriving at eternal life, has the same ultimate destiny with him. Now as those scriptures alleged speak of an abiding difference between the post mortem state of the righteous and the wicked, they are just as conculsive against you, Sir, as against the ultra Universalist. Your seeking to evade them by asking to which proposition they belong, can be easily perceived by our readers.

14. Your "pin," "apple," "hen-roost," and "suicide sins," are too ridiculous for a grave reply. James settles all such pins and puns by saying, that "if a man should keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." As respects society, there is a great difference in sins; but as respects God's authority, dignity, law, all sins are equal. Remember, Mr. Skinner, that we all die because our Father stole an apple! and laugh no more against God's economy. Read your 18th paragraph again, and blot it out forever.

15. Having done a work of supererogation in replying to such a suicidal defence of your system, I proceed with my argument. In my last letter I closed with the uselessness of the Gospel scheme, if your penal system saves all. In some three months probably you may reach that letter. I shall, however, continue that argument, because not then complete. I think I have shown, 1st. That Restorationism, as plead by you, annihilates the truth, holiness, justice, and mercy of God.—God says, "When the wicked turneth away from his wickedness that he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, [has ceased sinning,] he shall save his soul alive." Yet you say that in your purgatory, although God's government is immutably the same on this earth and in your purgatory, he will continue to punish—nay, all his punishments there shall fall on those who have turned away from their wickedness—who have ceased to do evil, and who love and submit to the Lord. Where, then, is the truth, mercy, holiness, and justice of your God? The dilemma, whose invincible horns now embrace you, reads thus:—Your spirits in prison must cease sinning soon as they enter purgatory, or they can not get out; but if they cease sinning they can not be punished, unless God can punish those who are pure and holy as the angels in heaven—that is, who sin not in thought, word, or deed.

16. I have shown, in the second place, that it stultifies and nullifies the Gospel economy; and now I ask, in the third place, does it not equally stultify the apostles who laid down their lives for the Gospel? And does it not stultify yourself, Sir, in laboring so hard for nothing, and taxing the people so highly for it—for the sake of showing that the world will be as certainly saved without your labors as with them! Nay, you are, upon your own principles, a public injury to society; for if you speak the truth, you enhance the guilt of many more than you temporarily relieve, and send many more for a longer term to purgatory than they would, but for your meddling, have had to endure. Instead of promoting the salvation of many, you save not one that would not have been saved without you, and you increase the misery of many. The Grand Jury ought, on your own showing, to inquire into your case.

17. Your system also is useless; because, 4th. It takes away every stimulus to moral excellence. "All men will be forever happy, live as they may," is the most licentious tenet ever promulged by mortal man. A few, indeed, might love virtue for its own sake; but they are already virtuous persons, and need not your interference.—Others might find in hope a stimulus to moral attainments; but they are also a virtuous few, and need not your preaching. But to the mighty multitude of animal men your Gospel would not be either the wisdom or power of God to reformation. All that have come out from among you testify that your system never reformed a single sinner. Some have too much hope; and to these Paul says, "Work out your salvation with fear and trembling." And Jesus the great master of the human heart, said, "Fear Him who, when he has killed the body, has power to destroy both soul and body in hell: yea, I say to you, fear Him." And Paul again says to Christians, "Having a promise left us of entering into his rest, LET US FEAR, lest any of you should seem to come short of it." A thousand passages confirm, and in various forms inculcate this view of the matter. That very fear, then, which you labor to destroy, was inculcated and cherished by Jesus and his apostles, as a healthy and necessary stimulus to virtue.

18. In the fifth place, your system is useless; because, if it be true that none but the virtuous here shall be forever happy, we are perfectly safe who inculcate and practice truth and righteousness. We can lose nothing except the pleasure of spending a thousand years in your purgatory. We are happy in the paths of virtue; and all that fear, from which you would deliver us in behalf of our families and friends, is a healthful stimulus to seek their salvation, from which we would not be delivered. Perfect love casts out tormenting fear. "There is none of that fear in love." If not perfect Christians, it would be a misfortune not to have this fear for ourselves. And for our children, if we discharge faithfully our duties, we have nothing to fear; but if we do not, it would be a misfortune not to fear. I say again, if your system were true we lose nothing. "Godliness is profitable to all things, having promise of the life that now is as well as of that which is to come." But if none but "the pure in heart shall see God," or, in other words, if your system be false, then we are safe; but where are your deluded hosts!!

19. The wicked are easily converted to your theory; but where is the power to convert them to holiness? Our doctrine has converted thousands from Belial to Christ—from sin to holiness—from vice to virtue. But where are your converts?—The honest preachers who have come out from among you, and of these there are a few, with one voice declare that your system never did reform an individual; but that it has made many worse, very much worse for embracing it. As I shall make this the sixth specification of the inutility of your system, I shall be at some pains to adduce some evidence in proof of it. I will introduce a very competent person, one of your own editors and preachers, of much moral worth; one, too, whom you have most shamefully abused because of his honesty in relation to his experience while among you. You are, I presume, by this time thinking of Mr. Lewis C. Todd. I have no personal acquaintance with that gentleman. I learned he heard me discourse the other day at Garrettsville, Ohio. He was after he left you a Methodist preacher, I believe: I know not what his present views are. His neighbors give him a good name, and his book shows that he is a gentleman of an enlarged and cultivated mind. As far as I have read it, (say 100 pages,) it is clear, strong, and convincing—well written. I have not room for many extracts. I may do the author injustice by short quotations; but I will not misrepresent him:—

20. "I became a preacher of universal salvation, and was ordained as such in Fairfield, Herkimer county, N. Y., about eight years ago. I believed the doctrine true, and thought that, in proportion as it was propagated, mankind would become good and happy. I preached in different parts, far and near, and itinerated over an extensive region of country, suffering the excesses of heat and cold, and the pitiless peltings of stormy skies, and muddy roads. No danger or effort did I consider too great that was possible; for I believe, for a number of years, I should often have rejoiced in the martyr's privilege of attesting my faith. Some years since, however, I occasionally reflected that although the doctrine had spread much faster than I had anticipated, it did not seem to produce the effects I had expected. This gradually cooled my ardor and diminished my zeal, so that for some years I cared but little whether I preached or not. In this state of mind, believing Universalism to be the true sense of the Bible when rightly construed, and being unable to see any considerable good resulting from the system, I was much inclined to doubt divine revelation. I could not go entirely into infidelity, nor feel much confidence in revelation." * * * "I had seen the blessed influence of the doctrine spread out often on paper, but I could not see them any where else! No—God knows I am honest in this assertion. I do not feel to abuse the denomination; but it is true that I could not for my life see any good resulting to society from the sentiment. This conviction rolled in upon my mind and my feelings with tremendous effect. Alas! thought I, have I been spending my "labor for that which satisfieth not!' Are all my efforts useless, and only tending to make looser the restraints of religion and virtue!" * * * "But with these impressions, I was obliged still to be a Universalist; for I could not make up my mind fully to be an infidel, and viewed all the doctrines of the orthodox almost with abhorrence. I could much easier have gone into infidelity than orthodoxy." * * * * "I know individuals among them of the most amiable dispositions and characters, that would honor any profession. But I did not think their doctrine ever made them so. I candidly aver in the fear of God, that I do not believe the doctrine ever made a single soul any better than he otherwise would have been, while it has been the means of removing necessary restraints, and giving latitude to thousands whose propensities and passions needed restraint, whereby they have indulged in criminal pursuits and gone to perdition. I only judge from what I know—from what I have seen in reference to the general effects of the doctrine.—"The tree must be known by its fruits. And after taking the fruits of the tree of Universalism into long and deliberate and prayerful consideration, so far as I have ever seen them, I am compelled to conclude the tree is radically defective—that God never designed to give mankind a religion which would do them no good, and about which most of its friends would feel so perfectly indifferent as Universalists generally do about their religion. When I learn of a single drunkard, or swearer, or gambler, or debauchee, or knave being reformed in consequence of the Universalist doctrine, I shall think better of its influence than I do now; for it is my solemn opinion that such an instance never occurred. And I would gladly hold up this truth to all the friends of this doctrine, and make it speak out in thunder to their consciences; and then ask them if they will still teach this doctrine to their children!" * * * * "I do not pretend here to accuse all Universalists, who deny future punishment, of dishonesty; but that they do not believe in the Scriptures in their plain, natural, unvarnished sense. To bring people to their system, their principal business is to varnish over the Scriptures so as to give them the appearance of teaching what common readers would never have suspected from the words. The system, in my opinion, is so near Deism, as to be precisely the same in its moral effects." * * * "This is the reason why I think it would be fairer or better for mankind and for posterity, if the advocates of that doctrine would openly espouse Deism.—For I do not believe that by preaching open infidelity they could undermine the Christian faith and increase hostility to religion as fast as they do now. I think it impossible to look over the country, and trace Universalism in any place where it prevails to any extent, and not be satisfied of this truth. Many professed Universalists have told me, at different times, that they only supported Universalism as a means of putting down superstition, (revealed religion.) Many preachers take a kind of dark course on the subject of future punishment. They preach present punishment; and all their common arguments are calculated to induce a belief that punishment must be here and nowhere else. Yet they do not say but there may be punishment in a future state! Hence, while they teach ultra Universalism in its material features, they hold in reserve the advantage of taking shelter under Restorationism, whenever they are met with scriptures in debate, which they can not evade, and which they must allow to teach future punishment. Mr. Kneeland was for years a learned and eminent Universalist teacher. He became an Atheist; and says that the fundamental principles, taught by modern Universalists and himself, are the same; that the elements of his system are all found in their arguments; that the principal Universalist writers and teachers are engaged in the same great work that he is—viz., to bring mankind out of superstition into reason and nature.—He claims the honor of acting openly and honestly in promoting the same results, which he says his Universalist coadjutors are promoting in their own way. I am informed by a reputable gentleman from Boston, that Universalist societies in that region open their temples, and pay him for his instructions on Atheism, or Pantheism, which is substantially the same thing." * * * "My objections to Universalism are founded mainly upon the fact of its inefficiency to reform the wicked, and to promote the growth and living energy of vital piety." "Sincerely and deliberately believing that such is the effect of the Universalian doctrine, I appeal to the heart-searching God for the purity of my motives, while I hereby publicly renounce the doctrine as unscriptural and of pernicious tendency; and I withdraw from all ecclesiastial connexion with the people called Universalists. LEWIS C. TODD."

All of which is respectfully submitted—by yours faithfully, A. CAMPBELL.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1838.

MAN!—WHENCE CAME HE?

Man exists. This wide earth is one vast hive of human life. From the burning deserts of Africa to the everlasting ice of the North, from the eastern coast of China to the western shores of America, from the gates of Gibraltar to the uttermost bounds of the world, man lives, acts and perishes. No clime so cold, no sands so arid, no mountain so lofty, no land so barren, no waters so tempestuous, but man will there be found. All around us the curtain of non-existence is folded up, and the great drama of life is being acted by the countless throngs which forever flow upon and retire from the earth, like the ever-advancing and retreating waves of the ocean. The stream of life never ceases—like a river gradually threading the plain until lost in the distance, so the stream of life continually recedes into the past, until hoping, dreaming, acting, dying man, is, with all his works, forever engulphed in that vast ocean of time, whose surface exhibits no wreck of human greatness. When the human mind ranges over the congregated masses of human existence; reflects upon the varied changes through which man passes; and recollects how insignificant is man when compared with his works; in the vastness of the subject it enquires, from whence came man? what is he? and to what is he tending? Whose hand fashioned him? whose power protects him? and beyond the changing things of a perishing world, shall the star of his mind shine bright in the firmament of virtue and knowledge, or shall its glory be quenched forever in a night of despair and misery? How ample is the field of thought to which these questions lead us? and how interesting the theme they open? Hence we can now gather but one flower of its truth; obtain but one glance of its many portions of instruction; for one discourse can furnish but an outline, to be filled up, we trust, in the hours of meditation and religious study.

From whence came man? The simplest of all history, as well as the most reasonable, returns us a clear and decided answer—"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground; and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." Here we have the Creator, the cause or creation, the result of life. The same almighty Architect who made all things that are, who made the earth, its seas, its land, and all its soft beauties and grand rudeness, also made man as the highest stone on the temple of animal and thinking being. He was fashioned from the dust, but still he was dead; then the energy of divine wisdom brought the air to operate upon the lungs; then the whole machinery began its round of duty, to go onward with constancy for years, with a power and mystery of life absolutely beyond our comprehension; while the whole combination resulted in man; living, thinking, acting, breathing, dying man.

Here then is the origin of man; and how unvarnished is the account? Let the so-named philosophers dream that man was never created, but existed from all eternity; or that he sprang from monkeys; or that he rose spontaneously from the clods of the valley like a vegetable; but when this philosophic trifling, alike unsubstantiated by history or experience, shall be forgotten, the Mosaic Record shall still be admired for its simple statement and reasonable conclusions, attested by all the experience which can bear upon it. We know that man is matter—he lives, he dies—the chemistry of nature touches him, the elements of his body separate, and soon become mere dust; out of which, in the first instance, he was formed. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," is a truism, not only in sacred history, but in the stern facts around us.

It will appear evident to every reflecting mind, that the man thus created to move on the earth as his sphere of action, and pronounced good, must have been ignorant of the relations which awaited him; for, immediately after he was fashioned, what could he have known? Being ignorant then, is it not probable that the same divine goodness which created him, would also instruct him in regard to the facts pertaining to his life and his existence? Most certainly. It then follows that the third chapter of Genesis, instead of being the account of a horrible evil entailed upon the whole human family, is simply a record of the instruction necessary to prepare Adam for his station as a mortal being. This instruction was communicated by using real things as symbols of truth. It is a well-known fact, that when words are comparatively few among a people, the more comparisons and real objects will be used to exhibit ideas. This is very true of our native Indians, whose language is scanty. A vast many of their ideas are communicated by using tangible objects. They formerly counted by fingers—and when a warrior wished to show how he had been beaten in a race, he did it by placing one finger before another, and moving his arms along. As, however, language becomes copious in the number of its words to express its ideas, the use of real objects as signs of communication will cease. When Adam was created, he, of course, was unacquainted with any words as signs of things. A child, brought up without hearing words spoken, will only make an unintelligible noise instead of language. Hence, Adam was instructed by a few words, and these, connected with real objects, were the instruments by which he was taught his relation to the earth around him.

The very first element of knowledge necessary for him, was the distinction between good and evil—for without such distinction, he would not have seen any difference between virtue and vice. The Hindoos, not having a perfect knowledge of good and evil, will burn the widow upon the funeral pile of her deceased husband, or cast the infant into the Ganges, believing it to be correct; but had they a full view of good and evil, they would deem such a proceeding murder. To give Adam this knowledge, a certain tree of the garden was selected, and he was told not to eat of its fruit. This tree was not selected because its fruit was bad; it was only selected as a tangible symbol, that a law, involving a knowledge of good and evil, might be urged upon Adam.—Adam violated this law, and in the first goadings of a guilty conscience, endeavored to hide from his Maker, thus painfully realizing that there was good and evil, and that he could choose the one and refuse the other. How important was the knowledge thus obtained. What would be the horrible condition of the world, if it knew no difference between good and evil? When the child thrusts his finger into the blaze of the lamp, he learns good and evil—hold the lamp towards him afterward, and he will instinctively shrink from it.

The next element of instruction, was, that he must obtain his sustenance by labor, or as Scripture expresses it, "by the sweat of his brow." This also is a blessing, for the very labor which must be exerted in order to get food, visits the frame with vigorous health and developes all its powers.

The next element of instruction, was, his mortality. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." If Adam had not been told that he must infallibly die, is it at all probable that he would have taken any pains to preserve his life? Certainly not. But the moment he was told that he was mortal, then must have arisen that love of life which pervades every sane mind, and makes the creature instinctively shrink from the tomb, and institute measures to preserve his existence.

Having thus learned that man was fashioned by the hand of Deity; from him he obtained a knowledge of good and evil, of the necessity of labor, and of his mortality. G. W. M.

IRRESOLUTION.

There may be times when irresolution would be a virtue, especially if compared with the propensities which might be supposed to accompany it. I say it may be, but I will by no means vouch for the correctness of the statement, only so far as it may be applicable to some kind of negative virtue.

There are three kinds of characters in this world, which can not be said to be under the control of positive virtuous integrity. One, is that class of persons, who, while they do but little good, except as they are actuated by the most grovelling selfishness, are only restrained from doing evil, through fear of detection, or some other cause equally based on the principles of slavish fear.—Of this class, are those who, thinking it to be a strong argument against Universalism, boast that if they could be certain that there would be no future endless misery, as the consequence of sins committed in this life, they would give loose to all their evil passions and propensities, and roll sin as a sweet morsel under their tongues, thereby acknowledging that their hearts are evil in the sight of the Lord, and in love with iniquity. Poor souls! They are so enslaved under the dominion of error, that they have not resolution enough to open their eyes lest they should discover a certain and just punishment, exactly proportioned to their iniquity, awaiting and even attending them, instead of the uncertain ignis fatuus horrors which are so congenial to their prejudices, and which they imagine await all those, who do not do precisely as they intend to do some time or other. They are, in fact, suspended between a desire to do evil, on the one hand, and a desire to placate the wrath of an angry God on the other; but hardly know which to do first. Hence they are extremely anxious, that in their inquiries among Universalists, they may be able to find some practical deficiency, which will justify them in their opposition, and serve as a peg upon which to hang their doubts. But still, they are not fully resolved upon doing evil, though they do not believe that sin contains within itself the seeds of death. The unfortunately long cherished error of putting the evil day far from them, seems to give them too great a prospect of escaping punishment, to be given up peaceably; especially as safety, in their vocabulary, is synonymous with escaping justice. Hence a want of resolution to break over the prejudices of education, and to encounter the alarming truth, that "the soul that sinneth it shall die," induces them to cling to the old opinions, which they have been taught is the safe side. Here, irresolution seems to claim the title of a negative virtue. It does not lead them to practical virtue, because they are not certain that their safety requires it. Neither does it invariably lead them into actual crime; but on the contrary, many times restrains them from indulging in their cherished propensities, for fear they shall not, after all, escape their long delayed retribution. Let it be understood, that I do not now speak of opposers universally, but only such as have no virtuous resolution to do good for righteousness' sake, and who, if they do good at all, do it through fear of endless pain.

Another class of persons, not under the control of active integrity, is those who, though not opposed to the doctrine of impartial goodness, have not, nevertheless, sufficient resolution to enable them to defy the frowns of popular prejudice. Perhaps they even desire to enjoy the privileges of the Gospel in its purity; but choose to sacrifice their independence of mind, rather than be left with the minority. They seem to forget that he who brought life and immortality to light, was also charged with being a poor Nazarene, and censured for associating with publicans and sinners, when at the same time, those with whom he associated, were not half so immoral as the self-righteous Pharisees who censured him.—Now, suppose the disciples had all deserted their Master's cause, because the rich and powerful were opposed to it,—think you, friendly reader, that posterity would have applauded their weakness? No! It would have said, that the awful destruction which came upon the enemies of the cross, in Jerusalem, and which, of course, would have fallen on the disciples, had they apostatized, was but the retribution of justice. So with the persons under consideration. There is not a single redeeming trait in that state of mind which lacks the resolution to brave the maledictions of cowardly prejudice. It is true, if a person is determined not to countenance any sect or denomination, unless it will contribute to his pocket and his fame, it would be well for all sects, could he forever float in the atmosphere of irresolution, uncertain which would best accomplish his aims.

The third class to which I allude, are those who seem to be fully bent on the gratification of every vicious propensity, without really intending to do injury to a single living being. In one point of view, these people have too much resolution. It would be well for them, if they had less of it. And I confess that it would be well for them, were they completely destitute of that kind of resolution. But I can not help thinking, that there is a greater want of resolution in these individuals, than would at first be supposed. They do not wish to harm any one; but this negative virtue is all they can take the trouble of cultivating. They have no inclination to pause in their career, and examine into the natural tendency of their conduct. Carelessness and indifference has become so habitual that it has become almost a second nature with them. And when they experience or witness the evil consequences of their iniquity, they have not resolution enough to trace them to their legitimate cause, and are therefore insensible that they have originated in themselves. It requires the most decisive and vigorous resolution to correct bad habits. Hence it follows that the resolution evinced in this last class, is directed in the wrong channel, and consequently it would be better for them, if they had less of it, as there would then be more chance of their reformation.

But these negative qualities discoverable in the irresolute, are after all, of no positive benefit to them. It would be much better if people would resolve to become acquainted with their duty, and having acquired that knowledge, to resolve as firmly to perform it.

One of the greatest evils arising from this irresolute disposition, is, that we are in danger of neglecting almost every known duty. Under its influence, the smallest obstacle which arises to obstruct or prevent the execution of our plans, is deemed a sufficient excuse for our neglect. And as man can not expect to accomplish any good without meeting with more or less difficulty, it becomes a fruitful source of procrastination. This, every one must see, is doubly dangerous. To put off from day to day, the fulfilment of our duty, merely because we have not resolution to encounter the difficulties attending it, is placing us in a situation, wherein we are obliged to overcome an accumulation of difficulties, which might otherwise have been met one at a time, and thus conquered with more ease, and also to overcome a bad habit which we have thus been fostering and strengthening in our hearts. But this is not all. The irresolute man will imagine a thousand difficulties, which never did and never can exist save in his fears. This is the almost certain result of indulging in such a disposition. If he lacks an excuse for his imbecility, he will imagine one, until he has exhausted the whole array of imaginary obstacles, and then he will refuse to act, for fear something might happen which it would be impossible for him to foresee. In this way, he experiences more trouble than he would if he was to take a straight-forward course, and persevere until he succeeded, or had the satisfaction of knowing that his failure is not for want of effort. In such cases as these, the character partakes as much of the nature of indolence as of irresolution. The man can not arouse himself to make a beginning.

But suppose these things fairly overcome, and the pain of fearing to begin, actually left in the back ground. A long and tedious process of mental inquiry, in which each particular is left as undecided as it was commenced, has yielded him no benefit. The advice of friends has been eagerly sought, and as eagerly distrusted, and he has finally decided upon acting, without knowing whether he acts right or wrong. Thus, as he goes along through life, he is continually tormented with a thousand little methods, which, after it is too late to improve them, he thinks would be better than the one he has adopted. There is no happiness to the man who leads such a life as this. He is always doing, but never satisfied with what he has done.

The only remedy I know of, for this, is to be reasonably decided in all things. Not stubborn in any thing, but firm in every thing which we know to be right.—And if we venture upon untried schemes, let us not be scared by imaginary evils—let us not exchange those things which may yield us dignified enjoyment, for mere shadows. A. R. B.

OUR PROSPECTUS—FOR 1839.

Last week we commenced sending our Prospectus for the next volume, to our various agents and active friends, and will continue to send until all are supplied. It is usual to offer a few remarks on the occasion. Ours at this time will be brief, both because dire necessity has compelled us, most unwillingly, to publish a few duns lately, and because the Prospectus itself contains several requests and directions, which, if promptly and faithfully attended to, will gratify all our present wishes.

1. We want to know as early in December as is possible, the exact state of our list. We want to know the exact state, for in these times of changes, many of our friends have also changed their habits and their means—and we, also, have had our means greatly changed, and must change some in our habits. In other words, we must cut our coat according to our cloth, and cease sending papers (except gratis papers,) where the desire to receive them is not sufficient to induce the subscriber to endeavor to pay for them. We want to know it early in December, that we may regulate our books, and the edition for the next volume. Every year we lose some hundred dollars, by not being able to regulate our list, till after we have sent out a number of papers that are afterwards discontinued without being paid for.

2. We want every good subscriber to continue taking the paper. Much as we have suffered and lost during the past two years, we do not feel able to afford the discontinuance of a single good subscriber. We absolutely need every such subscriber on our list, to strengthen and support us until times shall make us some little amends for the past. We know that times are improving nearly every where, and with nearly every body—but as the printer is the last person whom a majority of persons generally think of paying, these good times have not yet reached us. And to be the first to suffer and the last to benefit by a change of times, has been, so far, our hapless lot. Our subscribers can afford to continue aiding us, and we can not well afford to lose their aid. We hope, then, that every good subscriber will continue on our list—or, at least, if there are any who must quit, may we not hope that they will find some one as prompt and faithful as they, to take their place?

3. We want some new subscribers to fill the places of those whom hard times have pressed from our side—Perhaps they may be had among those very persons, as a brighter sun is again beginning to gild their fortunes; and so they will become their own substitutes! There are some, also, whom we have been and shall be compelled to strike from our list, because we can wait no longer for the reward of our toils expected long at their hands. We want good men and true to fill their places. And there are many such in our land—can they not be prevailed on to subscribe for our humble sheet?

4. For the supply of the first and third named wants, we are compelled to rely much on our noble hearted, generous and active agents. We do call on them—no because we have any claims on their services, but because (what we believe will be a stronger appeal to them) we need their aid. May we not rely on their speedy and active exertions to aid us in collecting what has been so hard earned, and, in some cases, so long waited for? May we not expect them to stir themselves with renewed energy and zeal to fill up our list with many more good subscribers?

We are expected to labor much and constantly for the spread of the truth—the uprooting of error—the advancement of our cause. Gladly will we do it—yea, it is our meat and our drink thus to do our Father's will, and to fulfil the expectations of our brethren—but we can not do it as we would, nor as it is expected we should do it, unless those for whom we labor will give us their encouragement and their support—unless our faithful co-workers with us, our agents, will use their influence and exertions in our favor. All we have, and are, and hope to be or to possess, is at the service of the cause in which we are engaged, and shall be so employed while life and sense remain; and on this ground only do we feel emboldened thus to solicit and importune our friends in behalf of our exertions.

In conclusion. There are many to whom we send the paper free of charge. Can they not do some what for us? There are many more to whom it should be sent thus freely. Are there not those who can send it to them at their expense? Are there none who could get enough subscribers, to secure the gratis copy for some such persons? Remember the poor and afflicted—the aged, the widow, and those who have none to help them. When you have piled the warm fire on their hearths, clad their shivering limbs with comfort, and filled their mouths with plenty—then, remember, that they too have a relish for the bread of life and the waters of salvation. Give them the Bible—give them, also, a weekly messenger to unfold its truths to their understandings and apply them to their hearts! Forget not the poor—the poor in this world's goods and the "poor in spirit"—for if any need the consolation this paper can give, it is they.

How many families are there, called Universalist, or favorable to Universalism, who take neither this nor any kindred paper! Can you render them and their children, their neighbors and friends, a better service, than to induce them to subscribe for a Universalist periodical, to read aloud in the family circle—each taking turns in the delightful and profitable task? Try it—persevere in trying thus to spread a knowledge of the truth so glorifying to God and happifying to man, and rely upon it, Universalism must prosper, and spread over the land, and produce the fruits of love, joy and peace among men. God grant it! Amen. A. B. G.

UNIVERSALIST REGISTER AND ALMANAC FOR 1839.

We have given the last order to our printer, who will then distribute the type, when no more orders for it can be executed. Are all hands supplied? If not, apply immediately, or you may be too late. We have but a few left; and our brethren elsewhere have not more, probably, than they will want for the supply of their respective markets.

Thanks to a liberal public, thus far the work has been patronized beyond our first expectations. That patronage, we will endeavor to prove another year, has not been thrown away on us. But for the present, we want every Almanac and Register in the hands of wholesale purchasers, sold; that they may not be discouraged from giving us early liberal orders next Summer—and we want every Universalist neighborhood supplied, that they may feel a desire to see what the next year's Register and its Companion will be. Let every one in want of a copy, speak early and loud enough, or he may continue to want it.

N. B. The work may also be had, yet, I believe, at the Union office, 130 Nassau st., New-York—at the Repository, and Trumpet office, Boston—in short, at all our periodicals, publication offices that have not yet sold out. A. B. G.

ERRATUM.

The compositor not understanding a remark by Br. Montgomery, in his reply to Br. Atkinson, published in our last, did not quote the text there named. When the proof came to be read, I noticed the omission, and ordered the text to be quoted. He turned to, and quoted Romans vi: 9, 10, instead of 1 Cor. vi: 9, 10! As this was done after the proof was read, the blunder was not perceived in time to correct it last week. Will the readers, generally, and Br. Atkinson particularly, notice and correct the error? A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. Guild, at the Lutheran church in South Worcester, at 1 o'clock, and at the Quaker meeting-house in Harpersfield, in the evening—B. Eddy, at Clockville—Br. Bartlett, at Munsville—Br. J. D. Hicks, in Russia.

POETRY

A DREAM OF HEAVEN.

Lo, the seal of death is breaking,
Those who slept its sleep are waking,]
Eden opes her portals fair!
Hark, the harps of God are ringing,
Hark, the seraph's hymn is singing,
And the living rills are flinging
Music on immortal air!

There no more at eve declining,
Sun's without a cloud are shining
O'er the land of life and love;
Heaven's own harvests woo the reaper,
Heaven's own dreams entrance the sleeper,
Not a tear is left the weeper
To profane one flower above.

No frail lillies there are breathing,
There no thorny rose is wreathing
In the bowers of paradise;
Where the founts of life are flowing,
Flowers unknown to time are blowing,
'Mid far richer verdure glowing,
Than is sunn'd by mortal skies.

There no sigh of memory swelleth,
There no tear of misery dwelleth,
Hearts will bleed or break no more;
Past is all the cold world's scorning,
Gone the night and broke the morning,
With seraphic day, adorning
Life's glad waves and golden shore.

Oh! on that bright shore to wander,
Trace those radiant waves' meander,
All we loved and lost to see,—
Is this hope, so pure, so splendid,
Vainly with our being blended?
No! with time ye are not ended,
Visions of eternity!

THE OCEAN.

The ocean has its silent caves,
Deep, quiet and alone;
Though there be fury in the waves,
Beneath them there is none.
The awful spirits of the deep
Hold their communion there;
And there are those for whom we weep,
The young, the bright, the fair.

Calmly the wearied seamen rest
Beneath their own blue sea;
The ocean solitudes are blest,
For there is purity.
The earth has guilt, the earth has care,
Unquiet are its graves;
But peaceful sleep is ever there,
Beneath the dark blue waves.

WISDOM.

There is no project, to which the whole race of mankind is so universally [attached,] as that of being thought wise; and the affectation of it is so visible in men of all complexions, that you every day see some one or other so very solicitous to establish his character, as not to allow himself leisure to do the things which fairly win it; expending more art and stratagem to appear so in the eyes of the world, than what would suffice to make him so in truth.

It is owing to the force of this desire that * * * * * there is no injury touches a man so sensibly, as an insult upon his parts or capacity. Tell a man of other defects—that he wants learning, industry or application—he will hear your reproof with patience. Nay, you may go farther; take him in proper season, and you may tax his morals, you may tell him he is irregular in conduct, passionate or revengeful in his nature, loose in his principles; deliver it with the gentleness of a friend, possibly he may not only bear with you, but thank you for your lecture, and promise a reformation. But hint but a defect in his intellectuals, touch but that sore place, from that moment you are looked upon as an enemy sent to torment him before his time, and in return, may reckon upon his resentment and ill-will forever: so that in general, you will find it safer to tell a man he is a knave than a fool; and stand a better chance of being forgiven for proving he has been wanting in point of common honesty, than in point of common sense.—Strange souls that we are! as if to live well was not the greatest argument of wisdom; and as if what reflected upon our morals did not most of all reflect upon our understanding!—Sterne.

ATHEISM.

It has been long observed that an Atheist has no just reasons for endeavoring conversions, and yet, none harrass those minds which they can influence, with more importunity of solicitation to adopt their opinions. In proportion as they doubt the truth of their own doctrines, they are desirous to gain the attestation of another understanding, and industriously labor to win a proselyte, and eagerly catch at the slightest pretence to dignify their sects with a celebrated name.—Dr. Johnson.

MARRIAGES.

In Marshall, on the 19th ult., by Rev. D. Biddlecom, Mr. Orrin Terry, to Miss Adaline Dunbar.

In this city, on the 31st ult., by Rev. Mr. Mandeville, Mr. John T. Stevens, to Miss Eliza Hackett, all of this city.

DEATHS.

In Alexander, August 17th, an infant son of Newcomb and Jane Demay, Jr.

"Ere sin could blight, or sorrow fade,
Death timely came with friendly care,
The opening bud to heaven conveyed,
And bade it bloom forever there." S. Goff.

In Batavia, October 5th, Mr. William D. Robertson, aged 24 years. The deceased being a believer in the restitution, was an honest, industrious man, a dutiful son, and a kind husband. He bore an illness of about three months with calmness and composure, died resigned, and his peaceful spirit, taking its flight

O'er the path by mortal never trod,
'Sprung to its source, the bosom of its God.', leaving a beloved wife with a tender infant, a disconsolate mother, and other relatives to mourn their loss. May the consolations of the Gospel of Jesus, assuage their grief, hush their sighs, dry their tears, and give them "the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for heaviness." Funeral services by the writer.

S. Goff.

In Ashford, Cattaraugus county, October 8th, Mrs. Rhoda Hill, consort of Mr. Asa Hill, aged 82 years.—Funeral discourse by J. Lewis.

In [illegible] county, October 21st, Mr. Jonathan Townsend, aged 73 years. Funeral discourse by J. Lewis.

THE LAYMAN'S LEGACY.

Proposals for a volume of Sermons under the above title will be found below. To those who have known the author as the able conductor of the old Gospel Herald, the Pioneer of Universalism in this city, not a word of commendation will be needed. The readers of the Union will also readily recognize him through the frequent communications to our columns, (Short Sermons, etc.,) over the signature of "H. F." We are assured that much pains has been taken with the volume, and that one of the sermons, "The Predestination of Truth," will comprise a pretty full commentary on the Book of Romans. We have no doubt the work will be valuable. We understand it will come from 75 cents to $1—not over $1; as is guaranteed by the prospectus.

Proposals are inclosed to most of our subscribers.—These papers need not be returned—only the names, or number of copies wanted in each neighborhood. Our agents and friends will confer a favor on the author by making early exertions, and returns, as directed in the Prospectus, to this office. Publishers of Universalist papers will also confer a favor by giving the Prospectus a few insertions, or the substance of it.—Univ. Union.

PROPOSALS

For publishing by subscription, a Book, to be entitled

THE LAYMAN'S LEGACY,

Or twenty-five sermons on important subjects.

BY HENRY FITZ.

The slave of no sect, the partisan of no party, a bigot to no creed, a zealot of no dogma, the servant of no man, save the man Christ Jesus; and wedded to no faith, save the faith of Christ; free as air, I entered on the discussion of the subjects before me.

SUBJECTS.

I. The Lacked thing.—John v: 39.
II. The Argument.—1 John ii: 1, 2.
III. The Origin and Destination of Man.—Prov. xvi: 4.
IV. Natural and Moral Evil, the ministers of God.—Isa. xlv: 7.
V. The New Birth.—John iii: 7.
VI. The Parable of the Good Shepherd.—John x: 27.
VII. A Parable—Christ the Door.—John x: 9.
VIII. The Predestination of Truth, or Kisis and Pasa. Rom viii: 29.
IX. Persecution.—Acts ix: 4.
X. The Incident of a Morning.—Prov. x: 22.
XI. Paul's Syllogism.—I Cor. xv: 16.
XII. Truth Always Consistent.—Gen. xviii: 14.
XIII. Moral Courage the Concomitant of Truth.—Titus ii: 15.
XIV. The Origin and end of Faith.—Eph. ii: 8.
XV. Almost a Christian.—Mark xii: 34.
XVI. A Particular Providence Illustrated and Defended.—Matt. x: 30.
XVII. Polytheism not Peculiar to Pagans, or Witchcraft Unveiled.—1. Sam. xxviii: 7.
XVIII. The Strait Gate.—Matt. vii: 13, 14.
XIX. The Wrath of God.—Rom. i: 18.
XX. The Scape Goat.—Ezek. xviii: 2.
XXI. Liberty and Slavery.*—John viii: 36.
XXII. The Mistake.—Matt. xxv: 40.
XXIII. The Law in the hand of a Mediator.—Gal. iii: 20.
XXIV. Vested Rights.—Ezek. xviii: 4.
XXV. The Grand Consummation.—Isa. xxv: 9.

In addition to the usual table of contents, a copious Index to the subjects discussed, will be published, which will serve as a general reference to all important facts, and correlative testimony adduced in support or proof of the doctrine advocated, etc. It is proper to add, that this book will consist entirely of original sermons, never before published.

CONDITIONS.

The work will be issued in neat 12mo. form, put up in best muslin binding, with a handsome title stamp.—The number of pages which it will occupy is not yet fully ascertained; but it will go from 350 to 400 or perhaps rising. If there should be a liberal subscription, an accurate likeness of the author, well executed, will accompany it. As there are some contingences in respect to the size and expense, the price is not definitely fixed. The chief motive in its publication, being to circulate it as far as practicable, the price will be put as low as the expense and number subscribed for, shall possibly allow. For the security of subscribers, however, it is guaranteed that the price shall not exceed one dollar per volume: and they will be put lower if possible, and as much lower as the size, amount of subscription, etc., will warrant.

Persons receiving this Prospectus are respectfully requested to make early and active exertions for subscribers. Every sixth copy gratis. Names or number of copies, (it is not necessary to return the papers,) may be returned (post paid) to the office of the "Universalist Union," No. 130 Fulton-street, N. Y.

The work will be put to press as soon as the number of subscribers will warrant. Early returns are therefore desired, with directions how the copies shall be sent.

*Not of black slaves—white ones!

A VOICE TO YOUTH.

This valuable work, which has been favorably noticed in the N. Y. Mirror, New-Yorker, the Boston Pearl and Galaxy, and sundry other periodicals, may be had at our Bookstore, wholesale and retail—in cloth, $7.20 per dozen, or 75 cents single; in elegant morocco, $9.60 per dozen, or $1.00 single; morocco extra, $12.00 per dozen, or $1.25 single; Turkey and other morocco, extra and gilt edge, $15.00 per dozen, or $1.50 single.

Those who wish to make presents to their young friends, will not find a more beautiful and valuable gift than this work in these splendid bindings.

Orders respectfully solicited.

Grosh and Hutchinson.
41 Genesee-street.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

Terms.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. Grosh, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1838. NUMBER 46.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER SIXTEEN.

BY S. R. SMITH.

INTERNAL EVIDENCE OF REVELATION—CHARACTER OF THE DEITY.

The reader has been kept much longer than was at first intended, from the consideration of the internal evidences of a Divine revelation. But it seemed proper and necessary to remove certain impediments to a clear understanding of the subject in debate, before we entered upon this part of our labors. Christianity, however simple and intelligible originally, has become by far too general and indefinite a term, to be treated without explanation. It is undoubtedly capable of defence as a whole—as a system of revelation. But among the immense variety of sects, whose opinions not only differ from each other, but are sometimes quite contradictory, objections might lie against certain views which we have no wish to defend, or which we deem wholly indefensible. Let their abettors see to this matter themselves. It is our desire to have it perfectly understood what we mean by Christianity. And with a view to render this as intelligible as possible, we have endeavored to clear it of the several incumbrances which Heathenism, or superstition, or policy has incorporated with its original doctrines.

By Christianity, then, we mean that system of divine truth which was revealed from heaven, according to the will of God; the doctrines and precepts of which, are worthy of their divine original—some of them being such as the world did not possess, and could not discover, and the moral precepts of which, are alone calculated to render mankind good and happy. It explodes the idea of a plurality of gods, and distinctly teaches the divine unity and paternity; it employs, not a divinity, but the "man Christ Jesus," to illustrate the principles and practices that constitute reconciliation; it supposes mankind in possession of some correct views and feelings, and instructs them how to improve and perfect them; it makes no distinction of nation or character, but addresses itself to all alike, and to all generations; and it promises what all desire, and what nothing else can prove, a resurrection of the dead, and a happy and glorious immortality for all mankind.

Such only, in our estimation, is Christianity—such is the system which we propose to maintain; the evidences of which are two-fold—those which relate to it as a whole, and such as confirm the propriety, consistency, and truth of its respective parts. And as it is taken for granted, that we are debating the general question with reasonable men, we will not intentionally introduce an argument that is not in itself reasonable. And, differ as we may in our respective conclusions, there are principles of mind, and rules of judging, concerning which there is little room for disagreement.

As a whole—an entire system—Christianity is proved to be a divine communication, by the great superiority and excellency of the character which it ascribes to God, and by its adaptation to the political condition, social relations, and moral and mental wants of mankind. It will scarcely be denied, that the views entertained of the Deity, were, with the exception of the Hebrews, too gross and sensual to be denominated reasonable. For though an occasional conception worthy of the supreme Intelligence, may be detected in the mass, they were perpetually obscured and contradicted by other and more prevailing sentiments, which lessened and degraded every divinity whose being was acknowledged by mankind. And labor as men may, to prove that any just and rational notions of a perfect Deity were entertained in the Heathen world, before the introduction of Christianity, the attempt must end in disappointment.

1. The Jupiter of the Greeks and Romans, was to all intents the same, and possessed the same attributes as the principal or superior god of all the Heathen world. But he was not supreme in power, nor could he in all cases, be truly said to govern the universe. He was himself perpetually influenced and controlled by a blind and unconscious chance, or fate. It is true, that some of the properties of omnipotence were ascribed to him, and he was pompously denominated "the father of gods and men"—but every one knows, or may know with little labor, that he was at the same time bound by an uncontrollable decree; so that he was in the predicament of an animal confined by a chain—free to go its length, and to do any thing he pleased within the circle it would describe, but nothing beyond.

2. The passions by which the superior god of paganism was actuated, were of the grossest and most brutal kind. These are well described by Pope, in a single line—"rage, revenge, and lust"—and are so palpably unsuitable to human dignity and morality, as to require no proof of their impropriety when attached to the character of the governor of the universe. Nor were these passions supposed to be either dormant, or under proper and becoming restraint. They were cherished by indulgence and unrestrained gratification; and violence and misrule, such as would disgrace the court of an oriental potentate, were the characteristics of the supernal abodes. The amours, and intrigues, and debaucheries—the deep and settled malice, unnatural envy, and vindictive contests—the chicanery, craft, and circumvention of the chief deity of Heathenism, can not be described in any terms, without an offence to common decency. Even some of the Heathens blushed for the infamy of their gods; but they still thought they were gods, and worshipped and served them with rites in all respects suited to their character.

3. The principal Heathen deity, was neither infinitely wise nor omniscient. It is notorious that the inferior deities, male and female, were supposed occasionally to steal a march upon his vigilance, while he was napping, or indulging in an extra cup of nectar, or was busy with the affairs of state, or of his household. And during these intermissions of universal knowledge, much mischief was occasionally done in his cabinet, and some of its politic members found time to arrange their own little matters on earth, as well as circumvent the machinations of some rival in heaven. And then, however terrible the offended majesty, he was sometimes strangely perplexed to find the culprit, or to apply the proper antidote to all future presumption. For he could neither foresee the full extent of the operation of the evils in train, nor had he wisdom to guard against those which might yet be planned and executed by his dependents. And he resembled a testy and capricious householder, whose domestics, though standing in some fear, are nevertheless disposed to manage their own private affairs in their own way; and who trust to their mutual interest, as well as the oversight of their master, for concealment and impunity. Such management keeps him in a state of perpetual vexation and wrath, and annoys and occupies him in fruitless endeavors to restore order and discipline to his household. Such was the deity of the religion of nature!

There were those who, disgusted with the mockery of religion, rejected the doctrine and belief of a God. But it seems never once to have occurred to them, that a Deity could exist, whose attributes were unexceptionable, or which did not comprise those already named. And while atheists abounded, and some of the philosophers exposed without mercy, the character of their divinities to contempt and ridicule, many of them were among the most arrant idolators. Is it not surpassing strange, that with an open field—the full privilege of conceiving of as many deities as they pleased, ages should successively roll away, and not one blameless divinity is found among the objects of human devotion? That from the father of gods and men, down to the tutelary genius of a single individual, there was not one who was supposed to possess positive omnipotence, infinite wisdom and knowledge, or even common goodness? And yet, in full view of all these facts, and a thousand others which may not here be named, we are told that the mere light of nature and plain common sense, are sufficient for all the purposes of religion. If this assertion were true, why were the characters of the Heathen gods so utterly abhorrent? If it is true, how can we account for the stupid and preposterous devotion, which was rendered by men of the first capacities to divinities of wood and stone? If true, what reason can be rendered for the abominable sacrifices and impure rites which deformed the Pagan religion in every part of the world? If true, what apology can be made for the licensed enormities of mankind? But it is not true; nor, in view of what Heathenism was, and is, can any reasonable man think it true!

But there is one fact which is overlooked by skeptics: they apply the knowledge which they have derived from Christianity, and from Christianity alone, to their position, that the light of nature is sufficient to perfect both morals and religion. They forget that the precepts of the Christian doctrine, are effectually calculated to lead and improve the moral sense, at the same time that reason approves the principles and the progress of the mind. They forget that the high and worthy notions which they entertain of the Deity, and the correct moral views which they cherish, are the result of a Christian education. They are indebted to the strong religious feeling of a fond and pious mother, or a tender father, and to the practical lessons of a heavenly morality illustrated by them, and by others around, for all that they feel, and enjoy, or practice above the Heathens. Their youth was guided, directly or indirectly, by the great and pervading influence of the Gospel; and however unseen, or unacknowledged, if seen, it has moulded their minds and feelings to a greater or lesser extent, by its own power. And they constitute a host, which has turned its arms against the institutions by which it has been cherished. If they want evidence of this, let them endeavor to ascertain why their views of the Deity, or of the nature, necessity, and propriety of moral virtue, are so very different from those of the philosophers whom they admire! These lived exclusively under the light of nature, and they were certainly men of acute and admirable common sense; but with the boasted infallibility of these guides, they were greatly behind the moderns in their religious views and moral sentiments: and from what we have already seen, there is yet room for considerable improvement in these respects, in the family of unbelievers. Reason, then, whether in the believer or unbeliever, will infallibly lead to the same conclusion, that the improved theology and morality of skeptics, are the result of the influence of the doctrines and precepts of revelation.

With the views of the Deity entertained by the Heathen, let us now compare those of the Hebrew and the Christian. And then, if we can, account in a satisfactory manner for the difference—a difference which will not only show the immense superiority of the God of the Bible, but one which no unbeliever can dispute is approved by every principle of reason.

1. It was the belief of the Hebrews, and it is that of Christians, that God is absolutely and effectually omnipotent, and that as such, he "doeth his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth." They believe that he neither is, nor can be influenced, thwarted, or controlled by any principle or being separate from or external to himself; but that all that is, or was, or can be, is subject to the direction and control of his all-disposing energy. They believe that he presides with endless and undeviating might, over all that Heathenism denominated chance, or fate, or decree; and that he disposes of, and controls all that lay beyond the utmost boundary of power ever assigned to any Heathen god. And there is something in this view, that satisfies the demands of reason. It explodes chance or accident from the physical and moral universe, and reduces every thing to the direction of supreme intelligence. There is reason to believe that absolute and illimitable power is concentrated in an all-disposing mind. And he who owns a God, can not presume to be reasonable in denying his omnipotence. Nor is there among skeptics, one whose mind would not revolt at the idea of ascribing to him any thing less. To a man, they will admit his proper and unqualified omnipotence, or deny his being. They do not—they dare not conceive of God as did the Heathens of their Jupiter; and they can not do so, and claim the appellation of philosophers, or wise men.

2. The Christian's God is above and beyond the imputation of the foul and hateful passions which disfigure the fairest and the highest beings in the whole Pagan mythology. The student of nature no where sees a single page in all the works of God, polluted by the impurity of his passions. On the contrary, there are every where the traces of a benignity that knows no selfishness, and no limitation—of a purity that pours its freshness over every unsophisticated mind, and of a compassion that provides for all the natural wants of "every living thing." The moralist sees, in the prompt and impartial visitations of chastisement for offences, and in the ample peace of well-doing, the everlasting spirit of equity; and in the measures and means for effecting the reformation of the wicked, and of mitigating the sorrows of the afflicted, the condescension of boundless mercy. And in all these things, there are no signs of capriciousness, no fitful paroxysms of oppressive cruelty, no weak and childish compassion. An even temper and a steady hand adapts the discipline to the disobedient, or measures the sum of blessing to patient and persevering virtue.

The Bible gives the same character to the Deity. Its ascriptions never once fall below moral perfection. Not an unworthy passion or affection attaches to him. He has no lusts to gratify, no intrigues to carry on, no competitors to excite his envy or provoke his indignation. But he is just, merciful, and true; affectionate, benevolent, and compassionate; and his compassions are enduring. These are the moral perfections of the omnipotent God—their field of operation is infinity, and their period is eternity. Such is the purity, the excellency of the Being who presides over the universe. And what is there in these perfections, that reason does not approve, and must not acknowledge to be suitable to the dignity, the government, and the majesty of God? What, that reason does not imperiously demand, as constituent virtues in an infinite moral Governor?

3. The God of the Bible is omniscient. All times, all beings, and all events, are ever in his view. From the greatest to the least of all concernments, through the infinity of their gradations, whether of matter, mind, or morals, they are alike comprehended, controlled, directed, and made in their respective spheres the instruments and appendages of his plan of universal government. The thoughts of all hearts are open to his inspection; he pervades the darkness as well as the light—life as well as a moment, and eternity as well as time. He never slumbers, is never weary, and is never so occupied that his omniscience turns from any one object in the field of immensity. Heaven itself, has no means of attraction, that can for a moment withdraw his attention from earth—from the least, the vilest, the meanest thing that has a being on its surface. And that attention descends below the utmost care of the human mind—makes a miniature world in every department of matter—peoples it with myriads of invisibles, and provides for every want and every purpose of their existence.

And in close and holy communion with this all-pervading knowledge, lives the wisdom of God. With this attribute, the Deity manages the vast, the diversified concerns that throng in infinite number and endless succession before the steady and untiring view of the eternal Mind. His wisdom is never outwitted—its plans are never thwarted, and its determinations can neither be evaded, frustrated, nor postponed. For while the "end was seen from the beginning," all the intermediate steps in the process were amply provided for; and power, knowledge, and wisdom concentrate in one great and immaculate purpose, and bring their infinite resources to bear upon its final accomplishment.

We may now ask, if there is any thing in the character of the God of the Bible, that is inconsistent with reason and sound philosophy? Is it unreasonable to suppose, that the Being who created all things, is present to his works? If not, then the Scripture doctrine concerning his omniscience, is reasonable. And the Psalmist spoke the language of philosophy and common sense, when he said—"If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, [the grave,] behold thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, surely the darkness shall cover me, even the night shall be light about me."

Again, is it unreasonable to suppose that he who knows all things, past, present, and to come, is infinitely wise? Is not knowledge the basis of wisdom, and consequently, is not he the wisest who knows the most? Infinite knowledge, then, is the criterion of infinite wisdom. And is it not also reasonable to ascribe both infinite knowledge and wisdom to the Deity? If it is, the sacred writers displayed their good sense, at least, in saying, that "known unto God are all his works, from the beginning;" and of wisdom—"The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was.—When there were no depths, I was brought forth; when there were no fountains abounding with water."

Is it unreasonable that God should be infinitely perfect in all his moral attributes? The concentration of these, constitutes infinite goodness; and infinite goodness consists in the personal purity of the being to whom it is ascribed, and in the impartial diffusion and exercise of the principles of justice, mercy, truth, and benignity. All this the Scriptures ascribe to God. "Thou art good and doest good;" "The Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." To us it is plain, that the least want in any of these particular perfections, would render the character of God imperfect—that it would undeify the Deity, and that to ascribe such want to him, is to the last degree unreasonable and impious. It is reasonable to believe in God, and no less so, to ascribe to him the attributes and perfections that are worthy of his divinity. And as none but such are attributed to him in the Bible, the doctrines of that book are so far consistent and reasonable, as relate to the divine perfections. But such perfections were never ascribed to the gods of the Heathen; and consequently the mere light of nature furnished none but inconsistent, unworthy, and unreasonable notions of the Deity. The question involved in this subject, and which remains to be settled, is, whence did the Hebrews derive the only rational and consistent views of the natural and moral perfections of the Deity? There are but three sources whence they could have been obtained—and these are, from the surrounding nations, or they originated them, or else derived them by special revelation. As far as miracles are concerned, there is little difference to which we refer their origin. For in either case, considerations are involved which defy the ordinary conclusions of the mind from existing facts, and which can not be accounted for without admitting the violation of the usual processes of human intellect, or a miraculous intervention. To suppose that they were derived from others, is to suppose an effect without an adequate or even an obvious cause; it is to make them impart what there is not a shadow of proof was possessed. For it is too evident to be seriously questioned, that no nation under heaven, of whom history or tradition has given us any information, entertained any corresponding ideas of the nature and character of the Deity. How, then, could the sacred writers borrow their notions of the divine perfections? Reason must say, that if they were obtained from others, they must have been derived from those who had them. But there were none such, and to suppose that they were so procured, is to the last degree unreasonable; it is not only to suppose an effect without a cause, but it is the denial of the necessary effects of existing causes.

Abraham, the father of the Hebrews, evidently came out of a family of idolators—such they certainly were, in the days of his grandson, Jacob; and both among the tribes who then peopled Canaan, and by whom the family of the patriarch was surrounded, and the Egyptians, whose servants his descendants afterwards became for several centuries, the grossest and most revolting polytheism certainly prevailed. Whence, then, could Abraham have borrowed his theology? Whence could his patriarchial sons have learned the doctrine of the divine unity? Whence could Moses, who to a certainty could acquire no such views from any existing system among the Egyptians, or from any other people not connected with the Hebrews, have derived the clear and consistent notions of God, which are so often expressed by him in the books of the law? From the peculiar and isolated nationality of the Hebrews, and their inveterate and cherished prejudices, it is morally certain that they would not have borrowed their religion if they could; and from the fact that no such views existed among others, it is certain that they could not have thus derived them, if they would.

That Moses, who wrote the pentateuch, ascribes these high notions of the Deity to the patriarchs, is undeniable; and that they were maintained exclusively by their descendants till the commencement of the Christian era, is proved by the whole and united testimony of sacred and profane history. Abraham, or Moses—for it is immaterial which, as far as the argument is concerned—must have originated them by the mere force of a superior intellect, or they must have been derived by direct revelation. In either case, the knowledge is miraculous. But we are greatly mistaken, if skeptics are prepared, or disposed to admit that the solitary Mesopotamian was wiser than all the world besides; or that the Hebrew Lawgiver could from the nature of the case, be a sounder philosopher than any other country has produced. If they will admit either, they should by all means believe the Bible, in order to sustain their pretensions to reason and philosophy!

Who that for a moment considers the simplicity of the character of the patriarchs, the comparative rudeness and barbarism of their descendants when contrasted with the superiority of other nations in general knowledge, in social refinement, and civil policy—who that does this, can imagine that mere unassisted intellect ever attained to those sublime and worthy conceptions of the Deity, for which they were distinguished? Is it probable that Abraham alone of all mankind, should be able to form a correct idea of God, and should become, in this respect, the instructor of the human race, without divine aid? That among the millions whose feelings must lead them to the contemplation of congenial subjects, and to form notions of the attributes of God—that of the thousands and tens of thousands of acute and speculative philosophers, the patriarch alone should reason himself into the knowledge of the true God? If it be not absolutely impossible, it is at least extremely improbable, and can scarcely be contended for by any well-informed skeptic, merely to support a favorite hypothesis.

But we have no right to suppose that any one man is exclusively capable of forming, by the mere superiority of his intellect, the only worthy notions of the Deity. There is no parallel by which such a supposition can be sustained. And yet, if the Bible doctrine of the Deity be not a revelation, this must be admitted. For it is certain, that no views worthy of God, were ever discovered by those who do not acknowledge that Book, or have not been educated under its teachings. Besides, were such a supposition admitted, it would by no means answer the purpose of the skeptic, because it would still force him to admit a miracle into his theory. And we put the question to the good sense of the skeptic, or any other man, which is the most out of the order of nature—the most miraculous—that only one man should possess the powers of mind requisite to discover the true principles of theology, or that those principles were revealed from heaven! If miracles are most miraculous, because few in number, then, if natural talents only operated in the discovery of the divine perfections, such an intellect is, of all other things, the most wonderful, since it stands alone, and must forever stand unequalled, the admiration of a world.

The conclusion, then, is, that the only reasonable and philosophical account of the origin of the Bible doctrine respecting the attributes and perfections of the Deity, is, that it was revealed. And that these views are a revelation from God, is proved by their nature, their consistency, and their tendency. They could not have been borrowed by the sacred writers, for there is no evidence that any people, or persons on earth possessed them. They could not have been originated by the Hebrew patriarchs, for they were not distinguished in other respects from those with whom they were associated; and they neither possessed extraordinary talents, or superior means of arriving at truth. And that such high and worthy notions did exist, with such a people as the Hebrews, and at such a time of the world—that they are what they are, and that they have superseded other systems, is proof of their divine original.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE PSALMS.

"O satisfy us early with thy mercy, that we may rejoice and be glad all our days." PSALM xc: 14.

The charming beauties of the Psalms have ever been the theme of admiration. Purity and simplicity of diction, strength and copiousness of style, pathos and sublimity of expression, are among their happiest characteristics. But their chief excellence consists in the animating doctrines they promulgate. In them may be found much to comfort and console us—much to enrich the imagination and exalt the fancy; in them are substantial aliment for reflection, instruction, and imitation. The loving-kindness and unbounded mercy of our Lord, is held up to view in such a manner as to excite in us the most delectable sensations. The whole tenor of these writings are evidently designed, as well as eminently calculated to enforce the duty of reposing our trust in Him "who is good unto all, and whose tender mercies are over all his works." This trust is not partial, but universal. It embraces all created intelligence. The reasons for staying our confidence on God, are pleasingly displayed through every letter, word, and paragraph of these sacred hymns. 'Tis not because he is cruel and unjust; nor because only a part of mankind are to be saved; but on account of his abundant mercy, long-suffering, and universal goodness. These are the reasons of the Psalmist, in calling upon us to put our hopes of safety in Him. He is willing to make all his offspring happy, and he is abundantly able. He has given us evidence sufficient to convince the most skeptical, of his mercy and goodness. He has been kind to his children when they were unthankful; merciful, when they were revengeful; forgiving, when they were vindictive. After all his many and various manifestations of benevolence, impartiality, and kindness, who can fear to put their trust in Him "to whom all power is given"? Would that all men were satisfied "early with thy mercy," O Lord! then might they "rejoice and be glad all their days." Then would the notes of these divine songs, roll in melody o'er their souls. ASA.

South Venice, October, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1838.

JAMES V: 21-27.

Before we can make any very useful or rational application of any passage of Scripture to ourselves, we should well understand the circumstances of those to whom it was primarily addressed, and the particular occasion which originated it. This, we know, is not the usual method followed in making these ancient writings applicable in modern times, and to altered circumstances; it is more usual to pass by the inquiry into the occasion of any address or exhortation, and to consider what was once enjoined by apostolic authority, to be obligatory still—what was intended merely as the application of Christian principles to people in particular circumstances, as equally important and equally applicable to us, let our circumstances be what they may. Instances of such gross injustice to Scripture, might be readily adduced; the memory of most readers will suggest some. That we may be preserved from such blind following of blind leaders, let us, in the present instance, as always, investigate the original circumstances and occasion which produced the penning of any passage we may have under consideration, and then, having a clear conception of the primary application, we may be able to make a more satisfactory, rational, and edifying application of it to our own cases, times, and circumstances. We can then represent to ourselves what the author would have modified, left out, or added, in correspondence with the circumstances of a modern auditory—what he would have altered in altered circumstances.

We may gather from what precedes our paragraph, in conjunction with other scattered hints of the state of opinion among the converted Jews, that they made God's revelations more an occasion of pride, than a directory of practice; that they were theoretical and disputatious, more than plain and practical Christians. They seem to have held that it was enough to have a knowledge, and make a profession of religion, without any anxious care to make their lives correspond with the principles which they professed. It would appear, also, that they had the hardihood to allege, in vindication of their careless and wicked conduct, that God tempts men to sin, and is the author, in reality, of wicked as well as better actions. From the 19th and 20th verses we may also infer that talkativeness, disputation, and proselytism were much more common manifestations of their kind of religion, than serious inquiry and consideration. It is a good remark of Dr. Macknight, that "persons half learned, having an high opinion of their own knowledge in religious matters, are very fond of instructing others, and zealous to bring them over to their opinions." Such appear to have been abundant among the Jewish converts, to whom, wherever scattered, this epistle was addressed; and we are not without such converts at the present day.

It was to men of such sentiments that James, the brother of Jesus, as is generally supposed, thus speaks:—"Seek no longer to excuse your falling before temptation, for it betrays only your filthiness; neither manifest any longer your zeal for religion, by reviling those who differ from you in opinion, or by a disposition to dispute and proselytize; for that is only an overflowing of a malicious spirit; but with a teachable disposition, embrace the new revelation, which is able to save your souls. Deceive yourselves no longer, however, with the notion that knowledge alone will effect this object. A hearer of the Word, without practical conformity, is not more wise, nor more benefited by his knowledge, than that man would be, who, with deformities in his appearance, came to a looking-glass which revealed them, but neglected to remove or amend what he had seen amiss. If I were to fix upon one evidence more than another, that a man's religion was false, I should say that his religion was especially worthless, whose tongue abounded with calumnious imputations against those who differed from him in opinion. And, on the other hand, if I were to fix upon one mark more characteristic than another of genuine religion, I would say that it consisted in benevolent exertions in behalf of those who had nothing to bestow in return, and in endeavors to preserve oneself from those vices which disgrace and blemish society. Brethren, we can make the application—an easy one—each one for himself. May it be so made as to yield fruit, in some sixty, in some a hundred fold. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

REPLY OF BR. MESSINGER.

BR. GOODRICH—Your notice of the report of my having renounced Universalism, and become an Episcopalian, addressed to me through the Magazine and Advocate, is not the first report of a similar kind that has been spread concerning me.—For it was reported, and believed by many, that I became a Presbyterian shortly after I left Salisbury, and moved to Bainbridge. Again, when I was in Bainbridge last Spring, it had been reported by some, that I had become a Methodist, by some that I had become a Presbyterian, and by others that I had become an Episcopalian. I was frequently questioned whether I had changed, and I informed all who inquired, that my sentiments were not changed, and that I still conscientiously remained a Universalist, and should probably continue to be one as long as my reason and intelligence should remain. But I had scarcely got into this State, before the report was again circulated that I had become an Episcopalian. It really seems as though the various Limitarian sects determined that I should be a Limitarian of some kind, whether I will or not. I assure you my dear brother and all who ever knew me, that all the reports which have ever been circulated respecting my renouncing Universalism, are without the least foundation in truth. I am not conscious that I have ever done, or said, or written any thing that could give rise to the above reports. By the grace of God I expect to remain a Universalist through time and eternity. It is my prayer to God, that I may be led into all truth, and ever be actuated by the precepts, examples and spirit of the benevolent, meek, and gentle Redeemer. Yours truly,

GEO. MESSINGER.

Springfield, Clark county, Ohio, October 15, 1838.

[From the Universalist Union.]

U. S. GENERAL CONVENTION OF UNIVERSALISTS.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS.

The Convention assembled in the Supreme Court Room, in Boston, at 8 o'clock A. M., September 19th, and was called to order by Br. A. C. Thomas, the former Moderator and Clerk being absent. Stebbins Walbridge, Esq., of Bennington, Vt., was called to the chair, after which the Standing Clerk reported the following list of delegates from the several Conventions, viz:

MAINE.—W. A. Drew, D. D. Smith, G. Smith. C. C. Burr, ministers; and J. Metcalf, J. S. Comings, G. Mendum, H. Barrett, A. Lyon, S. Winchester, lay delegates.

NEW-HAMPSHIRE.—A. L. Balch, J. Moore, J. Shrigley, A. P. Cleverly, Ministers; and J. Cheever, A. P. Smith, D. Farnsworth, A. Waterman, J. Dow, R. Porter, lay delegates.

VERMONT.—R. Streeter, K. Haven, S. Laws, ministers; and S. Walbridge, lay delegate.

MASSACHUSETTS.—H. Ballou, J. H. Willis, J. M. Spear, T. B. Thayer, ministers; and A. T. Newhall, L. Smith, A. Carlton, M. Lincoln, C. D. Palmer, lay delegates.

RHODE-ISLAND.—W. S. Balch, B. H. Davis, ministers; and M. Knapp, A. Pitcher, lay delegates.

CONNECTICUT.—A. Moore, minister; and S. Silloway, S. Stearns, lay delegates.

NEW-YORK—S. R. Smith, R. Tomlinson, O. Whiston, T. J. Sawyer, ministers; and S. Van Schaack, C. Eldred, L. Seymour, A. Underwood, L. Philleo, lay delegates.

PENNSYLVANIA.—S. W. Fuller, A. C. Thomas, ministers; and Wm. Taylor, lay delegate.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—L. Dwelle, lay delegate.

Hon. A. T. NEWHALL, of Linfield, Mass., was elected Moderator, and Br. WM. S. BALCH, of Providence, R. I., Clerk.

The Constitution and By-Laws, and proceedings of the last session of this Convention were then read.

Br. T. J. Sawyer, from the Committee appointed at the last session of this Convention to publish the proceedings and Occasional Sermon of that and the preceding session, reported that he had discharged the duties of his appointment, and that a large quantity of the pamphlets remained unsold, and that he had incurred a debt of between $40 and 50 which remained unpaid.

On motion, the above report was referred to Brs. J. M. Spear, D. D. Smith, John Moore, H. Ballou and T. J. Sawyer, with instruction to report thereon, and also to recommend some course for publishing the proceedings of the present and future sessions of this body.

Brs. W. A. Drew, R. Tomlinson, A. C. Thomas, R. Porter, S. Walbridge, J. H. Willis, M. Knapp and A. Moore, were appointed a Committee to recommend a place for the next session of this body.

Brs. P. Martin, C. Eldred and S. Winchester, were appointed to nominate some suitable person to deliver the next occasional sermon.

The Convention held a recess, during which the occasional sermon was delivered by Br. Abel C. Thomas. Prayers were offered by Brs. A. L. Balch and D. J. Mandell.

The Committee to whom was referred the publication of the proceedings of the Convention, made a report, which after some debate was laid on the table.

On motion, adjourned to meet at 10 o'clock, A. M. to-morrow.

Thursday, A. M., 10 o'clock,—after prayer by Br. S. R. Smith, the proceedings of yesterday were read.

The Committee to nominate a preacher of the next occasional sermon, reported in favor of appointing Br. John Moore, of New-Hampshire, and K. Haven, of Vermont, substitute—none having been selected from those States. Report adopted.

Statistical Reports from Massachusetts, New-Hampshire and Rhode Island, were then read.—Reports from other States were not presented.

The Committee to designate a place for the next session of this Convention reported that they had received requests from Portland, Me., Cooperstown, N. Y., Strafford and Bennington, Vt., and Troy, N. Y., and that they recommend Portland, Me., as the most suitable place. Adopted.

The following resolution was presented and passed:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Convention that delegates appointed to this body by the State Conventions, are in duty bound to attend to the business of the Convention, in preference to attending public worship, or other ordinary affairs.

The report of the Committee on the publication of proceedings of the past and present sessions of this Convention, was called up, when the following substitute was presented, argued, and passed; viz.:

Resolved, That a subscription be opened among the brethren at this session, to defray the deficit of expenses incurred by the Committee of publication of 1837, and that the copies of the pamphlets remaining unsold be divided among the persons so subscribing in proportion to the amount contributed: and that the proceedings of the present session be published in our periodicals.

Resolved, That if the amount subscribed should exceed the deficit referred to, the surplus shall be put into the Treasury of the Universalist Historical Society.

Whereupon a subscription was opened and the amount forthwith made up.

Resolved, That the Council of the United States Convention, respectfully advise the several State Conventions in its fellowship, to respect the official acts of discipline of each sister State Convention.

On motion, Voted, That the Clerk be directed to publish the proceedings of this session in our periodicals, accompanied with a Circular.

On motion, Voted, That the thanks of this Convention be presented to Br. A. C. Thomas for his Sermon, and that he be respectfully requested to furnish a copy for publication.

Voted, That our thanks be presented to the brethren in this city and vicinity, for their liberal entertainment during our Conventional meeting, and also to the Second Universalist Society and the Choir attached to said Society, for their kind attentions during this meeting.

On motion, Voted, That our thanks be presented to Hon. A. T. Newhall, for the efficient manner in which he has discharged the duties of the Chair during this session of our Convention.

United in devout thanksgiving and prayer to Almighty God with Br. Kittredge Haven.

Adjourned to meet in Portland, Me., on the Tuesday evening preceding the third Wednesday in September, 1839.

ASA T. NEWHALL, Moderator.
WILLIAM S. BALCH, Clerk.

CIRCULAR LETTER.

To all of like precious faith with us; to all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity; and to all to whom this epistle may come;—To you, brethren and sisters, the General Convention of Universalists send Christian salutation, earnestly desiring the fellowship of the spirit, and the communion of saints. Grace be unto you.

Dearly Beloved:—Through the abundant kindness of God we have been permitted to enjoy a season of unprecedented delight. Our denomination never met on an occasion more deeply interesting, or more truly profitable. Never was there collected in our country so great a number of believers in the great salvation, nor so many who are engaged in publicly proclaiming it to a sinful world. Long shall we have occasion to remember with heartfelt gratitude, the session of our Convention in 1838, when more than one hundred and twenty preachers of the common salvation, and uncounted multitudes of devoted believers were congregated around a common altar, to commingle their sympathies and joys, to render thanksgiving and praise to the Kind Source of all favors, and worship in the name of him who died for all, that all might live.

The services during our Convention were uncommonly interesting. The house in which we assembled is large and commodious; but it was thronged in every part, and multitudes, who desired, could not gain admission. The public exercises were of an elevated and purely evangelical character. The great doctrine of the Gospel was ably discussed, and its practical bearings were set home with the demonstration of the spirit and of power. One sentiment pervaded all minds—gratitude to God, and love and good-will to all men.—One desire burned in every bosom—the desire that all men might see and feel as we then saw and felt. There was not a wish or thought that was not directed by the love of God and our fellowmen. However discordant or desponding our feelings might have been when we came together, we all soon drank the same spirit, and separated with the same bright hope glowing within us.—But why should I attempt to describe the pleasures of that occasion? They were above description. Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered the heart of man to conceive the pure, unsullied joys of that meeting. Those who wish to know them hereafter, must be present during our anniversaries.

No part of our meeting was more interesting than the communion service, at which near eight hundred believers ate and drank at the table of him whose body was broken and whose blood was shed for the remission of all sin. The pervading spirit of God was there, and we felt it. A solemn joy pervaded all hearts. The burst of grateful feeling could hardly be repressed. The silent tear, the half-breathed sigh, the suppressed smile, the heaving bosom, all bore evidence of the deep impression, which that simple service made upon all minds. And we separated from that place, with better feelings, purer sentiments, and holier desires. We felt more attached to our Saviour and his cause, more ardent in our affections for each other, and stronger in our resolutions to extend abroad, even to all men the precious Gospel of the blessed God. Such seasons bring refreshment to the soul; and we would recommend to our fraternity the subject of Christian ordinances, that they with the spirit of true religion in their hearts should allow it to shine in their lives.—Many, we know, were present at that communion who never enjoyed such an occasion before, and who will remember it with joy to the day of their death. But let us all be careful not to substitute the shadow for the substance, but remember that every substance will have a shadow necessarily, till we are come into the full blaze of perfect day with its light all around us, then the blessing shadowed forth in this dim world shall become a complete reality, and God be all in all.

The business of our Council was transacted with the utmost unanimity, but not with that regularity and despatch which could have been desired. It is believed that the business of our Conventions could be performed in much less time, and to a far better account, if all the members would take hold of the work with all readiness of mind, and allow nothing else to divide their attention till it was completed. We are excusable in part, perhaps, for our neglect of attention to business, from the consideration that we are exceedingly happy to meet our brethren from various parts of the vineyard, whom we have not seen in a long time, perhaps, never before, and to exchange with them the affectionate salutations of fraternal feeling.—But it would be well to remember the maxim,—"What thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." Order, regularity, and promptitude should always mark the proceedings of deliberative bodies. Correctness and despatch will be the consequence.

While upon this point, it may not be improper to suggest for the consideration of those who shall constitute our future Conventions, that the experience of the past has taught us the propriety of having the business of the Convention matured somewhat in the minds of the members before they come together, and also to remember that it is not so much the object of their convocation to legislate for the denomination, as it is to gather facts and intelligence respecting our faith, and promote good fellowship throughout our entire brotherhood.

Upon the business of the present session, it is not necessary to remark. The minutes of the proceedings are before you. It is presumed the State Conventions will heed the advice contained in a resolution intended for their benefit, that the utmost harmony may always prevail in all parts of our God's heritage.

It is sincerely regretted that so many States failed to furnish the reports required of them by our Constitution. It is among the first objects of this Convention to furnish a medium for the annual concentration of all the facts which are interesting and important in relation to the growth and condition of our denomination. This duty has been inexcusably neglected the present year.—But we have the promise from the several State delegations that it shall yet be discharged. And with this view the publication of these minutes has been delayed, that the promises might be fulfilled, and the reports appear. As yet none has been received. But I would suggest to the State delegations that they cause them to be published in our periodicals, that the desired information may thus be made public.

On the review of the present condition of our denomination, we have abundant reason to thank God and take courage. It was never more prosperous. Our prospects are bright and encouraging in every respect. We do not count our success merely from the number of new Societies, or additions to old ones; from the extensive reaches of our doctrine towards the South and West; or from the additions to the ministry; though in all these our advance is without a parallel. But our confidence is not in our numerical strength. It is in the mighty power of truth, which is working a most astonishing change in the whole aspect of the religious institutions of our own, and all civilized countries. It is a truth which none, with open eyes, can deny, that the world is rapidly becoming liberal. What a change has been wrought within the last half century! How altered are the feelings and prospects of all Christians! I have not time for the comparison. I need not make it. It is obvious to all. Not that every body is soon to be called by our name. Names are but trifles; but the things named are all important. And it should be remembered that every change for the better—from darkness to light, from error to truth, from sin to holiness, from hatred to love, from selfishness to liberality, from sorrow to joy, from hell to heaven—is so far an approximation to Universalism. And once in this sublime career, this heaven-ward race, the human mind will never rest satisfied till all darkness, sin and suffering is completely and forever removed, till the cry of guilt and the wail of wo shall no longer arise from any corner of God's universal empire; but the power of truth and love exercise an undisputed influence over all intelligences, and extend a full and perfect deliverance to all the sons and daughters of humanity.

To the accomplishment of an object so grand and glorious, the hopes, the prayers, the labors of all Christians and philanthropists, and all the philosophers and statesmen are directed. To meliorate the condition of our race, to extend the light and liberty of truth and benevolence, is at least, the ostensible object of all. The enlightened and liberal spirit of our age will tolerate no other pretence. And though there may yet remain some unsubdued, some rebellious spirits, yet the promise made to Abraham is fulfilled and the seed of the faithful have gotten possession of the gates of the enemy. Final conquest is certain. Only let those who "have been called unto liberty, not use it for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another," and in all things show themselves a pattern of the power and perfections of the truth as revealed in Jesus, and others seeing our good works, will be compelled to acknowledge that God is with us of a truth, and will straightway come and go along with us, "to take the kingdom, and possess it forever, even forever and ever."

Brethren, we profess to be in advance of our brethren of other names in this great work of moral reformation and salvation; and our profession, I trust, is not in vain. Our views of Deity and his government, of the duty and destiny of our race, are more expansive and liberal than theirs, and, we think, more correct. If it is so, have not the world a right, not only to expect, but to demand of us a more pure and perfect life, a more deep and abiding sense of duty, a more generous and forgiving spirit, a more elevated and subduing piety, a more sincere and ardent worship, a more calm and patient submission, a brighter hope and a firmer faith than is possessed by those of less attainment? Ought we not to be pioneers, not only in doctrine but in practice—in all things which appertain to the principles of Gospel grace? Our doctrine, true or false, embraces the only principles which it is safe to carry out in moral practice; and while it is the glory of professors of a partial scheme of grace, that their conduct is better than their creed, it is our disgrace that our conduct falls far short of the dictates of our doctrine. Our sentiments teach us to love God and all men, to do good to all, to render evil for evil to no man, but to overcome evil with good, and promises thereby to make us children of our Father in heaven—like him.—Whether it will do to exhibit the character attributed to Deity by Partialists, in our conduct, and to enact here, in miniature, the scene they believe will transpire hereafter, I leave to the decision of those who are qualified to judge.

Let us remember then, dear brethren, that the surest test of our faith rests not in the antiquity of our creeds and confessions, but on the purity of our thoughts and lives; and that this is the boldest evidence, the most resistless argument, we can present to others in favor of our doctrine. The fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. If this spirit be in us, we shall be neither barren nor unfruitful, but shall always abound in the work of the Lord. The evidence of this Conventional meeting, has offered additional proof, confirmatory of the fact that such is the case, for in all our deliberations, in all our intercourse, no spirit but that of the purest love abounded in all our hearts. O may this sacred flame spread through our whole community, and warm every heart and quicken it into greater activity, that our whole fraternity may be found faithful in every good word and work.

Many thanks are due to the friends in Boston, for their liberal hospitality to the brethren during the Convention. Their numbers were great, and their means ample, and they employed them with a generosity which reflects upon them great credit. We trust they were not unblessed in these deeds of brotherly kindness.

Finally, brethren, farewell. Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you.—Even so, Amen. Per order, W. S. Balch.

—

STATISTICAL REPORTS.

Massachusetts.—The Massachusetts Convention of Universalists would tender Christian salutation to the General Convention of Universalists in the United States, at its session in the city of Boston, in September, 1838; and respectfully submit for its inspection the following statements of facts with respect to the existing condition and prospects of Universalism in the State of Massachusetts.

The facts hereby submitted have been gathered, chiefly, from the documents of Committees, appointed by the Convention at its previous session, to report to it the state of our common cause in the respective counties of the Commonwealth, at its session in June last. They are not so full and circumstantial as could have been wished; but sufficiently so to furnish a pretty correct view of the present state of our affairs in this region.

1 Convention—Associations, 3—Quarterly Conferences, 2—Young Men's Institutes, from 12 to 15—Societies, 140 or 150—Churches of communicants, about 50—Meeting-Houses, not far from 80—Preachers, between 80 and 90.

In the county of Essex, there are 19 societies—18 meeting-houses—12 settled pastors—about the same number of churches for the celebration of the Lord's Supper; and, in many places, Sabbath schools have been instituted, and promise very happy results.

County of Middlesex—13 societies with settled pastors, and 9 which have preaching a part of the time, from one half to a fourth—14 meeting-houses—10 or 12 churches of communicants—and about the same number of Sabbath schools.

County of Suffolk, including Boston and Chelsea, 5 societies—4 settled pastors—4 meeting-houses. Two of these, one belonging to the first, and the other to the fifth society, are in an unfinished state. They are spacious, brick buildings, with stone fronts on the basement story, and will be completed in the course of a few months. The society heretofore known by the name of "The Central Universalist Society," has, during the past year, relinquished its original title, and assumed that of "The Bulfinch-Street Church." Four churches of communicants, embracing in all not far from 300 members—5 Sabbath schools, containing between 5 and 600 pupils—2 Bible Classes—and one Young Men's Universalist Institute. There is also in Chelsea a Union society, composed chiefly of Universalists, which has a flourishing Sabbath school, and of which Br. W. H. Knapp is the stated pastor. Indeed, in this county, the cause of the common salvation is, in every respect, in a prosperous state.

County of Norfolk—7 societies—5 meeting-houses—1 settled pastor—3 Sabbath schools—3 churches of communicants—2 Institutes.

Counties of Hampden, Hampshire and Franklin.—All I have been able to learn from these counties is, that there is a respectable and flourishing society in Cabotville, under the pastoral care of Br. W. M. Fernald; and another in Warren, of which Br. J. W. Talbot is pastor. The society in Cabotville is the largest in the three counties, and owns a new and commodious meeting-house. There is also a considerable number of believers in Ludlow, Springfield, West Springfield, Ware, and several other towns; but whether there are in any of them regularly organized societies, I have not learned.

County of Berkshire.—In this county, so far as I have been able to ascertain, there are but four organized societies, viz., one of about 40 members at Mount Washington, and another of about 30 at Egremont. The former of these supports preaching about one fourth of the time; and the latter, I believe, has been pretty soundly asleep for several years. There is also a small, but zealous society in South Adams; and another at Florida. The latter was originally a Baptist society. It united itself with the Universalist denomination in 1833; and still enjoys the labors of its former pastor, the Rev. D. Thayer. Professed believers are to be found in almost every town in this county; and in several places, in sufficient numbers to form respectable societies; but hitherto they have been too lukewarm and indolent to do any thing towards the organization and support of societies for the public worship of God.

Barnstable, Nantucket and Dukes counties.—Provincetown, one flourishing society, Br. J. B. Dods, pastor. Eastham—an infant society;—preaching a part of the time. A spirit of earnest inquiry has recently been awakened. Orleans—one good society. Owns a good meeting-house. Enjoys the constant ministry of the word by Br. E. Vose. Chatham—one good society; the oldest and wealthiest in the county. Owns a convenient meeting-house. Has constant preaching by Br. W. S. Cilley. Prospects very good.—

Brewster—one small, but devoted society. Owns a good meeting-house, and has preaching one-half of the time by Br. N. Gunnison. The gates of hell can not prevail against this little band. Dennis—two societies. Both zealous. Intend to build. Br. N. Gunnison preaches with them a fourth of the time. Yarmouthport—one society. A good house of worship. Br. J. N. Parker is settled here, and preaches one half of the time.—Prospects encouraging. Barnstable—two societies. One at Hyannis, and the other at West Barnstable. The former has a meeting-house, and preaching all the time by Br. G. Hastings; the other, no house; but preaching occasionally by different ministering brethren. Sandwich and Falmouth have numbers of nominal believers; but in the former, they have put their light under a bushel; and in the latter, they never, it is to be feared, had any. In Harwich, however, there are a few warm-hearted friends of truth, who hold meetings for public worship some portion of the time.

In Nantucket and Dukes counties, Universalism has made but very humble advances. There are many zealous and wealthy believers in these counties; but they are without any thing like organization; and of course can do but little for the furtherance of our good cause. Nothing seems to be wanting in this section of our Master's vineyard, except a few discreet, active and resolute leaders; and this want, it is hoped, will ere long be supplied. God grant that it may be speedily done.

County of Bristol.—New-Bedford—one respectable and growing society under the pastoral charge of Br. J. M. Spear. Connected with this society is a flourishing Sabbath school; also a female charitable society; and the brethren have resolved that they will have a church. There is also a society in Taunton; and a goodly number of believers at Fall River. In both these places there is occasional preaching, but no settled pastor.—Were an able and laborious minister of reconciliation located in either of these situations, he would, no doubt, become the instrument of a rapid and wide spread to the truth as it is in Jesus.

During the past year several of our ministering brethren have exchanged their fields of labor; and one, Br. Hanscom, late pastor of the Society in Waltham, has been called to his long home.—He was a young man of good talents, and of great promise; zealous and laborious;—and a peculiarly warm and elevated spirit of devotion pervaded his whole mind and heart. It continued vigorous and active till the last pulsation of his life. His praise was deservedly in all our churches; and few, if any, have lived more highly esteemed, or died more deeply lamented.

But we have had occasions of joy, as well as of sorrow. The Rev. E. N. Harris, for eight or ten years an acceptable preacher among the Baptists, has been blessed with an enlargement of faith, and come over to our help. He is now the pastor of the Universalist Society in Methuen; has thus far been very abundant and successful in his labors, and promises to be eminently useful as a member of our ministry.

From the foregoing facts and circumstances, it will be obvious that, as a general thing, the cause of Universalism in Massachusetts is encouragingly prosperous at the present time. Respectfully submitted by order of the Massachusetts Convention of Universalists. S. STREETER.

(Continued in our next.)

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CONFERENCE.

The second Conference of the Allegany Association, met in Hume, October 24th and 25th, 1838. Brs. L. Couch, Moderator, and J. Babcock, Clerk. Sermons were preached by Brs. Babcock, and Lewis. Br. Sharp assisted in the services. The friends in Hume were very much disappointed. They expected to see the notice of the Conference in the Magazine and Advocate, but in consequence of some negligence or miscarriage, the Minutes of the first quarterly Conference (held at Carrol) containing the adjournment, were not published. Consequently they did not know of the meeting until the very day, and many could not make it convement to attend. They therefore request that a notice be given in the Magazine and Advocate, that a Conference will be held in Hume, the 29th and 30th days of December, 1838.

Ministering brethren are respectfully invited to attend.
Hume, October 27, 1838. I. B. SHARP.

REMARKS.—No Minutes of the Conference at Carrol, have been received, so far as any of us can remember—neither was any notice of the Conference at Hume, received, to the best of our knowledge.—EDS.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1838.

MAN!—WHAT IS HE?

Man is a social, thinking, accountable, mortal being; capable of noble moral action or of horrible vice; a creature of habit, either of good or evil, generally according to the education he receives and the circumstances which surround him in life and induce him to act.

When the best feelings and principles of his nature are developed, how beautiful is the result of their action. They exalt a Fenelon with a love which turned aside even the spear of the wandering Cossack; they send a Howard to the dark, damp dungeon of the condemned criminal, to open the buried affection and soften the hardened heart; they divest Sisters of Charity of the fears of Cholera, the angel of death, in order to comfort the sick and cheer the dying; they enable a David to subdue the murderous Saul at the caves of Engedi, and a Penn to subdue the ferocious savage of America; they fill the hand of man with charity, influence his actions with virtue, and dispose him to every good and perfect work; and in all the sublimity of their power, warmed with love divine and strengthened by the spirit of heaven, they led the way in the Saviour's heavenly example, when for his bitter foes he prayed, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

But when the passions of man are let loose; when he worships at the altars of sin; when his pride, lust, ambition, and bitter revenge are awake, and are suffered to run riot over his reason and his sense of right; how melancholy is the result; how dark the picture; how solemnly the thought comes home upon the mind, "God made man upright, but he has sought out many inventions." His arm becomes nerved for war and he revels in blood; his soul becomes iron, and he oppresses the widow and the orphan; he becomes ambitious, and he wades in blood and sits upon a throne founded upon bayonets; he dreams of feeling better, and becomes intemperate, debases his mind, yields his gentility, ruins his property, destroys the peace of his family, brings the grey hairs of his parents in sorrow to the grave, and himself fills at last, a dishonored and an ignominious tomb; he becomes self-conceited, and acts as though he had no Creator to judge him, or God to punish him for his wickedness; he forgets the bounty which blesses him, and takes the name of God in vain; he spreads blasting and mildew in community, and by the evil of his example, corrupts his fellows around him. Happy were it for the world, if man would put aside these devices, restrain these passions, and live, as he should live, the worshipper of his Father, and the friend of his fellow-beings. This he can do; for God has nobly blest him with moral power, capable of being instructed and strengthened by the light of the Scriptures; and if this power is only exercised, man will become the friend of the oppressed and the adherent of virtue in all the ways of holiness.

Man is a thinking being—he possesses mind. By mind, something is intended besides simple matter. When we address an individual, we do not address mere form, mere outward show, for an idiot may have all the outward portions of the human form, without capacity of thought. We address something which we do not see—a power which thinks and directs the tongue what words to use in expressing thoughts. This power is mind. How glorious is that mind. Without it, man is a mere shell, a sun without light, a blind, helpless, idiotic creature. But with it, how nobly he ascends in the scale of being.—How countless, how vast, how grand are the results which spring from human mind! By it, man has unveiled the riches of the mountain, has crossed the stormy ocean on the wings of the wind, has made steam an obedient servant, has almost annihilated distance, has penetrated the secrets of the earth's surface, has ascended to the stars and there read the grandeur, sublimity, wisdom, power and goodness of him who from everlasting to everlasting is God, world without end. And besides this, by his mind he has discovered that method through whose agency he can communicate the result of his researches to his brethren in the far parts of the earth, by noting it down in a book—so that a single mind can instruct and kindle the energies of other minds, though mighty seas roll between them.

One singular power of human mind, is, its capacity of retrospection, of recalling past events. How inscrutably mysterious and beyond all explanation is the fact, that a man, who may sit as calmly and as motionless as a breathless statue, yet has a mind at work within him, which is either scourging him for sin committed, or else meditating upon the wonderful events which crowd the the history of the world. The mind may either cast itself among the nations that once lived and are dead, or, if away from home, it may recollect each beloved feature and visit every cherished spot, or, on the wings of faith, it may go forward to the period when it shall be clothed with immortality and dwell with God and the Saviour.

But, however strange mind may be; however powerful man may be; however wonderful his works; yet all must pass away from earth; for man, like the flowing waters, is continually upon the change—here there is no abiding place. The past proves it. Man, as an individual, and men, forming nations, all fade away. If we behold the rising of the Babylonian empire, we also behold its fall—if we gaze upon the existence of the Persian empire under Cyrus, we also gaze upon its death—if we witness the growth of the Grecian empire, we also witness its decay—if we trace the successive progression of the Roman empire, we also trace its erasure from the list of existing nations. We see the dews, the mildews of time, gathering from the deserts of fate and hovering over vast cities, and their place knew them not, for they fled like the sands of the desert-storm—so passed Nineveh, so melted away Thebes, so fled Tadmor, so decayed Athens, so fell Carthage, and so died Rome. Works of grandeur, splendors of fashion, dreams of power and granite edifices, were destroyed by the hand of time, whose capacious strength levelled the whole in the dust. Amid all these events, what is man? A worm of greatness—a grain of magnificence—a reflection of mighty power—a child of creative art; who accomplished astonishing works, raised cities and gathered empires but to be overwhelmed in the dust of their ruins. Oh, where are the millions which have melted away like ice in the fires of the sun? Gone—and of all their works, no sight can be found, save a few scattered remnants of empire, or a fragment of demolished cities, or a pyramid flung upon the sands of the desert, a monument of the folly and the power of man. The events which astonished and terrified; the facts which pleased and made happy; excite but little notice now—save the lingering interest with which some lover of history consecrates the places where they lived and died. All sleep in oblivion. Empire after empire, nation after nation, city after city, millions after millions, have thus died and disappeared like the Northern Lights, which flash their glory upon the sky, and then fade, until, with a few faint gleams, they cease to be.

Man must enter the congregated shades of death.—He can not escape. And it is a solemn reflection, that though man may be proud and roll in his gold, yet the worm of the coffin will make no distinction between the king and the beggar—it will use its power in returning all flesh to the dust from which it was formed.

G. W. M.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS....NO. XIV.

The Psalmist made an honest confession, when he affirmed, "I said in my heart, all men are liars." Ps. cxvi: 11.

From some disappointment or cross, he was induced to look upon all men as liars; to class them together, good, bad and indifferent, and with the tongue of a cynic, to denominate them all bad. But this was not the conviction of his heart, for he affirms that he said it in haste—it was not the conviction of his better judgment; hence he made the acknowledgement which he did.

It is not unfrequently the case, that we hear persons condemning the whole world, and because disappointed in some particular thing, pronouncing all men a pack of scoundrels. And it is not as unfrequently the case, that we hear persons denominating all mankind totally depraved—which amounts to the same thing as calling them "all liars," for a totally depraved person must be "opposed to all good, and wholly inclined to all evil." And yet, when we remember the many sympathies of the heart for the distressed; when we see how ready people are to comfort, assist and protect the sick; when we see, even amid heathen darkness, the most noble exhibitions of charity, it does not seem as though the world was "totally depraved." True, there is vice enough among men, but it does not follow that they are "all liars." Indeed, the very way to make them so, is to act as though they were so. Take a decent man, continually insinuate that he is wicked, give him no credit for good deeds, and certainly a better course could not be pursued to make him actually evil. And men have so long been told that they are incapable of a good thing, and are "totally depraved," that it is not at all wonderful some should act as though they were "totally depraved." It is taking the part of a misanthrope, to call men all vile, because we may have been disappointed. And yet how frequently this is done. But it is very incorrect. There is a great deal of integrity among men, much tender feeling, and a large measure of honesty; while many act honorably to their Creator and mankind. Even if the world was as bad as it is sometimes represented, yet I should prefer to think well of mankind, for it is a much more comfortable feeling, than the reflection that there is nothing around us but wickedness.

Christianity, the holiest and best of all systems, teaches us not to think meanly of the world, not to degrade the work of the Creator; but whenever we discover evil, to use all our exertions in removing it, that our fellows may learn to do well. That we do not act thus, to the extent that we might, is obvious; for if every professed follower of Christ should set such an example and practice such conduct as they might do, the moral world would be revolutionized. But that men are not all bad, is pretty clearly proved by their forbearing one another in these hard times of universal pressure, when the want of money is the root of much evil. G. W. M.

APOLOGETIC AND EXPOSTULATORY.

I am informed that some of our readers and correspondents complain that I delay or refuse inserting some articles in which they feel interested. That they may have just cause for dissatisfaction in a few instances, I will not deny; for I am deeply and painfully sensible of many short comings in my Editorial duties. But I also think that my criminality is not without excuse, and beg leave to state a few extenuating circumstances.

I have not only a family to support, but am principal partner in a concern which requires a very large weekly income to defray its current expences. I have no capital—no earthly reliance but the proceeds of my labor as preacher and Editor. In fortunate circumstances, these labors would be easily performed. But for two years past, and especially during the present year, many of our subscribers and debtors (including, possibly, some who complain of my neglect of duty!) have not fulfilled their implied obligations of honor and justice toward us; and therefore left us without adequate resources to meet our obligations to others. I have been obliged to take time from my editorial duties, and (what was worse) to rack my brain, week after week, and month after month, for expedients by which our business could be continued, until those for whom we toiled so incessantly, would be able and willing to pay us at least a good portion of what we earned so hardly! The time spent and the cankering cares endured in this manner, are the principal causes of my remissness in editorial duty—and the remissness of those on whose honor, promptness and ability we are so fearfully and tremblingly dependent, is the sole cause of nearly all that we and our readers have endured; I would to God I could tell a tale more creditable to our delinquent subscribers; but I can not, in truth. With many thousand dollars outstanding, that should have been paid us months and months ago, we are perpetually cramped for the want of means to meet current expences. To add to all, sickness has interfered, and added to my cares and labors, until my own health sunk under these accumulated burdens, and the springs of mind and spirit lost their energy and power. I feel that I can not be and do what I would, under such galling circumstances; and gladly would I resign my post, with all its cares and labors, and retire to a more quiet and easy employment, if any one would pay me for past sacrifices, and release me from all my present toils and obligations.

Now, let any one dissatisfied with my course, make my case his own—place himself, as much as his imagination can conceive it, in my situation—and he will readily feel that I have fallen short of duty because others have fallen short in duty to us! May I not humbly entreat, then, that mine, alone, should not be all the censure—all the punishment? Indeed, I think I have already suffered sufficiently. Five thousand dollars, poor as I am, would be no temptation to induce me to live over again the toils, and cares, and bitter, bitter disappointments I have endured for the last 18 months! I declare this in sincerity and truth—and perhaps the end is not yet; for many of our subscribers seem just now as dilatory in heeding our urgent calls for aid, as ever!

But, to make a long apology short; I have taken measures which will enable me, during next volume, to devote my whole time to my editorial duties, whenever necessary. If our subscribers will promptly meet their engagements, so as to allow me to bend a mind unembarrassed by other cares, to those duties alone, I feel confident that few causes for complaint will exist hereafter. I ask a fair trial—I ask but one more—and reasonable support and encouragement while making it. Will a Universalist public refuse these to one who is proudly conscious of having neglected his own immediate interests, during the nine years that he has labored in their service, to advance the great cause of God and humanity? Subscribers to the Magazine and Advocate—to your deeds I look with hopeful solicitude, for an answer!

But there are probably some complaints made, in which there is, on my part, no cause given for censure. Notices have been sent that did not come till too late—or are crowded into the midst of a business letter, where they were unnoticed—or names of persons and places were written so illegibly, that we could not publish them—in all these and similar cases, let not complaint be laid at my door.

As to communications, I have inserted all that were prepared for the press, for which I had room, provided they were at all worthy of insertion. This point I can confidently affirm. I can also say, that I inserted many that I had to prepare for the press, with considerable trouble. Also, that in some cases I have even corrected the articles, and then, to render them fit to be read by the compositor, I have copied them off with my own hand! If I have neglected to insert some articles sent me, it is certain that my neglect has, in some cases, saved the credit of the paper, the patience of the reader, and the character of the correspondent as a literary man! But I presume the neglect complained of refers to local articles. Of these, some should be inserted—and when acquainted with circumstances sufficient to warrant me in doing so, I do insert them. But, where I conceive that not one in five hundred of our readers cares any thing about the subject, and where no special reasons are known to me, I generally pass by all local articles—such as, correspondence in relation to withdrawing from a church—letters to abusive clergymen of little character, or infamous character—reviews of prosy sermons, tracts, etc.—exposures of the vices of Partialist preachers and church members, (unless intended to warn the public against imposition)—all such articles, (and they are generally long articles,) I am apt to lay on the table—few readers care to see them, nearly all dislike them, and the paper that makes a business of publishing the last named, enjoys but a doubtful reputation. Yet when reasons of public utility exist, I am willing to publish any such article. I only ask that any one who is dissatisfied with my course, should first inform me of what I am guilty, and hear my defence. Don't condemn me without stating charges and giving me a hearing. And, above all, before I am censured for a neglect of duty, see clearly that it was my duty which I neglected, and that you have not neglected yours. A. B. G.

THE EXPOSITOR AND UNIVERSALIST REVIEW.

The number for November—the last number of the present volume—has just been received. I have not time to read it through before our paper goes to press, but notice it to call public attention to it—particularly the attention of such as should subscribe for the next volume, if not for the present.

There are but four articles in the present number, entitled, "Truth of the Mosaic history of the primitive world"—"Remarks on the article"—"Comparative view of the Law and the Gospel"—"The Old Testament doctrine of sacrifice"—and a review of "Austin's Voice to Youth," published by us in June last, and the edition of 1500 copies of which is, already, nearly all sold!

The second article is by Br. H. Ballou, of Boston, correcting several mistakes made by Br. I. D. Williamson, in his article comparing the Law and the Gospel.—It is mild, courteous, affectionate, yet plain in its correction of several great errors regarding the Law. The third article is a long one, prepared with much care and labor by Br. S. R. Smith, of Albany. It will be found one of the most thorough articles ever published in the Expositor, and on a highly important and interesting subject. The marks of the chisel can not be seen in the part I read, so carefully has the labor of months finished it. The last article is a judicious and well deserved commendation of Br. Austin's labors, and a warm recommendation of it to the general perusal of our denomination—especially of parents, and of the class addressed.

In two months the first number of the next volume of the Expositor may be expected from the press. The Editor has received the promise of additional correspondents, by whose aid an improvement will be made in the literary character of the work. One word to the Editor. He speaks of "thorough and finished Essays." I hope he does not, by this phrase, mean to exclude occasional articles of a highly popular character, such as was the Reply to Mr. Holt's weapons of Universalism reversed. He may rest assured that if he does, he will not only lessen the usefulness of the work, but will also decrease its life and animation—its interest, for many of its readers. I speak thus, because one of our most popular Editors rather apologized for the introduction of that very article, on the ground that it was rather foreign from the general character of the Expositor. But Br. H. B. 2d, may rest assured that such articles, given occasionally, will materially enhance the value of the Expositor in the estimation of at least four fifths of its readers.

N. B. Subscribers to the next volume, or discontinuers, (of the latter it is hoped there will be none,) must make known their wishes by December 7th, in order that the edition may be regulated to the number of subscribers. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. C. S. Brown, in Bainbridge.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. S. Brown, in the town of Barker, near Oliver Kenyon's—Br. Woolley, at Howlet Hill; sickness prevented his fulfilling his last appointment at that place—Br. M. B. Smith, in Salisbury.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in December, by Br. C. S. Brown, at Upper Lisle.

Br. C. S. Brown, will preach on Monday evening, November 19th, East Green—Saturday evening, 24th, near Esqr. Tafts—Monday evening, 26th, in Clark Settlement.

Br. Sias commenced preaching to the Society in Oswego on the first Sunday inst., and will preach there every two weeks, until further notice.

The second quarterly Conference of the Black River Association of Universalists will be holden at Denmark, on Wednesday and Thursday, 26th and 27th of December next. Ministering brethren are earnestly requested to attend.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper

Rev J A A, Leyden—P M, Pendleton—I B, Carlton's Store, for G C and S S—P M, Plainfield—Rev L L S, Perrysburgh, (O)—Rev G M, Springfield, (O) for self and P H—A B M, Stockbridge, for A W and C D P—P M Shelby, for M D—S H, Franklin Mills, (O)—B K, Tipton, (Mich) for self, J B T, R S and J C—Rev E B W, Farmington, (Mich)—P M, West Bloomfield, for self and M H—P M, Depauville, for S M—I B, Collinsville—P M, Allen Centre, for U C.

POETRY

For the Magazine and Advocate.

HYMN.

If the following production of a leisure moment, written for the "Budget" of our Berean Institute, gives the reader as much pleasure in perusing, as I felt peace and joy in penning it, it will not be deemed quite unworthy of the space it occupies. If an "air" is wanting by some one inclined to sing it, its measure will be found the same as, "I knew by the smoke that so gracefully curled."

Oh, why should the hearts of believers be sad,
Or religion be clothed in the vestments of gloom?
In heaven, above, there are none but the glad,
And we are their kindred, and heaven's our home.

Mourn we for the dead—for the dearly loved dead—
Who've left us, (how early!) to linger behind?
They live in our Saviour, our own living Head,
And in him, once more, we with them shall be joined.

Weep we for the living—the cruel, the vain,
The proud and self-righteous, who scoff at our faith?
All-powerful Love, even them will reclaim,
Unbelief will be lost in the life beyond death!

The ends of the earth—all the offspring of God—
Shall with us be saved, and Jehovah adore;—
All suff'ring shall cease, sin and death be destroyed—
Oh, what can the souls of believers ask more!

Then, rend from religion the drap'ry of gloom,
And banish forever all terror and care;
Let Faith, Hope and Love ev'ry moment illume,
And good will to man be the heart's constant pray'r.

By the light of the Gospel, earth's valley of tears
Is arched o'er with rainbows that smile as they weep;
And evil's dark clouds fade in skies that it clears,
Till death, even death's but a child's peaceful sleep.

Then, oh, let believers, o'er fast-flitting hours,
Spread the bliss that our faith and our duty adorns,
Till Time, growing hopeless of reaping life's flowers,
Shall rob us of only its sorrows and thorns! A. B. G.

ARABIA AND PALESTINE.

REMARKS OF PROF. ROBINSON.

Our readers are aware that Prof. Robinson, of the New-York Theological Seminary, is pursuing his researches in the East, preparatory to the publication of a geography of the Holy Land. High expectations are entertained of the value of these researches to the cause of Biblical science. The following interesting particulars are furnished by a letter from Dr. Robinson to the Rev. Dr. McAuley, dated Jerusalem, April 30, 1838.

"At length," says Dr. R. "my feet stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem. A gracious God has brought us as on eagles' wings through the great and terrible wilderness; and here, in this city, where of old Jehovah dwelt, and where our Redeemer taught and suffered, we are permitted to hold sweet converse with all our brethren of the Syrian mission, and to celebrate with them the Saviour's dying love in the place where he instituted the ordinance in commemoration of his death."

Passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea.—"The results of our journey thus far, have been much more important and satisfactory than I could have anticipated. At the Red Sea, both Mr. Smith and myself were able to satisfy ourselves that the passage of the Israelites must have taken place at or near Suez, it being, of course, impossible, after the lapse of so many ages, to point out the exact spot. We suppose it may have taken place a mile or two below Suez, where even now the shoals from the opposite side come near together, and where at low tides the Arabs can wade through though the water is up to their necks. On the east side of the Sea, we could trace the route of the Israelites through the desert of Shur to Elim and beyond, where they encamped 'by the Red Sea.' (Num. xxxiii: 11.) This we have no doubt was at the mouth of the Wady Taybe."

Site of Mount Sinai.—"To Sinai itself we came with some incredulity, wishing to investigate the point whether there was any probable ground, beyond monkish tradition, for fixing upon the present supposed site. We were both surprised and gratified to find here, in the inmost recesses of these dark and lofty granite mountains, a fine plain spread out before the foot of the so-called Horeb,—a plain capable of containing two or three millions of people; from the south end of which the mountain rises perpendicularly and overlooks the whole,—so that whatever passed upon its top would be visible to all. This part of the mountain is about 1200 feet above the plain;—the summit now called Sinai, is about two miles farther south, and is not visible from below. With that summit Moses probably had no concern. South West of this is Mount St. Catharine, 2700 feet above the plain, and nearly one thousand feet higher than Gebel Mousa, or Sinai. We made minute and particular inquiries of Arabs and others acquainted with the whole peninsula, and could not learn that there was so much room in any other spot among the mountains, certainly not in the vicinity of any of the loftier peaks."

Antiquities of Jerusalem.—"In Jerusalem we are surprised to find how much of antiquity remains, which no traveller has ever mentioned or apparently ever seen. The walls around the great arena of the mosque of Omar are without all question, those built by Herod around the area of his temple; the size, position and character of the stones, (one of them 30 1-2 feet long, and many over 20 feet,) show this of themselves; but it is farther demonstrated by the fact, that near the south west corner there still remains, in a part of the wall, the foot of an immense arch evidently belonging to the bridge which anciently led from the Temple to the Xystus on Mount Sion; (Josephus J. 6. 6. 2.) This no one appears ever to have seen. In the castle near the Yafxa gate is also an ancient tower of stones like those of the temple, corresponding precisely to Josephus's description of the tower Hippicus, B. J. 5. 4. 8.—which Titus left standing as a memento; the ancient part is over 40 feet high, and built solid without any room within. We have no doubt that it is Hippicus.

We have thus gained some important fixed points from which to start in applying the ancient descriptions of the city. We have been able also to trace to a considerable distance the ancient wall north west and north, of the present city. The pool of Siloam, at the mouth of the Tyropœum, (see Catherwood's plan,) is without doubt the Siloam of Josephus, and the wall of Nehemiah; farther down is the En Rogel of Scripture, where the border of Judah and Benjamin passed up the valley of Hinnon. We have found farther that there is a living fountain of water deep under the mosque of Omar, which is doubtless ancient; the water has just the taste of that of Siloam, and we conjecture a connexion between them. This point we have yet to examine. We have not completed the half of what we wish to investigate in this city, and could spend another month or two with profit in the like researches here."

Farther researches proposed.—"Our plan is to make excursions from this city to the neighboring sites of ancient places—to Jericho and the Jordan, and also a journey to Gaza, hence to Hebron, and to Arad, if not Mousa, so as to explore the north end of the Ghor, and the region of the Dead Sea. I hope to find some trace of Kadesh and other cities in that region. From all the information we can get, it would seem that in the rainy seasons, when water runs in the Ghor, it flows northward toward the Dead Sea, thus contradicting the hypothesis that the Jordan once flowed through it to the Elanitic Gulf. Afterward we hope to go north, examine the sources of the Jordan, and other points as far as Damascus, and then pass from Beirout to Smyrna. All this, if the Lord will, and as he will."—American Biblical Repository.

DOUBTING.

To doubt is to believe; for to doubt, is to think.—Does he who doubts believe that he doubts, or does he doubt whether he doubts or not? If he doubt whether he doubt or not, he destroys his own skepticism; and if he believes that he doubts, he destroys it again.—Cousin's Philosophy.

MARRIAGES.

In Medina, September 13th, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. Thompson B. Barney, of Lynden, to Miss Maria Finch, of Barre.

At the same time and place, by the same, Mr. James Kennebrook, of Lynden, to Miss Rachel Drum, of Hartland.

In Gaines, October 6th, by the same, Mr. Foster Kelly, to Miss Polly Blaine, all of Gaines.

In Ridgeway, October 17th, by the same, Mr. Daniel Hascal Shepard, of Barre, to Miss Sally Ann Thorp, of the former place. Prayer by Br. Andrews.

In Barre, October 18th, by Rev. William Andrews, Mr. Horace H. Smith, to Miss Caroline Shepard, all of Barre. Prayer by Br. T. D. Cook.

In Whitesborough, August 13th, by ——— Baylis, Esq., Mr. W. M. Mayhew, of Milwaukie, W. T., to Miss Phebe Cook, of the former place.

In East Bloomfield, on the 18th ult., by Rev. Wm. Queal, Mr. C. C. Beach, to Miss Mary McKay, both of East Bloomfield.

Also in same place, on the 24th ult., by the same, Mr. L. H. Robison of Pittes Flatts, to Miss Caroline Smith, of East Bloomfield.

In May last, in same place, by the same, Mr. Henry Vandusenbury, to Miss Almira Monroe.

In Rochester, October 4th, by Rev. T. P. Abell, Mr. C. B. Gifford, to Miss Hannah Flint.

DEATHS.

In Albion, Orleans county, September 21st, Mrs. Sarah E. Ladd, consort of Royal Ladd, aged 26 years.—She died as she had lived, rejoicing in the hope of the salvation of our God. The doctrine of the restitution exerted its genial influence upon her heart, as she was wasting away under a protracted illness. Her confidence in the impartial goodness of God was unshaken by the approach of death. A husband is left, by this stroke of Providence, to mourn the loss of an amiable companion, and two children that of a respected mother. The funeral was attended on the Sabbath following, in the Methodist chapel, in Albion, and a discourse delivered to a large congregation by the writer. May Heaven smile upon the afflicted, and reward the liberality of the Methodist brethren, who opened their convenient house for the occasion. T. D. Cook.

Vermont papers please copy.

In Clarendon, September 24th, Priscilla, youngest daughter of Simeon Gliddon, aged 2 years. May the mourners be comforted. Sermon by T. D. Cook.

In Carleton, October 2d, twin son of Br. John Murdock, in the 7th year of his age. Funeral on the 4th, and sermon by the writer. T. D. Cook.

In Centreville, October 19th, of consumption, Henry Joseph Green, aged 26 years, 7 months, and 19 days. Br. Green was a firm believer in the final restitution, and this belief made him "rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." He was respected and beloved by all who knew him. His Partialist brethren say they firmly believe his spirit has gone to a land of rest. He requested that some Universalist minister should preach his funeral discourse, from 1 Peter i: 3–5. His request was complied with on the following Sunday by the writer. I. B. Sharp.

In Centreville, November 27th, Mary M., daughter of Chauncy and Esther Barker, aged 2 years and 10 months. The funeral was attended on the 29th, and an address delivered by the writer from Mark x: 11.
I. B. Sharp.

In Newport, October 15th, of consumption, Albert Clark Watson, aged 22 years. His life was exemplary, and his character unblemished. His sickness was cheered by a firm belief in universal salvation, and his dying hour with the happy assurance of eternal rest.

In Deerfield, October 12th, of consumption, Mrs. Ruth, wife of Daniel Bowen, and eldest daughter of Samuel R. and Polly Watson, in the 23d year of her age. She was a worthy member of society, and has left a husband and two infant children to mourn their early loss. When told the fatality of her disease, she expressed a calm resignation, and spoke of her last moments with perfect composure. In the bright anticipation of a better world, and confiding in the unchanging love of her heavenly Father, she expired while breathing his name. H. T.

In Bristol, October 13th, John, child of Rev. Wm. Queal, aged one year and fifteen days. Funeral services by Br. Whitcomb.

This is the second child Br. and Sister Queal have been called to part with, and by this dispensation they are left childless. We rejoice to learn that they feel that their children have merely gone home to God; and that sooner or later they will again meet them in a region where parting is no more. A. B. G.

In Troy, October 1st, of consumption, Peter I. Barrenger, aged 38 years—late a resident of Syracuse.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

Terms.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1 50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. Grosh, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1838. NUMBER 47.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LET GOD BE TRUE.

BY REV. S. MILES.

That God is a God of truth, and can not lie, will be admitted by all who subscribe to the truth of divine revelation. Now, as all do and will admit, that God's word is as sure and infallible as his undying attributes, I would here inquire, is it not positively certain that God will do as he says he will? If so, then let us abide by this admission, this fact, and see what will become of the doctrine of endless torment.

God will positively, and certainly do as he says he will—and he has said that he "will render to every man according to his deeds." Rom. ii: 6. "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vii: 23.—"Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my word shall not pass away." Matt. xxiv: 35. "One jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." Matt. v: 18. "Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law." Rom. iii: 31.—"Let no man deceive you with vain words: for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience." Eph. v: 6. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap."—Gal. vi: 7. When God thought to punish the wicked, he "REPENTED NOT." Zech. viii: 14, 15. "Every transgression and disobedience RECEIVED a JUST recompense of reward." Heb. ii: 2, 3. "If they ESCAPED NOT who refused him that spake on earth, much more SHALL NOT we escape if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven." Heb. xii: 25. Now, as we do not make void the law through faith, is it not positively certain that every man shall reap the fruit of his labor! "Wo unto the wicked! it shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given him." Isa. iii: 11. Yes, sooner or later, God will do as he says he will, "he will render to every man according to his deeds." Faith does not, can not make void the threatenings; because faith subscribes to the truth of God's word.—"He that hath received his testimony, hath set to his seal that God is true." John iii: 33. "The wicked SHALL BE turned into hell and all the nations that forget God." Psalm ix: 17. Yes, "SHALL BE;" and all the doubts and fears, all the contradictions and blasphemies of those who are halting between two opinions, can not make the word of God of none effect. That doctrine which teaches the wicked that they may, or, may not, be turned into hell, is a delusion—is as false as the Koran. God says, "the wicked shall be turned into hell," and we believe it.

The ancient Fathers used the word methusael, which signifies, death in hell. (See Brown's Dictionary of the Bible.) "The wages of sin is death." One of the descendants of Cain was called Methusael. It would seem that his name was given, to denote the banishment and punishment of Cain, who, when he was denied the presence of the Lord, was constrained to say, "my punishment is greater than I can bear." Gen. iv: 13. "There is no fear in love; but perfect love, casteth out fear: because FEAR HATH TORMENT."—John iv: 18. This torment is the punishment of all who do not love God. Nothing short of love can save the soul from torment. David says, "I love the Lord, because he hath heard my voice and my supplications. The sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell gat hold upon me: I found trouble and sorrow. Then called I upon the name of the Lord; O Lord, I beseech thee, deliver my soul." Ps. cxvi: 1-4. When David had forgotten his God, he forgot to love; and then it was, that the sorrows of moral and temporal death came upon him like a flood, and overwhelmed his poor soul. He prayed, and was delivered from the pains of hell, from the torments of death, through that love that casteth out fear which hath torment. Now, if such is the effect, the final result of hell torments, then there is nothing strange in the prayer of the man after God's own heart, when he prayed, "O my God, make them like a wheel; as the stubble before the wind. As the fire burneth a wood, and as the flame setteth the mountains on fire; so persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with thy storm.—Fill their faces with shame; that they may seek thy name, O Lord." Ps. lxxxiii: 13-16. And, again, "Let death seize upon them, and let them quick into go down hell." Ps. lv: 15.

Here let the believers in endless wo, pause and reflect; let them put the question to themselves, and ask, is it as certain that the wicked will be consigned to never-ending wo, as it is, that "the wages of sin is death?" Are the torments of an endless hell as certain, as it is, that God has said, he "will render to every man according to his deeds?"

Is endless punishment as certain to the wicked, as it is, that God has said, that "the wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God?"

Let these questions be faithfully put, and answered in truth; then they can not fail to see, that they have put a lie into the mouth of the God of truth, if he does not do as they say he will.

If the inquirer should now turn and say, that Christ has suffered the penalty of the law in the sinner's room and stead, then I would ask again, can any being suffer endless wo, in a shorter time than endless duration? The answer must be, NO. Then it follows, that Christ has not suffered the penalty of endless punishment in the sinner's room and stead. Now, admitting that God has threatened the wicked with endless torments in a future world, can he exonerate both Christ and the sinner from the penalty of the law, which he said he would inflict, and yet do as he has said he will? Here again the answer must be, NO. Then is it not evident, fully evident, to a demonstration, that God has not said, that he will render to every man according to his deeds in never-ending wo? The doctrine of remediless wo in an endless hell, is false; because the God of truth will not, can not lie to save sinners from any punishment which they justly deserve. It is in vain to pray for salvation from the punishment of our sins. The Bible does not teach the forgiveness of punishment, but of sin. Those who pray that the punishment of sin may be forgiven—that the penalty of God's law may not be inflicted, are blind—they knew not that they are asking the God of truth to vary from his word, to lie for them, and thereby destroy the ground of our confidence in his word, which can not fail.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

INTEMPERANCE.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

That intemperance is an evil, and an alarming one, none can doubt. It has gone abroad in its withering might, desolating and destroying the fairest portions of society. Wherever it appears, there is misery. It blights and destroys every germ of peace, and poisons every stream of happiness. It visits the dwelling of the husbandman, and the once fruitful fields become barren. Herds no more graze on the hills, nor flocks feed in the valleys. And that home, once the habitation of peace, is filled with mourning, and has become the residence of vice and debauchery! It goes to the cottage where happiness and contentment reign, where dwells conjugal felicity and parental joy, and the scene is changed! The husband and father is degraded—the altar where spiritual communion was wont to be held with the great Creator, is broken down—the wife and mother, who looked forward to long days of happiness, has gone down to the tomb broken-hearted, and a lovely group of innocent children are compelled to beg from door to door, and subsist upon the cold charities of a too often unfeeling world! It visits the shop of the mechanic, whose industry and prudence are securing for him riches and independence, palzying his arm, and paralyzing his efforts. The implements of trade fall from his hands; disgrace and poverty stare him in the face, and religion, that angel of peace, is madly relinquished for the loathsome embraces of vice!

Oh! what ruin intemperance works in our world! How does it blacken every bright and sunny prospect, and desolate and destroy the fairest portions of society! How many bitter tears has it caused to be shed; and how many bosoms to heave with anguish! Like the lightning in its wrath, it has scathed and blighted within its reach, the fairest trees of promise! It rushes out into the world, "in form a fury, and in art a demon—its heart festering with the fires of hell—its hands clothed with the gore of earth—its path apparent by the print of blood—and its pause denoted by the expanse of desolation."

Harford, October, 1838.

JESUS, A DELIVERER.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"And so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, There shall come out of Zion, a Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." ROMANS xi: 26.

Almost every person knows the duty of a deliverer. It is one sent by a superior power, or one who voluntarily assumes the duties and responsibilities of the office. Sometimes objects are embraced of very wide extent, and of difficult accomplishment. In some instances, the object is merely to rescue an individual, either from some eminent peril or danger to which he is exposed, or from suffering which he is actually enduring.—Sometimes a hero starts on the great errand of freeing a whole nation from the yoke of religious tyranny or political bondage. Washington was the great deliverer of America from political evils. Howard was a deliverer from physical suffering and mental degradation. Luther, Calvin, and a host of others, have aimed to deliver men from superstition and religious oppression. But while the great and the good have striven for universal emancipation, their means have been limited; for although it may be painful to a benevolent mind to realize that the Creator has so constituted man that he can conceive of more than he can accomplish, yet it is a pure and blessed thought when considered in its proper connection.

But when we view Jesus, we are not pained with the thought that he can conceive more than can be accomplished. His benevolent soul contemplated the happiness of a world, and he will carry such an object into effect. To contemplate him in any other light, is derogatory to his character. Human deliverers may effect a temporary relief, but Jesus came to bring a permanent salvation.—God looks upon a limited restoration of our race as too small for him to attempt. Hear his declaration to his Son through the prophet: "It is a light thing that thou should raise up the tribes of Israel, and restore the preserved of Jacob. I will give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayst be my salvation to the ends of the earth." To this end, Jehovah has given his Son sufficient wisdoin and power.

In the passage which is guiding us in our remarks, the deliverance of Israel only is contemplated; but the connection contemplates also "the fulness of the Gentiles." A certain order is pursued in the scheme of a world's redemption; for God has assigned laws to the moral as well as to the physical world. That order is well expressed in a phrase employed by the Saviour—"the first shall be last, and the last shall be first." The Jews were the first to hear the Gospel, but will be the last to receive it. The Gentiles were the last to hear it, hut were the first to receive it. The whole subject is finely illustrated by the parable of the laborer in the vineyard.

The greatest good that can be conferred on man, is to "turn him away from his iniquity." The bestowment of wealth, is supposed by many to be the greatest blessing; but he who turns another from the practice of a single vice, confers a greater good than the riches of a world could purchase. This great moral truth is recognised by an apostle: "Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him, let him know that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins."—James v: 19, 20.

Here is a great work in which all may engage. In the moral world, we need not seasons as in the natural world, but may labor at all seasons. We need not say "four months, and then cometh the harvest." We may thrust in our sickle, and work at all times. Let us then be faithful laborers in the vineyard of our Lord and Master, and we shall hear his voice cheering us onward—"Well done, good and profitable servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1838.

JAMES II: 1-13.

"Mammon wins his way where seraphs might despair," is a poetical saying no less true as a statement of fact, than severe as a satire.

It will be readily perceived from the tenor of the paragraph now under consideration, that the corrupting influence of gold had found its way into the sanctuaries of religion or of justice, from which, if from any where, its baneful operation should be excluded.

Most of the readers of this paragraph would suppose that the writer is rebuking partiality of behaviour towards the rich and gaudy, in the hours of sacred worship—that he has reference to a practice which may yet be witnessed in our places of public worship—the ready opening of pews for the rich, and their slow movement on their hinges when a poor man is to be accommodated. But it has been surmised by some of our best commentators, that the reference is to the proceedings of a court of justice. It is well known that the laws, manners, and customs of the Jews, were different from those of the surrounding nations. On this account the Romans (at this time masters not only of Judea, but of almost all countries where any Jews had been "scattered abroad,") allowed this peculiar people the privilege of settling their own controversies according to their own laws and customs. Their synagogues were the places where they met to administer justice according to their own laws, and hence the reference in the second verse.

The first verse should be read interrogatively, instead of preceptively, as in our Common Version, because in this way it is more consonant to the queries in the three verses immediately subsequent. The sense may then be expressed as follows:—My brethren, are ye not guilty of gross inconsistency in professing to hold the glorious faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, while, at the same time, ye manifest even in your courts of justice, partiality and respect of persons? The apostle makes good this charge of inconsistency, by alleging, in the form of a question, what he knew few, if any, of them could deny, that they showed their partiality towards the rich litigants, by allotting to them a better seat than that which they gave to the poor. From this specimen of their disposition as judges, the poor man must at once despair of even-handed justice; and from this exhibition alone, their gross inconsistency as professing Christians, was evident. Hence the apostle's question in verse 4—"Verily, do ye not, by such behaviour, make a difference—that is, show a prepossession in your minds, and are thus evidently become judges, who will judge unfairly?"

To convince the Hebrew Christians of the evil and inconsistency of their behaviour as disciples of Jesus, the apostle, in a very earnest manner, recalls to their recollection the fact, that "in all the countries the poor had shewed a greater disposition to receive the Gospel than the rich, (verse 5,) and that the rich unbelieving Jews were great persecutors of the Christians, and dragged them to the heathen tribunals to get them punished.—Verse 6. But, above all, he recommends, as a remedy for this deplorable injustice, a fulfilment of that most excellent law of their Master, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Furthermore, he teaches them that as long as they show partiality in conduct or in judgment, this law would convict them as transgressors, and the most strict observance of other precepts, would not excuse failure in this respect.

Brethren, are we guiltless? Does our conduct correspond with our glorious faith? Are we imitators of our Father, and our elder Brother, in their impartial, universal benevolence? Strong in the faith of our common sonship, and our common brotherhood, are we impregnable against the justice-perverting influence of gold? In an age in which Mammon has his countless votaries, are there among us thousands who have not bowed the knee to Baal, servants of a better Master! Brethren, it is well if we are overcoming; few have entirely overcome the world. It is a hard task; but there is in our faith, well meditated and applied, ample means of making us conquerors, and more than conquerors. By such fruits let us, then, adorn our faith and our profession. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A GOOD REPLY.

A few years since, an aged and venerable member of one of the Partialist churches in this vicinity, became convinced of the truth of the great and glorious sentiment of the final restitution of all things—became convinced that that was the doctrine which God had spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. And, like Simeon in olden times, his heart was filled with joy, and out of the abundance of his heart his mouth spake; he was not ashamed nor afraid to declare to the world what he believed to be the whole counsel of God.

The church to which he belonged, being possessed of narrow and contracted views, proceeded, as a matter of course, to labor and expostulate with him concerning the enlargement of his faith. In their letter of expostulation, they asked him the following taunting and insulting question:—"Is it because your intellectual faculties, in the decrepitude of age, are more acute to discern truth, or that some new flood of light has broken in upon your soul, from some heavenly fountain! Are these the reasons that you now hold that to be truth, which for some thirty years, through the meridian of life, in the vigor of intellectual strength, with the plain word of God before your view, you firmly believed to be a most dangerous heresy?" To which the aged Simeon, in his answer to the church, thus nobly replied—"You are not content," replied he, "with using solemn and admonitory language, but tauntingly inquire, 'Is it because my intellectual faculties, in the decrepitude of age, are more acute to discern truth, or that some new flood of light has broken in upon my soul, from some heavenly fountain?' As I have ever made it my rule to turn every thing to some good account, if in my power to do so, I shall apply this rule to your unchristian taunt and inquiry. I have lived to a pretty good old age, to be sure, but not yet to the age of decrepitude; and through Divine favor, my faculties of body and mind are yet continued to me in a very good degree. But I have lived long enough to witness the errors and follies of many around me, from whom better things might be expected. And I have lived to witness a spirit of virulence and persecution, among many of my acquaintance, entirely inconsistent with the spirit of the Gospel, and at war with the peace and happiness of society. But since you seem to be solicitous to know something of this matter, you will permit me to say, that I was, not long since, in a situation not altogether unlike that of Simeon of old, who, when the 'flood of light' from heaven broke in upon his soul, exclaimed, 'Lord, now let thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.' It is true, I have lived a long time ignorant of this salvation, and believed as the priests told, that a very great portion of the race of man were permitted to be born and exist for no other purpose but to suffer endless damnation, for the glory of God, and the endless joy and gratification of the elect—and I was taught to believe that God had decreed that it should be so. In this state of belief all was uncertain, gloomy, and dark. But when the 'flood of light,' of which you speak, 'broke in upon my soul,' the dark, appalling clouds which a false and early religious education had cast around my mental vision, fled like the thin vapors of morning before the bright beams of a Summer sun, and left me, as it were, on the top of the spiritual Mount Pisgah, with the heavenly Canaan full in view. I have in vain to regret that for so long a period of my life, I have been groping my way among the thick fogs of the doctrines of men, believing them to be the doctrines of the Gospel; while hardly a ray of the Sun of Righteousness ever penetrated the gloom to illume my path."

Immediately upon the reception of the venerable father's reply, the church, governed more by bigotry and superstition than by the spirit of the Gospel, proceeded to excommunicate him from their fellowship and communion, with the intimation that there was fearful reason to apprehend, that what was by them done in that act, would be ratified in heaven, and he, in consequence, be finally excluded from the "church triumphant"!

W. R.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ANGELS.

The caption I have placed at the head of the article which follows, may cause surprise in some; but I entreat that such may not be too hasty in forming conclusions, either of astonishment or interest, before they have well considered the subject the writer is about to lay before them. The word we have chosen for a motto, is often mentioned in the Scriptures; but the whole meaning, or adaptation of the word, has not, to my knowledge, been inquired into, nor properly understood. That angels, ministers, and messengers are, in some places in the Bible, synonymous terms, will not be disputed; but the questions for our present inquiry, are, First: Have we any evidence in the Scriptures, of spiritual beings, properly denominated angels? Second: If so, have we any account of their origin or creation, and the purposes for which they were made?

These are questions of greater importance than will appear at first view. And if I am not greatly mistaken, their proper elucidation, and natural result, will add much to the happiness of mankind in their present state—at least to those who believe in the holiness and happiness of all mankind, in a future state of existence—because if I can sustain the positions I shall take, they will put at rest, forever, the "sleepy system" of Br. Balfour.

In the account which Moses gives of the creation of the world, he places the epoch of its existence 4004 years before Christ clothed himself in humanity; and in following up this history of Moses, we find there is not a word said about an angel or angels, till the world had been in existence 2091 years; and the first account we have of such a being, is the one introduced to Hagar, "in the wilderness, by the fountain in the way to Shur." Before this time, in all the communications made from heaven to man, they are all said to be made by the Lord. In the communications to Adam and Eve, in the garden, "the voice of the Lord was heard"—"the Lord said unto the woman"—"the Lord said unto the serpent"—and "the Lord said unto Cain," etc., etc.—and so it reads all the way up to 1913 years before Christ appeared upon earth in his human character. After this, angels are often introduced, to the end of Revelation. The "Lord" so often introduced in the Bible, as communing with man, I consider to be the Christ—the first created spirit that had any communication with this world. Jesus saith, "Before Abraham was, I am." And St. Paul says, (speaking of Jesus, Col. i: 15, 16, 17,) "Who is the image of the living God, the first-born [or created] of every creature: for by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in the earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: and he is before all things, and by him all things consist"—that is, all things are to continue fixed, as well as to have existed through him. Now, if Christ was before all things relating to this earth, (for so I understand it,) and if all things were created by him, and for him, he was undoubtedly the "Lord" so often spoken of as conversing with, and instructing the ancient fathers. He was the great Manager, and for a long while, solely so, of his own concerns. The first account of any assistant or agent employed by him, is in the case of Hagar, before mentioned. In this case, "the angel of the Lord found her."

The question now is, was this angel of the Lord a spiritual being, or is the whole a dream or chimera? It would seem not to be a farce—for it was, and is being most literally fulfilled. Hagar, as she was told by the angel, bore a son, and named him Ishmael, as directed, from whom sprang a nation, which is in existence to this day—"whose hand is against every man, and every man's hand against him." Had Hagar derived this information in a vision, or had it been communicated to her as a prophecy from some inspired mortal, it would undoubtedly have been so stated; but deriving this information in the manner stated, it necessarily follows, that it was communicated to her by a spiritual being other than the "Lord," and who was deputed by him to instruct Hagar to go back to her mistress. It will hardly be necessary to multiply evidence on this branch of the subject, and I will only introduce one other testimony to the point. After the devil, or the influence of the earthly character which Jesus had taken upon him, had done tempting him, having been completely subdued by our Lord, "behold, angels came and ministered unto him." It is evident that these angels were not his earthly ministers, or disciples, for Jesus was alone when tempted, on "an exceeding high mountain."—Therefore, these ministers must have been spiritual beings, or the whole account is a farce.

But, second: Have we any account in the Bible of the origin and purposes for which these spiritual beings were called into existence? Not any, I am bold to say, separate and distinct from man; nor are they mentioned in the Bible until some 2000 years after the creation of man. Their use, however, is made very evident. They were ministers, or agents, to assist the Lord, the Christ, who was the owner and sole proprietor of this world, and all it contains, in carrying on his works, and keeping it in order. But who and what are they? This I consider to be the most important question that could at this time be propounded to man; because, as I have before said, if I can sustain the position I am about to take, it will destroy the chilling system advocated by Br. Balfour—a system, in my humble opinion, which is tantamount to annihilation! Besides, it will dispel other clouds of darkness and doubt, which are hanging in the horizon of theology.

My position, then, is this: All the angels spoken of in Scripture, that can properly be considered spiritual beings, are the spirits of the human family, whose bodies are literally dead. And my opinion is, that there are no other angels of a spiritual nature, in heaven or in earth, who have any agency or superintendance in the affairs of this world, except such as I have last mentioned. The first angel was the spirit of Abel; and as men died, angels increased. All things in existence have had a beginning, except the Great Jehovah. All things were created but Him; but as we have no separate and distinct account of the creation of these spiritual angels, except in a collateral point of view, after the formation of man—viz., when God "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul"—I therefore conclude, and I think with great reason, that in man lies the foundation of all the spiritual angels who ever have, or ever will have any connection or ministration with this world. But "to the law and the testimony," for the proof the position. In this there is much that has a bearing to the point.—But not to offend our publishers with too long an article, I will select but two passages.

First. "And behold there appeared unto them Moses and Elias, talking with him."—Matt. xvii: 3. Should it be said (as I know it has been) that the scene in the Mount, where Peter, James, and John were in company with Jesus, was a mere vision, I would like to be informed where, in the statement, any evidence of such a notion is to be found. True, Jesus says to his disciples, when coming down from the Mount, "tell the vision to no man," because a circumstance so marvellous might figuratively be called a vision. But it should be remembered, that Peter, James, and John did not even fall upon their faces, till they heard "a voice out of the cloud"; therefore, if asleep, they must have been so, standing. But Peter, at least, did not consider himself asleep when the transaction took place, for he says, (alluding to the circumstance, 2 Pet. i: 18,) "And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount."

Second. As I began with the alpha of this subject, when the germ of these angels was planted in man, after his formation, I will now introduce the omega of the whole matter, by quoting from the last chapter of Revelations. In this book, it appears that the revelator had seen and been told so many wonderful things, that in the wonder and joy of his heart, he "fell down to worship before the feet of the angel." But the angel said to him, "See thou do it not: for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets." It appears to me that comment here is unnecessary; for it seems that in the very last article of knowledge communicated from heaven to man, as though there might otherwise be some misapprehension as to who and what these angels were, the subject is plainly developed, so as to do away with all reasonable cavil on the subject. Admitting that the communications to the revelator were through a vision, still the whole detail was managed by these ministering angels. Of this there can be no doubt. I consider the Book of Revelations to be a recapitulation, in highly figurative language, of all the prophecies and denunciations consequent upon the second coming of Christ, when the temple was to be destroyed, and the Jewish polity closed forever; with reference also to the bringing in of the Gentiles, the final establishment of the Gospel, and the universal salvation of all intelligent beings.

The inference that may be drawn from the above statements—or I should rather say, the facts and evidence produced, are of such a nature, as not to be reasonably controverted. If the spirit, or immortal part of even one of the human family, is an angel in heaven, why not the spirits of all whose bodies have returned to mother earth? If not so, there would be evidence of partiality in the Father and owner of this world. If it should be said that the spirits of the wicked could not become angels in another state of existence, but must sleep to some future great resurrection day, it might answer for some; but it would not satisfy me; because I know of none who are not wicked.

What is wickedness? where is it located? and to what does it belong? It is an evil that wholly belongs to this world, and is attached solely to our earthly character. The spirit, or the germ of an angel, in every one of the human family, is always in opposition to evil; but being enveloped and interwoven with the earthly character, it can not always judge of the effect from the cause, and suffers the consequence with the body. The state of man in this world, may be compared to a partnership between individuals. The spirit, or immortal part, is at the head of the firm, and, if I may so express myself, the book-keeper and accountant of the whole concern. And although it can not always control the wild speculations of its vicious partner, and does, and must suffer while in the connection—a connection it was compelled to enter into, "not willingly," but encouraged by a "hope" that it should be released in due time—it has the assurance that the debts of the firm will finally all be paid off, and the good partner left with the same amount of capital it had when it entered into the connection. Now, then, must this immortal part, when released from its vicious and drowsy partner, be put to sleep, God knows where, and for how long a time? Nay, God forbid! It then becomes an Angel of Light. So believes

J. KINGSBURY.

Sheshequin, November, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

REPLY TO MISS L. M. BARKER.

The exception you took to the question contained in the article to which you replied, relating to the moral tendency of two pieces spoken by scholars under your charge, at the late exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute, discovers to me your high sense of virtue and morality, and the regard you have for the station you fill. For this, an enlightened and virtuous community will esteem you.

But I have yet to learn that an attempt to break up a marriage contract, which by the parties was voluntarily entered into, is commendable in any case. No trifling circumstance should be allowed to induce a violation of that sacred vow which virtually blends the interests of two kindred souls in an inseparable union, and renders them identical. It was under this impression, that I objected to the spirit of the piece entitled, The Bride. I did not object to its literary merits. Nor did I suppose that it was necessary for her whose business it was "to select and assign the pieces to the several speakers," to endorse fully the sentiments which they contained. If I understand the object of this kind of declamation, it is not to inculcate morals or religion, but to improve in speaking—to express in the most impressive manner, the ideas of the author whose productions are used on the stage. Hence, in saying that "I was not pleased," etc., I did not suppose that I was censuring you for the selection of pieces you had made for the occasion. Nor do I think so now.

I was not the first to object to the piece entitled, "The Soul in Purgatory," as a reference to my article will, by intimation, show. And as I only expressed the opinion of others in relation to it, I will call them to account when it is deemed necessary, and thus exonerate myself from all reproach for all that was said on that.

If I have excited any suspicions unfavorable to your character—if I have given one soul to believe you were capable of inculcating, "either designedly or ignorantly," vice or immorality, or of being "a traitress to the institution" over which you preside, I sincerely regret it, and can assure you that it was unintentional on my part, and shall therefore claim your pardon.

Yours, respectfully, T. D. COOK.

U. S. GENERAL CONVENTION OF UNIVERSALISTS.

STATISTICAL REPORTS.

RHODE ISLAND.—To the General Convention of Universalists in the United States.—BRETHREN—Since the last session of this Convention, the brethren in R. I. have organized a State Convention which is represented at this meeting. The territory of this Convention is small, and the extent of our common faith still less. Until the present year only two active societies have existed within this State, and only one preacher labored with them. Since the formation of our Convention, one new society has been organized, and two brethren commenced preaching in the State.—There are also several other places where our doctrine is occasionally preached, and considerable attention given to the great subject of the world's salvation.

The society in Providence may be reckoned the first and foremost in support of Universalism, in this State. This society was organized about the year 1822, and soon after a very good house of worship was erected in a central part of the city. Two years after, the house was destroyed by fire, but another and still better one was erected on the same spot a few months afterwards. This society is now in a very prosperous condition, and may be reckoned among the best in our denomination.

There is a society in the village of Woonsocket, which employs occasional preaching, and talk much about erecting a house of worship. Although not very active, it may be considered in a sound and healthy condition.

A new society has been organized in Smithfield, which, though young, has fair prospect of future usefulness and success. A society once existed in Pawtucket, which for some years has been extinct or nearly so.

There are several other towns and villages where regular or occasional preaching is had, in some of which, societies will doubtless be formed during the present year.

There are now three preachers in the State, all residing in Providence. Br. W. S. Balch, the settled pastor of the Providence society, and Brs. H. B. Davis, and J. Richards, who have been pursuing their studies, and now frequently preach in various parts of the State.

On the whole, our brethren may rejoice with us on a view of the brightening prospect of our good cause in R. I., which, with the blessing of God, promises soon to exert an extensive influence among our brethren in this State.

WM. S. BALCH.

NEW-HAMPSHIRE.—The committee of the N. H. delegation beg leave respectfully to report to the General Convention of Universalists.

The present number of clergymen residing in N. H. is 24—many of whom preach to two, three, and four societies.

There has been an accession to our number, of four, during the past year, by fellowship. Four meeting-houses have been built and dedicated, during the same time; four more are now nearly completed.

We have a Convention which meets annually—six Associations, and several Conferences, which meet quarterly.*

Our common cause through the whole State is prosperous;—there is a general desire by most societies, to have a greater proportion of preaching; but the committee is sorry to say, that owing to the general small compensation allowed for the support of clergymen in our State, many are induced to leave for other sections, which necessarily leaves many societies destitute. All of which is respectfully submitted. A. L. BALCH.

PENNSYLVANIA.—To the General Convention of Universalists, session of 1838.—BRETHREN—There has been so little change in the condition and prospects of our denomination in this State, during the past year, as to require nothing further at present than a reference to the luminous report of Br. S. W. Fuller, presented at the last session, and published with the minutes. It it proper, however, to mention, that Br. James Gallagher, of Philadelphia, a young brother of excellent promise, has recently commenced the ministry of reconciliation, intending to devote his life to the proclamation of the good word. A. C. THOMAS.

* Greater attention has been paid to the subject of churches, Sabbath schools and Bible classes, for the last year, than at any former time, which labor has been richly blessed.

UNIVERSALIST HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

PROCEEDINGS OF SESSION OF 1838.

According to its adjournment, the Universalist Historical society met in the city of Boston, on the 19th and 20th of September, 1838. The President took the chair, and the session was opened by uniting in prayer with Rev. Mr. Forbes of Me.

On motion, the Secretary read the record of the proceedings of the former session.

Voted, To proceed, according to custom, to the election of officers for the ensuing year. Whereupon, the following individuals were duly elected.

Thomas Whittemore, President.
Stephen R. Smith, Vice President.
Thomas J. Sawyer, Secretary.
Lewis Seymour, Esq., Treasurer.

Corresponding Secretaries.—William A. Drew, Me.; Lucius R. Paige, Mass.; William S. Balch, Rhode Island; Asher Moore, Connecticut; A. L. Balch, New-Hampshire; Kittredge Haven, Vermont; Geo. W. Montgomery, Isaac D. Williamson, New-York; John H. Gihon, New-Jersey; Savilion W. Fuller, Samuel A. Davis, Pennsylvania; Sebastian F. Streeter, Maryland; John M. Whitmore, Virginia; G. C. Marchant, North Carolina; Allen Fuller, South Carolina; Allen Green, Georgia; Willis Atkins, Alabama; Wm. E. Camp, Louisiana; John E. Holmes, Illinois; Jonathan Kidwell, Indiana; John A. Gurley, Ohio; Nathaniel Stacy, Michigan; Solomon Bingham, Lower Canada; Oliver Smith, New-Brunswick; Amos Seamons, Nova Scotia; David Thom, John R. Beard, England; William Scott, Scotland.

The Secretary then read the following

ANNUAL REPORT.

Four years have now elapsed, since the organization of this society. During this period something has been done towards the attainment of the objects contemplated in its formation; but as the number of its members actively engaged in promoting its interests is comparatively small, it has thus far accomplished less than some of its friends might have anticipated. Still, when we consider the circumstances under which it began its operations, and has hitherto labored, we shall perhaps find reasons for congratulation rather than murmurs, and for encouragement rather than despondency. We have begun, and it is believed, well begun. The field of our labors is open before us, and we need nothing but increased and persevering zeal to ensure the most gratifying success.

Considerable progress has already been made in the collection of books, pamphlets, etc., in accordance with one of the Society's objects. Much more, however, still remains to be done in this very important department of our labors. Our publishers have not so readily and generally responded to the call of the Society for donations, as could be wished; although there is no reason to believe that they feel the slightest degree of unfriendliness toward the institution, but on the contrary, we are well assured that any apparent neglect on their part, is to be accounted for from the fact that no individual appeal has been made to them in the Society's behalf. Some indeed have not only very generously contributed to our Library from their own publications, but have also kindly lent their aid in obtaining donations from other sources. To Rev. T. Whittemore, our President, and P. Price, Esq., the Society acknowledges itself under particular obligations, as well for handsome donations to our Library, as for a praiseworthy interest in its prosperity.—To Rev. W. Ballou it is also indebted for copies of most of his published works, and to Rev. David Thom, our valued Corresponding Secretary, in Liverpool, England, for a complete set of the various productions of his pen.

It is thought to be highly desirable to collect as far as possible a copy of every work of ancient or modern times, which relates to the history of Universalism.—This would of course embrace every thing that has appeared on the subject, whether in favor of our common faith or against it. So far as the publications of our own country are concerned, it is hoped that, with few exceptions, they may be obtained through the generosity of our friends; but there are many foreign works of somewhat rare occurrence here, which we can not expect to secure to our Library on so favorable terms. At the second session of the society therefore, a committee was appointed for the purpose of devising some practicable means of supplying the Treasury with such funds as might be necessary for gradually enriching our Library with those rare and valuable books. At the last session, this committee was appointed to report, and, at its own request, was permitted to stand another year. Undoubtedly it has now matured, and will propose some plan for attaining so desirable an object.

It is much to be regretted that the Corresponding Secretaries of the Society have been so remiss in making communications relative to the rise, progress, and present condition of the cause of Universalism within their respective limits. It is on their interest in the great objects of the Society, their assiduity in collecting, and their promptness in communicating such information as they may possess, or from time to time obtain, that we must at present chiefly rely for the furtherance of our plans and the attainment of our wishes. May we not, then, indulge the hope, that in this respect another year will show a decided improvement, and that year after year we may be making more and more rapid progress, toward the attainment of the Society's objects?

In our last report we took occasion to mention the efforts that some of our religious opposers were then making to shield the character of Prof. Tholuck of Germany from the imputation of being a believer in the doctrine of Paul, that "God is the Saviour of all men." The solicitude which they have shown on this subject is to be accounted for by the fact, that Prof. Tholuck has generally been regarded as the head of the evangelical party, so called, in opposing Neologism in Germany, and in sustaining and defending evangelical doctrines. Hence his name has become familiar even to the ears of the unlearned Christian on this side of the Atlantic. His works, or opinions, have been more frequently quoted, and more authority has been attached to them here, than perhaps to those of any other theologian of Germany.—The announcement that with all his acknowledged learning, and zeal, and piety, he was still a Universalist, filled our religious opposers with amazement and alarm. At first it was stoutly denied by the orthodox press of the country. But it subsequently appeared that the denial was made in an almost total ignorance of the facts, or else with but a very indifferent regard to the interests of truth. The testimony of those who have enjoyed every requisite opportunity to know, and whose veracity scarcely admits of doubt, as well as the evidences which his own writings furnish, place it beyond debate that Prof. Tholuck, whatever may be his present opinions, has been, and at the time the controversy on the subject commenced in this country, actually was, a Universalist, i. e. a believer in the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. It is probable, however, that while, like many in almost every age, he believed in the truth of the doctrine, he entertained doubts of its moral influence, if generally promulgated. It did not corrupt himself, but he dared not trust it with his unlearned and vicious neighbor. There are multitudes in the same or a similar condition in our own country. So imperfect is their spiritual vision, and so warped by prejudice are their judgments, indeed, so much more confidence do they repose in their own timid policy, than in the dictates of infinite wisdom, that they fear the preaching of God's truth will overrun the world with immoralities!

Be this as it may, the efforts to which we have alluded have been so far successful, as to extort from Prof. Tholuck a half way and an apparently very reluctant confession that his faith on the subject of man's final destiny, corresponds in a tolerable degree to popular dogmas. True, it is not very clear what he does believe; but the acknowledgment that he is not a Universalist, has diffused a heartfelt pleasure through all the ranks of American orthodoxy. It should be remembered, however, that this poor concession has been gained from the Professor, by a gross misrepresentation of facts, and by a powerful appeal to his pride and love of popularity. Universalists are not so much grieved merely to erase his name from the list of those who have labored and suffered reproach because they trusted in the living God, as they are to behold the humiliating spectacle of one standing on so proud an eminence as that to which Prof. Tholuck has raised himself, and who, beyond all controversy, has hitherto believed that Jesus Christ is the Saviour of the world, now timidly shrinking from a frank and honest avowal of his opinions, and weakly yielding to the unworthy fear of forfeiting his public reputation.

At the last session, the Society, at the instance of the Secretary, appointed Richard Roe, Esq., of Dublin, its Corresponding Secretary for Ireland. It was not expected that he would regard this act as conferring honor upon him, but as a token of the Society's respect and confidence; and it was anticipated that he would willingly accept the appointment and render us such aid as might be in his power. In this last respect we are not disappointed, but owing to peculiar circumstances and relations, he respectfully declines the appointment of Corresponding Secretary. The reason he assigns for so doing is the unity and fellowship with Unitarians, which such an act would imply. Perhaps Mr. Roe's acquaintance with Unitarianism as it appears in the sect called Unitarians in great Britain, may have prejudiced him against our opinions; which, although we reject the popular doctrine of the supreme divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, are, we believe, by no means identical in many important respects, even in reference to the person and atonement of the Saviour, with those of the sect just now mentioned.

During the past year our foreign correspondence has been kept up, and somewhat extended, and although the results thus far have not been very important, it is confidently expected that farther and still more definite information with respect to Universalism in Germany, will ere long be received.

The condition of our common cause in this country was never more prosperous. The messengers of truth are running to and fro in the earth and knowledge is increased. It becomes the duty of our Society, while it is engaged in gathering up the scattered records of the past, to trace with care the features of the present, to watch the changes of our sky, and to engrave upon enduring tablets the records of phenomena which are now presenting themselves to the eye of the beholder, and which will soon be reckoned among the memorials of by-gone times. All which is respectfully submitted.

On motion of Rev. Mr. Balch of Rhode Island. Voted, That the report be published in our religious journals.

The Committee appointed in 1836 to devise some practicable means of raising funds for the purchase of rare foreign works, treating on the subject of Universalism, for the Society's Library, reported, that they had given the subject such consideration as their time and circumstances would permit; and as the result of their reflection, recommended to the society as the most practicable means for attaining the contemplated object, that a collection be taken up at some convenient time during the annual session of this body; and that a committee be appointed to expend the same for the purpose of enriching the Library. The report was accepted. Whereupon it was

Resolved, That a collection be taken up in the School-street church immediately after the public services on Thursday morning.*

Resolved, That the Secretary be requested to be present and state to the congregation the character of this Society, and the purposes to which the collection is to be applied.

Resolved, That a Committee of three be appointed to purchase at its discretion, such books as are contemplated in the preceding report.

On motion, L. R. Paige, A. C. Thomas, and T. J. Sawyer, were appointed said committee.

On motion of A. C. Thomas, Resolved, That the Secretary be requested to deliver an essay at the next session, embracing such general statistics of our denomination, and the history and prospects of our distinguishing sentiment, as he may believe interesting and profitable.

Communications having been received, one from Rev. Russel Tomlinson, Corresponding Secretary of western New-York, containing a brief memoir of the late Rev. Wm. I. Reese, and another from Rev. W. S. Balch, Corresponding Secretary of Rhode Island, relating to the early history of Universalism in the United States—it was, on motion,

Resolved, That they be submitted to the care of the Secretary, and employed as he may deem proper.

On motion, the Society adjourned to meet in the city of Portland, Me., on the 3d Wednesday and following Thursday, of September, 1839.

THOMAS WHITTEMORE, President.
T. J. SAWYER, Secretary.

*The collection taken on the occasion amounted to a fraction over fifty-two dollars.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DILIGENCE IN BUSINESS.

"Sees' thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings." PROV. xxii: 29

How impressively beautiful is this passage of Scripture. "He who is diligent in his business, shall stand before kings." The proverb implies the extent of the power of man. He need but to act, and he is crowned with success. The God of nature has given to the intelligent beings of this terrestiral sphere, a power that but few of them fathom. We know not ourselves; and our energies slumber within us. It is but our own inactivity that binds us down, and compels us to grovel in the dust. Man was formed in the image of his Maker—framed for "high and noble enterprise." The Eternal commanded our great progenitor to "multiply and replenish the earth, and subdue it," to "have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." He commanded, and he knew that the beings he had created were "sufficient for these things." A few, whom we term master spirits, have existed, who have made the earth, and the sea, and the air, and "all that in them is," yield to their will.—Napoleon stood upon the burning sands, and then upon the "iced mountain top," and kings, and princes, and nations, bowed to do him homage.—And yet, he was once but a charity boy—once a corporal of Corsica.

But though the few have used the powers which their God has given them, and have left a cloud of glory to mantle their memories; yet the great mass of our race seem to live along, with souls that are nerveless and powerless. "These things ought not so to be." Men should shake off this lethargy, and show themselves to be what they are. They have every incentive to action; they are assured that they shall not spend their energies for nought. The poorest beggar that walks our streets, was formed in the image of his Maker; and though he may now be a degraded object of weakness, yet he was once possessed of God-like faculties; and it is by his own abuse that he has lost them. Perhaps the little disappointments of early days, chilled the ardor of his youthful hopes, and he became inactive; soon penury and want gathered around him, and he felt himself degraded. He has lost

> "That noble confidence
> Which bids man look his fellow man
> In the face, and be the thing,
> Fearless and upward eyed,
> Which God has made him,"

And thus became what we now find him. Dear readers, let not the noble powers within you degenerate for want of use. Be active—be diligent in business, and ye shall stand before kings.

Oswego, N. Y. R.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1838.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS—NO. XV.

And behold, a certain lawyer stood up, and tempted him, saying, Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? He said unto him, what is written in the law? how readest thou? And he answering said, thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself. And he said unto him, thou hast answered right: this do, and thou shalt live. But he, willing to justify himself, said unto Jesus, and who is my neighbor? And Jesus answering, said, a certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead.—And by chance there came down a certain priest that way; and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side. And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side. But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he saw him, he had compassion on him. And went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. And on the morrow when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, take care of him: and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee. Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbor unto him that fell among the thieves? And he said, he that shewed mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, go, and do thou likewise.—LUKE X: 25–37.

It is lamentable, but it is true, that even the Christian world has been troubled with the questions, who are my neighbors? and how many are our neighbors? It would seem as though the commonness of the blessings we enjoy, and the same mortality to which we are heirs, would fix a chain of kindred feeling among all men. But it is not so. Very different are the views which men entertain upon this subject. Various have been the answers to the question. The tyrant will answer, "those who minister to my pleasure"—the miser will answer, "those who put dollars into my chest"—fashion will answer, "those who rally around my standard"—bigots will answer, "those who belong to our church, none others." But happily we are not left in the dark on this interesting subject. He who spake as never man spake has given us light.

On one occasion, "a certain lawyer stood up and tempted" Christ, "saying, what shall I do to inherit eternal life"? Our Saviour answered him, "what is written in the law? how readest thou?" The lawyer said, "thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself."—This answer being judicious and proper, our Saviour said to him, "thou hast answered well; this do, and thou shalt live. But he, willing to justify himself, said unto Jesus, and who is my neighbor?" The reason of this question, is this; the Jews did not consider the Gentiles as their neighbors; and so far was this notion carried, that if a Jew murdered a Gentile, he was not considered in the light of a murderer, by the Jewish Sanhedrin.—Hence, the lawyer inquired, "who is my neighbor?"

Jesus answered this interesting question in such a striking manner, that the Jew was obliged to answer his own question, and in a way contrary to his own notions. "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead. And by chance there came down a certain priest that way; and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side. And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side. But a certain Samaritan, as he journied, came where he was; and when he saw him, he had compassion on him, and went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. And on the morrow, when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, take care of him; and whatever thou spendest more, when I come again I will repay thee. Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbor unto him that fell among the thieves? And he said, he that shewed mercy on him." Then came the obvious instruction, "go, and do thou likewise."—Luke x: 25–37.

There is one fact in relation to this account, which is well worthy of notice. There are circumstances which seem to show, that this account is not a parable, but an account of a literal robbery; which, if so, must have made it doubly powerful in the eyes of the lawyer.—The road from Jerusalem to Jericho was wild, rocky, lonely, and infested with robbers, and has continued so to modern days. Mr. Buckingham, a traveller in Palestine, says, that they were obliged to have an escort to guard against any robbers who might be hidden in the high cliffs, which extend along the road. He remarks—"Here pillage, wounds, and death, would be accompanied with double terror, from the frightful aspect of every thing around; here the unfeeling act of passing by a fellow-creature in distress, strikes one with horror, as an act more than inhuman; and here too, the compassion of the good Samaritan is doubly virtuous, from the purity of motive which must have led to it, in a spot where no eyes were fixed upon him, and from the bearing which was necessary to admit of a man's exposing himself, by such delay, to the risk of a similar fate."—Quoted in the Cottage Bible, on Luke x: 30.

How much more beautiful does the instruction of our Saviour appear in the light of this fact—how much more amiable the conduct of the Samaritan. To stop and assist a wounded Jew, the enemy of his people, was to endanger his own life, for the robbers might come and destroy him, if he tarried; but he was not afraid; his compassion was aroused, and it led him to take care of the forlorn and wounded Jew. What better instruction could our Saviour have chosen, to rob the Jew of his prejudices, and make him answer his own question?—He could not avoid the conclusion, when the pity and benevolence of the Samaritan were displayed before him, that the Samaritan was the true neighbor of the wounded Jew, far above the Priest and Levite of his own nation. And what could he say to the indisputable instruction of the ever-blessed Redeemer, "go, and do thou likewise"? Methinks, that if the miser, the tyrant, the uncharitable heart, the bigot, who limits the favor of God to but a few, the contentious sectarian who denounces all that can not believe his creed—methinks that if they could have heard our Saviour referring to the perhaps recent transaction between the noble Samaritan and the wounded Jew, and could have witnessed how all-divinely and touchingly Jesus always exhibited the spirit of this beautiful account in his life, they would not only have been ashamed of their conduct, they would not only have exclaimed, "Lord, be merciful to us sinners!" but their hearts would have been filled with a spirit of Christian philanthropy, which is the soul of the Restitution and sees in every man a brother. How glorious is the spirit which this narration embodies! No longer need we ask, "who is our neighbor?" No longer need we doubt that he who slanders his fellow-beings and looks down upon them for not bowing to his creed-book, possesses conduct no where sanctioned by our Saviour. No longer need we look upon mountains, rivers, and oceans, as barriers to brotherhood. God "hath created of one blood all nations for to dwell on all the face of the earth;" and whenever we find a creature in distress, no matter of what nation, clime, sect, or faith, there is a neighbor, a child of God, a brother, who has claim upon our sympathies. This fact is written in the living beams of light and of heat, which flow from the sun upon all men—it is sounded in the noble song of the royal Psalmist, "the Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works"—and especially, it is exhibited by the Saviour in the account of the good Samaritan. And if this truth, noble and worthy truth, was consecrated on every altar of divine worship, and illustrated from every desk; if it was written upon the foremost page of every creed-book, and enshrined in the best feelings of every heart; if in living praise, it was proclaimed "from the rivers to the ends of the earth," as the very spirit of the love of God, forming that golden chain which shall finally draw a redeemed world home to heaven and joy; what would become of war, fraud, dishonesty and persecution?—They would sink to rise no more; while the feelings would expand into "supreme love towards God and universal love towards men," viewing in God a Father, in Christ a Saviour, in man a brother. So be it in the name of him whose nature is Love! G. W. M.

MAN—WHENCE IS HE TENDING?

This body is tending to its original elements, but the mind or spirit has another direction. Amid the infallible changes which are constantly awaiting us on earth, it is an exalting fact, that there is another state of being whose pleasures never fade. Where is the mind which does not thrill with the influence of heaven, when it reflects that its destiny is to nobler scenes, even to the presence of him, of whom in our most secret hours we can say, "thou, God, seest me?"

Though Deity hath created our bodies from the dust, yet beyond death there is a higher, more intellectual creation, whose seal is immortal. "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv: 22. We are not then in doubt concerning the destiny of man. Not more certain is the creation of man than the point to which he is tending. We behold him fashioned from the dust: we behold him in wayward folly committing sin, and meeting severe punishment for his transgression, for vice can not pass unrequited; we behold him sinking in death, and what then?—"Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."—Ecc. xii: 7. This is the destiny of man.

I know that many sincere persons believe that the destiny of multitudes will be from the presence of God, instead of to him, because they are impure. But why should this be an objection? They go to Deity, to be made pure; in his light to see light; and in his influence to become assimilated to his character. All men die more or less impure, for no man, in his mortal constitution, is pure. By returning to Deity, they become equal to the angels in heaven, and are completely subjected to the government of Christ.

If an individual, entirely ignorant of the geography of the earth, should be placed at the junction of the Missouri and Yellow Stone rivers, and was told that the turbid, boisterous water which he saw there, would flow onward until it became entirely pure, it would seem improbable to him—but if he should trace the river to its junction with the ocean, that mighty heart of the earth, he would behold its waters entering that ocean for the very purpose of being purified—it goes not there to be made more impure than ever—it becomes assimilated to the waters of the ocean; and when drawn into the air in the form of vapor, to be condensed in the clouds, and to drop as rain, it is sweet and prepared to yield its own fertilizing nature to the land upon which it falls. And yet, who, not acquainted with the fact, would have supposed that the muddy water in the wilderness far from the ocean, would become the pure rain of the heavens?

The stream of life commences in infancy—it flows onward, for the stream can no more be prevented from progressing to its ultimate destiny, than the river can be prevented from tending to the ocean. This stream may become impure in manhood by reason of wicked works, but still it flows onward until death, and then it reaches the universal ocean of life. The spirit returns to God who gave it—it came from him; to him it must return. Does it return there to be made more impure than ever, to be fixed in endless transgression and a continued opposition to the government of Heaven? We think not; for as the waters of the river return to the ocean for purification, so the spirit returns to God to partake of his all-glorious perfection and holiness.

There is proof of this position. Even when God was communing with the first man into whose nostrils he breathed the breath of life, this noble principle was shadowed forth. For, in the garden it was said, "I will put enmity between thy seed and her seed; and it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel"—that is, sin should bruise man to a certain extent, while sin should be mortally bruised, inasmuch as the prophet Daniel tells us that "sin shall be finished." This purification was also made known in the prophecies of the Old Testament, in a number of cases. "The rebuke of his people shall be taken from off all the earth."

From the creation to the beginning of the Christian era, we find man very sinful. In order to obviate sin, Christ was raised up for the purpose of saving his people from their sins. Matt. i: 21. This Saviour endured persecution and enmity, but with a mildness all-heavenly and divine. We next behold him on the cross, shedding his blood for the world—then we behold his resurrection, and his ascension to the right hand of his Father, with the declaration that all power was given him in heaven and on earth. At the right hand of God, we behold him the "Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time"—1 Tim. ii; and "who is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." 1 John ii: 2. His object in being thus exalted, is distinctly given in Phil. ii: 9, 10, 11. "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father." Consequently, Jesus has all power in heaven and on earth; as he is to cause every knee to bow in heaven and on earth; it follows, that all who die impenitent and without the knowledge of the truth, will eventually be subdued to the power of the Saviour, and made to rejoice that in him they have righteousness and strength. One means of producing this result, is, chastisement. Sin is an evil, and is contrary to the righteous rule of the Saviour.—Punishment is one means of destroying sin, and of bringing the prodigals who endeavor to feed upon it, home to holiness and truth. This punishment will continue to be inflicted on all sinners, until their hearts are subdued to acknowledge Jesus the Christ.

The next view we have of the Saviour, in the progress of his work, is most glorious and exalting, for it is the hope of the Christian soul, and the burden of all heavenly prayer. It points out to us the final state of man; his last glorious and immortal fixedness in divine knowledge and ever-enduring joys. "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority, and power. For he must reign, until he has put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son, also, himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." Oh my soul, rejoice—how great is this view of divine truth—and how nobly does the work of God end in man's redemption. Though God created man, yet he did not forsake him; but through all his follies, watched, and guided, and punished him, until all partial evil is overruled for universal good; after the same fashion that the evil plans of Joseph's brethren were overruled for Joseph's exaltation, and their reconciliation and salvation from a murderous desire. The imperfect, mortal creation commenced in Adam; it ended in Christ, the more noble and second Adam—it began in mortality; it ended in immortality—it began in the flesh; it ended in the spirit. Consequently, at the period when Christ shall deliver up the kingdom to God the Father, this present race of human beings will end, and the earth most probably will again be refashioned, to once more show the glory of the Lord in a more improved race of intelligences, while we shall exist forever in immortality.

We have then found the origin, the nature, and the final state of man. G. W. M.

THE RECORD

The Ohio State Convention of Universalists, met in Akron, September 15th and 16th. Br. F. Loring, Moderator; J. Whitney, Clerk; S. A. Davis, Standing Clerk; W. P. Putnam Treasurer; S. A. Davis, delegate to the U. S. Convention for 1839, with power to represent by deputy, or letter. Twenty preachers and seven lay delegates were present. A proposal to recommend a hymn book, for general uniformity, was laid over. Nine sermons were preached, and the eucharist administered. Met in the Baptist house, as our own new house (of stone) was not yet finished. The meetings were very large and delightful. Adjourned to meet on the third Saturday and following Sunday in September, 1839, as the Moderator and Standing Clerk may publicly desiguate.

Associations.—The Richland Association met [in Lexington, Ohio, we presume, from remarks in the Circular] on September 8th. Br. T. Strong, Moderator; H. P. Sage, Clerk; C. Keith, Standing Clerk; ——— Coleman, Treasurer; Strong, Pond, and Watson, Standing Committee. Br. Farley was admitted to the fellowship of the Association, as a regularly ordained minister of the Gospel. Authorized delegates to the State Convention to urge the adoption of the hymn-book by Br. H. Ballou, 2d, as the denominational hymn-book. Eight ministers were present and three societies represented. Adjourned to meet in Fredricktown, Knox county, on the Saturday next preceding the second Sunday in September, 1839.

The Strafford county Association met in Gilford village, N. H., September 26th. Br. J. P. Atkinson, Moderator; J. Molineux, Clerk; R. O. Williams, Standing Clerk; J. P. Atkinson to preach occasional sermon.—Received the society in Centre Harbor into fellowship. Five preachers (Charles Lamson and Charles Clark, new names), and four lay delegates, present. Four sermons were preached. Adjourned to meet on the second Wednesday and Thursday in September, 1839, as Br. Molineux may appoint.

The Susquehanna Association met in Leraysville, Bradford county, Pa., October 3d. Br. E. Shaw, Moderator; T. S. Bartholomew, Clerk; G. S. Ames, Standing Clerk; G. S. Ames, J. Kingsbury, S. Stevens, Committee on fellowship and ordination; R. W. Cheney, F. Bailey, N. Flowers, on discipline; G. Sanderson, H. Gibbs, T. S. Bartholomew, to appoint Conferences; G. Sanderson, T. S. Bartholomew, (clerical), J. Kingsbury and F. Bailey, (lay) delegates to the Pennsylvania Convention; and S. P. Landers to preach the occasional sermon. The first society in Orwell, Bradford, county, and the first society in Forest Lake and Rush, Susquehanna county, received fellowship—a letter was granted to J. S. Palmer; and ordination to S. P. Landers, T. S. Bartholomew, and R. W. Cheney, at such time and place as may best suit them. Recommended to societies, to state annually, through their Clerks, when formed, the number then belonging, the present number, and their progress from year to year. Fifteen lay delegates from eight societies, and twelve preachers, were present. Sermons were preached by Brs. Ames, Delong, Hussey, Ashton, Barnes, Sanderson and Bullard—addresses by Br. C. S. Brown—and among the official proceedings appears the marriage of Mr. Geo. Bowman, of Middletown, to Miss Frances Stevens, of Dimock, by Br. Ashton. The session is described as a very interesting one. It is not stated whether they adjourned or not, nor to where, nor till when.

The Quinnebaug Association met in Norwich, Conn., October 10th and 11th. Br. D. Tracy, Moderator; H. Lyon, Clerk; Br. Lyon to deliver the occasional sermon; H. Chaffee, Standing Clerk. Granted requests of the church and society in Norwich, to instal Br. Lyon, as pastor, and to admit the church to the fellowship of sister churches. Seven preachers and four lay delegates were present. Seven sermons were preached. Br. Lyon installed, the church in Norwich recognized, and the eucharist administered. Adjourned to meet the second Wednesday and Thursday in October, 1839, as the Standing Clerk may designate.

The Lincoln and Waldo Association met in Prospect, Me., October 10th and 11th. Br. J. Thompson, Moderator; D. Forbes, Clerk; F. W. Baxter, Standing Clerk; F. A. Hodsdon to preach occasional sermon, and E. B. Averill, substitute. Adopted Constitution. Eleven preachers and thirteen lay delegates were present, and six sermons were preached. Among the preachers, Mr. Fales, Nova Scotia, is a new name. Adjourned to meet in Belfast, in 1839, as the Standing Clerk may direct.

New Laborers.—More converts! Rev. Mr. Taylor, pastor of the second Christian society in Lynn, Mass., and a majority of his society, have been converted from this sect of Christians to the Universalist Christians, and have invited the second society of Universalists, who were destitute of a house, to unite with them. This has been done. We thus gain a zealous, able and worthy preacher, the best portion of a Partialist society, and a meeting-house worth nearly $6000. Rev. Jeremiah Haskell, another preacher of the sect of Christian Christians, has also become a Universalist Christian.—He resides in or near Calais, Vt. ☞ Br. Badger, in the last Christian Palladium, says—"Universalism has become an old subject, [it bids fair, truly, to be older than Christianism!] it has gone by [yes, it is travelling ahead, sure enough!] and has lost its interest—[to those who see their ablest preachers beginning to proclaim it]. Its arguments can all be learned in ten days, [and it lacks not for pupils, as may be seen above!] and have all been refuted a thousand times"—[but with refutation so inconclusive, that even their authors (Christian preachers and people) are abandoning them by droves, and begin to proclaim the faith they once endeavored vainly to destroy. Is not that it, Br. Badger? or, why refuse to admit any defence of it into your paper?] Long may Universalism live, to become older and older, and to go by every dark, narrow, and un-evangelical doctrine in the universe!—Br. Kies Doane, of Petersham, Mass., has commenced preaching to good acceptance. Br. J. L. Smith, a member of the church called Campbellite, has commenced preaching "the restitution of all things," in Shenandoah county, Va. What will A. Campbell do? Expel Br. S. for preaching contrary to the creed of this no-creed sect-no-sect, and for denying the supremacy and infallibility of Mr. C.? We shall see.

Ordinations.—Br. Ezekiel Dow was ordained in St. Johnsbury, Vt., October 17th. Sermon by Br. M. Sanford. At the same meeting, a meeting-house was dedicated, a pastor installed, and a church was recognized, as may be seen below. Br. J. S. Barray was ordained pastor of the society in West Amesbury, Mass., on the 14th inst. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou, 2d. Br. S. Turner, recently a Partialist preacher, was ordained pastor of the society in Brunswick, Me., October 17th. Br. J. Grammer was ordained pastor of the society in Andover, Mass., October 3d. Sermon by Br. Z. Thompson.—(For others, see proceedings of public bodies.)

Installations.—Br. H. Sampson was installed pastor of the church and society in St. Johnsbury, Vt., October 18th. Sermon by Br. J. Wallace.

Removals.—Br. W. E. Manley, from Warsaw to Gainesville, Genesee county, NOT Gaines, Orleans county. Br. I. D. Williamson, from Poughkeepsie, to Baltimore, Md. Br. R. Blacker, late of Massachusetts, to Columbia, Me. Br. D. Ackley, from Walpole, N. H., to Hudson, N. Y. Br. J. T. Gilman, from Bowdoinham to Bath, Me. Br. Whitney, from Ohio City, first to Brimfield, now to Akron, O. Br. G. C. McCune, from Woodsborough, Md., to Dayton, O. Br. A. C. Barray, who has been itinerating for some months past, has settled at Harford, Cortland county, and wishes to be addressed accordingly in future. Br. P. Brownson, from Mulberry Grove, to Talbotton, Talbot county, Ga. Br. B. B. Bunker, to Hampstead, N. H. Br. R. M. Byram, to Orland, Me. Br. S. A. Davis, from Pittsburg, Pa., to Akron, Ohio. Br. A. A. Davis, from Sunbury to Worthington, O. Br. R. Smith, to Hamilton, Butler county, O. Br. Wm. West, of Cincinnati, O., starts for England, next month, to visit the home of his youth, preach the word, etc., in Great Britain. Br. Gurley will supply the desk during his absence. ☞ Br. T. D. Cook wishes all letters and papers intended for him, to be sent to Utica, instead of Gaines, after this date.

Church.—A church was formed in St. Johnsbury, Vt., and publicly recognized October 18th. Sermon by Br. J. E. Palmer.

Dedications.—The new meeting-house (not church) at St. Johnsbury, Vt., was dedicated October 17th. Sermon by Br. J. Moore. The meeting house in Stoddard, N. H., was dedicated on the 14th inst. Sermon by Br. L. Willis. Same day, the house of the second society in Lowel, Mass., was also dedicated, sermon by Br. H. Ballou. And on the same day, the house in Fryeburg, Me., was dedicated. The meeting-house in Brimfield, O., was dedicated October 12th. Brs. Tenney, Biddlecom, Davis, Torrey, Bell, and Sadler took parts in the services. Sermon by Br. Whitney. The house is of wood, 30 by 40 feet, gallery on three sides. The house in Montgomery, near Cincinnati, was dedicated September 8th. Sermon by Br. West. The house is of brick, 35 by 53 feet.

Br. H. Hawkins, of Oxford, Me., has resigned his letter of fellowship—not from any change of sentiment, but to retire to private life.

The Glad Tidings, recently published in Pittsburg, Pa., has been removed to Akron, Ohio. Br. Whitney has become joint Proprietor and Editor in it, with Br. S. A. Davis. We give him the right hand of welcome and fellowship, to aid in his new vocation. May his seat be soft—his ink flowing—his pen springy—his mind clear—his heart firm—his hopes cheering—his readers good humored—his subscribers prompt, and his fruition exceed his expectations!

The Universalist Female Charitable Society of Boston, held its anniversary on the second inst. The weather was unfavorable; but the collection taken up exceeded $117.

TO BR. J. V. WILSON.

Dear Brother.—We sent No. 44, current volume, in a wrapper, directed on the outside to you, at Jaffrey, N. H., with an Extra (containing Prospectus for volume 10, and directions to agents) enclosed. Yesterday we received the Prospectus, etc., done up in letter form, nothing written inside, but postmarked on the outside, in red ink, "Jaffrey, N. H., Nov. 14th," and charged "18 3 4" cents postage, and directed to us in the same hand, in black ink. We are satisfied, from appearances, that this was done by some dishonest boy, zealous against Universalism, who is a clerk in your Postoffice. To impose on us, he has violated his oath, (for without being sworn, no one can be employed in the Postoffice,) broken the law by opening your package for you, pilfering therefrom your property, and by burdening the department with a useless letter—for the Postoffice department, and not we, loses the postage, as it was promptly refunded to us this morning, by our Postmaster.

This is a small matter for a newspaper article, but so many attempts are made to impose on us, that we think it time to notice some of them. We therefore give you notice that, hereafter, if your papers are torn, dirtied, or lost, you may look for the cause near home. We have also written to your Postmaster, and sent him the Extra, that he may properly admonish the offender. Were we persuaded that a man—the Postmaster himself—could be so forgetful of his oath, and of his legal and moral duties, we would report the case at once to the Postmaster General for redress. But we think it a boy's trick, and pray he may be cured of it before he grows confirmed in perjury, theft and fraud. Affectionately yours,

G. and H.

OFFERS.

Below we have made some offers to compensate those who are disposed to aid us in increasing our list for the next volume. Can not those who are supplied themselves, supply some friend they would like to serve, in this way, without feeling the expense. There is much useful matter contained in these back volumes that cost us money, and they will neither benefit us nor others while lying in our garret, but by being thus brought into circulation will benefit not only us but the glorious cause in which we are engaged. Those who wish to avail themselves of either of the offers, will please state, distinctly, which offer.

WHO WANTS VOLUME SEVEN?

Any one who will forward us the advance pay for four new subscribers to the next volume, free of expense, or three new subscribers and a five dollar bill at our expense, shall be entitled to a full file of the seventh volume of this paper.

FOR TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

For ten new subscribers and the pay in advance, we will furnish full sets of volumes 7 and 9, and volume 8 excepting numbers 22 and 26, containing the discussion in full.

THE DISCUSSION.

Those who wish for the back numbers containing the discussion, can be supplied with a full set of the numbers from the beginning, together with all the numbers of vol. 8, excepting 22 and 26, and of vol. 9, excepting 12 and 13, by sending us six new subscribers for the next vol., and the pay in advance free of postage.

$2 FOR VOLUME NINE.

Many complain of paying $2 for volume 9. We can not help it. We have suffered for the want of the money and must be compensated in some way. If, however, those who owe for vol. 9, will send each two good new subscribers, and the advance pay, we will deduct the additional charge.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in December, by Br. C. S. Brown, at Upper Lisle.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in December, by Br. C. S. Brown, in Vestal.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in December, by Br. C. S. Brown, in Bainbridge, and in the evening in the Kirby settlement.

Br. C. S. Brown, will preach on the evenings of December next as follows:—evening of Friday, 7th, at Maine—8th, near Philander Hooper's—10th, at Apalachin—11th, at Little Meadows—12th, at Vestal—13th, at Binghampton—14th, at Chenango Forks, near Br. Ackerman's—20th, 21st, and 22d, as the friends in Walton may appoint.

In consequence of a severe attack of the Rheumatism, I shall be unable for the present to fulfil my appointments on the circuit—I have been confined one week at home, and have deferred giving public notice, in hopes that I should be able to resume my travels; but I am completely broke down, and no probability that I shall be able to travel again for a number of weeks. As soon as my health will permit, I shall again visit my friends on the circuit.

C. B. Brown.

Br. Bullard will preach at West Dryden, (brick school house,) on Sunday November 25th, at 10 o'clock, A. M.—at Etna, 1 o'clock, P. M., and lecture at Libertyville, in the evening—at Ludlowville, on Monday evening, 26th—at Newfield, Tuesday evening, 27th—at Peruville, Friday evening, 30th—at McLean, on Sunday, December 2d, and lecture at Groton Hollow same evening. Br Bullard will lecture at Spafford Hollow on Thursday evening December 6th—at Vestal on Friday evening, 7th—preach at Tully on Sunday, December 9th, A. M. and P. M., lecture at Preble the same evening—Br. Bullard will preach at Marathon on Sunday, December 16th, A. M. and P. M.—The above Sunday and Sunday evening appointments, are regular once in four weeks. Our friends in the respective vicinities of the above mentioned places will find it convenient to set down and carefully mark their Almanacs, that they may know at all times when and where to attend—knowing this, we trust they will be present with us, in body as well as in spirit, on all convenient occasions.

W. Bullard.

Notice.—Agreeable to previous legal notice, there will be a meeting of the friends (gentlemen and ladies) in Tully, at Tully Flats, on Saturday, December 8th, at 1 o'clock, P. M., for the purpose of forming a society. The friends in the adjoining towns—Preble, Spafford, Lafayette, etc., are respectfully and earnestly invited to attend, and concur in the measure. We flatter ourselves that there will be a general attendance, and that the society, when formed, will be respectable both for numbers and character. An address will be delivered on the occasion by W. Bullard.

The Quarterly Conference of the Chautauque Association, will be held in Portland, Chautauque county, on the third Wednesday and Thursday in December. Per order,

L. Paine.

POETRY

[From the Olive Branch.]

Lines suggested, by viewing Dubufe's grand pictures of Adam and Eve.

"THE TEMPTATION."

Father of this frail, mortal race,
We gaze on thee: thy noble face
Is lit with blessed virtue's fire,
As thou, to grant her heart's desire,
Seem'st doubtful,—still she implores thee;
Her beauty only can'st thou see.
Her snow-white brow, her speaking eye,
Thou canst not bid the tempter fly.
Ah no—in that sweet look there beams
A heavenly radiance—and there streams
From that bright eye a living light
Thou'rt melted by the glorious sight.
Thou yieldest,—and from that dread hour
Frail man has felt the serpent's pow'r. X.

BOYHOOD.

BY LT. G. W. PATTEN, U. S. A.

I never see the laughing eyes,
Of joyous boys at play,
But memories fond within me rise,
Of childhood's happy day;
To sport upon the festive ground
Seem'd all I had to do,
And when my comrades laugh'd around,
My heart was happy too.

I seldom cared for dust and noise,
Or wore a troubled brow;
But thought myself, with marble toys—
Oh! richer far than now;
I never pined for foreign land,
Nor sighed for distant sea:
The top which turned beneath my hand,
Had charms enough for me.

But now upon my troubled soul,
Come visions dark and deep;
My thoughts are where the billows roll—
And where the whirlwinds sweep.
I love to see the bending mast
Bow down before the storm,
And hear amid the rushing blast
The wing without a form.

I wander o'er the plain of death,
As thro' a lady's bower;
Deep watching for the battle breath,
As for a thought of power.
Alas! the lesson Manhood brings!
And little understood—
To leave the lore of gentler things,
For toil by field and flood.

Flow on, calm blood of childhood, flow;
Speed not your current thin!
Nor let the conscious bosom know,
The fires which sleep within:
Too soon will come the moment when
Each pulse anew will start,
And thou, with purple tides of men,
Must battle with the heart.

[From the Olive Branch.]

WISDOM.

There is nothing so desirable to man as wisdom. Nothing so valuable to conduct him through life and prepare him for death. It is exalted by the wise man above riches, and raised in his estimation above all bodies. What can be compared with wisdom? Shall wealth? No! she never makes men wise, but may serve to drown them in "destruction and perdition." Shall glory? No! For to be puffed up and boasting, is the very thing to bring a man low, in the estimation of the wise and prudent.—Shall pleasure? No! For "where pleasure is, pain is not far off." Pleasure, like Ephraim's goodness, soon passeth away. Shall power? Surely not! For thrones and kingdoms are precarious, and subject to be destroyed and brought to nought. Kings may be taken prisoners and made servants; Princes may be brought to bow to the meanest slave. All these, with many other qualities, can not be brought in competition with wisdom; for they all endure as it were but for a moment, and then pass away. But wisdom endureth forever; she lives, where man ceases to exist; she holds out every necessary inducement for men to seek her while she may be found. To the young, she promises, "They that seek me early, shall find me." To the aged she says, "Turn ye at my reproof; length of days are in my right hand, and in my left hand riches and honor."

"She guides the young, with innocence.
In wisdom's paths to tread;
A crown of glory she bestows
Upon the hoary head.
According as her labors rise,
So her rewards increase;
Her ways are ways of pleasantness,
And all her paths are peace."

Why is wisdom so superior to every other acquirable object? Because it is substantial and enduring. It can not be lost like wealth; it is not passive like glory; not treacherous like pleasure; not momentary as power.—it is greater and of more value to man than all things else—for it outrides all the sublunary enjoyments of time.

But while we seek wisdom, we should endeavor to get understanding; while we attain to the theory, associate the practice. Solomon gives among many reasons why wisdom should be sought by each individual, "If thou art wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself; but if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it."

Give us wisdom to discern the times, because the days are evil. Give us wisdom to direct through life—to prepare for time to come; to number our days that we may apply our hearts to it. J—— A——.

Newton, Mass.

Sir Edmund Nagle—When a young man, travelling in a post-chaise up Shooter's Hill, a highwayman rode up, presented a pistol to his window and demanded his money or life. Sir Edmund, then a very athletic man, seized the arm of the ruffian, twisted the pistol from it, dragged him through the window, and placing him beside him to keep him quiet, ordered the post boy to drive on. The humble supplications of the highwayman were answered with, "Be easy boy, be easy, I won't hurt ye." Still the conscience of the stricken robber kept pleading, till at length the chaise reached the captain's lodgings, when he handed the fellow out of his carriage, walked him up to the garret, and locked themselves in. He then took off his coat, and said, "Now, Sir, I neither mean to hang ye nor hurt ye, but I'll just give you a broth of a bating," which having accomplished, he opened the door and bade the robber be off, and next time he stopped a coach, to rap at the window and ask if Pat Nagle was inside, before he ventured to poke his pistol into it.

MARRIAGES.

In Preston, on the 18th ult., by Rev. N. Doolittle, Mr. —— THROOP, of Michigan, to Miss ELIZA WAIT.

In Stockbridge, September 3d, by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. THOMAS BRIDGE, to Miss ELIZA HOLMES.

In Lebanon, September 24th, by the same, Mr. ORIN LORD, of Hamilton, to Miss PALMYRA SHELDON.

In Champion, September 27th, by Rev. J. French, Mr. KELLOGG E. PARKER, of Wilna, to Miss AMANDA EARL, daughter of Mr. Otis Earl, of the former place.

In Union Square, on the 15th ult., by the Hon. A. Skinner, Mr. GEORGE W. EDGET, of Ellisburgh, Jefferson county, to Miss JANE M. STEBBINS, of Watertown.

In Upper Lisle, October 2d, by Rev. A. G. Clark, Mr. JEFFERSON LULL, to Miss SALLY BENNET, both of Triangle.

In German, October 14th, by the same, Mr. CHARLES COLE, to Miss BETSEY CLINE, both of Smithville.

Also, in Upper Lisle, October 28th, by the same, Mr. LEWIS D. TAFT, to Miss ANTOINETTE N. WESTCOTT, both of Triangle.

In Clinton, October 9th, by Rev. Dr. Clowes, Dr. GEORGE BISSELL, to Miss HARRIET C. PARSONS, both of Clinton.

In same place, Sunday evening, November 11th, by the same, Mr. ERASTUS TOWN, of Caseville, to Miss LOUISA BARNES, of New-Hartford.

In New-Hartford, October 9th, by the same, Mr. THOMAS W. MOON, to Miss LYDIA M. PIERCE, both of New-Hartford.

DEATHS.

In Esprints, Schoharie county, June 24th, of consumption, PAUL H. DELANO, of Pittsfield, Mass., aged 48 years.

By the death of Mr. Delano, the town in which he lived is deprived of one of its most active and useful citizens. On account of his excellence and moral worth, he merited and secured the confidence and high esteem of an extensive circle of relatives and acquaintances who lament his departure. The deceased was not a member of any church, but ever evinced a high respect for the principles of Christianity, by a well ordered life and a regular attendance on the ministration of the word.—His remains were brought to New-Berlin for interment; to which place he was journeying in company with his sister, Mrs. Narramore. A discourse was delivered on the occasion from Gen. iii: 19. N. D.

In Norwich, October 16th, CALEB ARNOLD, aged 81 years. Besides an aged companion, Mr. Arnold has left a numerous circle of children and relatives to deplore their loss. He was a soldier of the revolution, and long lived to enjoy the blessings and privileges of a free government. In early life he joined the Calvinistic Baptist church; yet he professed faith in Christ as the Saviour of the world, and selected for the subject of his funeral discourse, 1st Peter ii: 20–25. N. D.

In Commerce, Mich., October 20th, NANCY C., wife of George P. Hungerford, formerly of Frankfort, Herkimer county, N. Y., aged 27 years. The death of Mrs. H. is peculiarly admonitory to all, of the shortness of life and the certainty of death. But a few hours before her death, she was in the enjoyment of comparatively good health; but alas! what hand can stay the shaft of death! Its deadly aim has ended the life of an affectionate wife, a kind sister, a warm friend, and an exemplary neighbor. Frank, condescending and obliging, she gave offence to none—had no enemies. To know her was to be her friend. Her departure is the more lamentable, as she had just realized the fond anticipation of being a mother, but she left the pledge with a father, as a memento of their mutual love.

Mrs. H. was a firm, yet consistent believer in the final restitution of all mankind. The consolations of the Gospel were offered to the relatives and friends by Rev. A. H. Curtis.

At the residence of his father, in Clayton, Jefferson county, on the 2d inst., Dr. ALONZO SPENCER, aged 27 years.

In the death of this worthy young man, society has lost one of its brightest ornaments. He had just commenced, with success, the duties of his profession; but the spoiler came and consigned him to the tomb. Dr. Spencer was, for a number of years, a firm and unwavering Universalist, and was at the time of his death a subscriber to the "Union." At the closing scene the power of his sentiments was most luminously displayed, in an entire resignation to the divine will. An affectionate father and fond mother are deprived of a son in whom they placed [illegible] confidence. The cold, cold grave, possesses all that was mortal, but the spirit has returned to God who gave it. S. M.

In Pompey, August 25th, Mr. WILLIAM SCOVILLE, aged 55 years.

Br. Scoville was a believer in the doctrine of endless misery, the most of his life, but something like a year previous to his death, he became an unwavering believer in the truth taught by all God's "holy prophets since the world began." The friends of his former faith labored hard to convince him that he had embraced a fatal delusion; one in particular, (a lady,) said to him, Mr. Scoville, you will not die a Universalist! Well, answered the old man, I don't know that I shall; but I shall consider it a sad misfortune if I should not. Well, Mr. Scoville—will you send for me when you think you are dying? If you die a Universalist, I should like to be a witness. I will if convenient, was the reply. When the time of his departure came, he requested his son-in-law to go for this lady, if in his opinion she could arrive previous to his death. It was not far from midnight when his request was granted; and in a few minutes, the individual, who was positive he would renounce his faith previous to his death, stood in his presence, and heard from that dying man a sermon, (for it was nothing less,) that I presume she will never forget while memory performs its office.

The writer of this, attended his funeral on the 27th, and a discourse was given from the following words:—"How are the dead raised up, and with what bodies do they come?" By request. E. M. WOOLLEY.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ to City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, PRINTER, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1838. NUMBER 48.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 36.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

Richmond, Va., October 26th, 1838

SIR—Your letter before me is a savory dish of Universalian literature, science, eloquence, courtesy, religion—worthy of the Augustan age—the Queen Ann era of English taste and refinement, served up in the elegant style of the higher circles, to which you allude in your admirable portraiture of our correspondence. I have not time to dispute your right to be heard in all the schools and colleges, as a model of urbanity, good sense, and good taste, and as a standard of Greek and Hebrew criticism. Time, Sir, is with me too precious to be spent in such an unequal conflict; and I feel as if I were already more than defeated in your fine arts of concealment, evasion, and misrepresentation.

2. I hasten, then, to review the 26 paragraphs of your letter. Your first paragraph misstates and evades my remarks on your compound proposition. Your second presents your excuse for not adducing one text to prove the ultimate holiness of all men, either in this life or in Purgatory.—Your third refutes your former inference that the words "all souls are mine" proves their salvation. I admit not what you assume in the 4th; while in the 5th you admit my rule of interpretation, and propose it as if it were your own; not seeming to know that it leaves the point there in debate as it was: for you attempt not in any case to prove that the context of any passage in the Bible proves the final holiness of all mankind.

3. In your 6th paragraph you talk of scores upon scores of proof-texts which you have adduced to prove universal restoration, and yet you still decline to rely upon any one of them: for, as I shall show in the sequel, you have positively declined to trust your cause upon any of them, in a debate upon their true meaning. In your 7th you attempt to discredit the Apocalypse, and to stultify the comment of that said Adam Clarke, whom you sometimes quote with admiration. And to get rid of its evidence, you assert its almost entire reference to events before the destruction of Jerusalem. In your 8th paragraph you affirm the final judgment (chapter xxii: verse 11) to be past 1800 years ago, and the tree of life to have been planted near the river of the water of life, etc., etc., and that all sorrow, crying, and tears have ceased ages before we were born, etc., etc. In your 9th paragraph you comment learnedly on the word still, and make the words "let him be unjust still," as precisely equal to let him be just forever; and thus you fully refute your rule of interpretation, or show that you disregard it. Your 10th paragraph is an evasion of the criticism upon such phrases as "the elect of God." I argue that such words as elect, saved, condemned, etc., always imply another class of men, who are not approved, justified, saved, etc. I shall reserve your 11th paragraph for future notice.

4. In your 12th you speak gratuitously and irrelevantly of "my brother destructionists." This is mere calumny. I have no such brotherhood. Destructionism is a gospel adapted only to those who are in hell. It is not Christ's Gospel, and I have nothing to do with it. It is, indeed, "less revolting" to sinners than endless punishment; and therefore it can not be a sanction of the Gospel. Your 13th paragraph is "a beggarly account of empty boxes." You count the labels on your drawers; but you have forgotten that they are all empty. After evading, and in fact declining the challenge tendered in pars. 31, 32, and 33 of my 30th letter, you say you have disposed of it. Well, our readers need not be informed by me how you have disposed of it; it is sufficiently obvious. Have you forgotten my three preceding letters? Why do you not reply to them?

5. You then commence the reply to my 32d letter. "The reverie" into which you assume to have fallen, and your paragraphs 14, 15, 16, and 17, are a literal fulfilment of my predictions in that letter concerning your course to the end of the controversy. You have been at pains to rub off all the whitewashing and varnishing which concealed your genuine metal from public inspection, and therefore I can leave you to your own developments. I am neither to be allured nor provoked to fill my time or my pages with a debate upon your manners, or your learning, which you think so eminently qualify you for writing for the higher classes of Universalists!! Go on, Sir; only do not dictate to me, as in paragraph 18, to publish the notes which you have given to your readers from the Family Testament. My readers generally have them; and you have given them to yours—for which you have my thanks. Will you publish in your paper a few columns per week at my dictation!

6. After having repeatedly evaded the defence of your Restorationism, you seem, at length, in paragraphs 19, 20, 21, 22, to have given it up altogether. You would now affect to be understood as having never taught that men cease sinning after death, and call upon me for proof that you have so taught. Do you now say that men sin in your Purgatory, and increase in guilt while expiating their sins by suffering according to their full demerits? I presume the dullest of our readers can now see that you are as victorious in the defence of your post mortem holiness as in your Greek and Hebrew criticisms. You bewail my ignorance of Universalism very feelingly; after telling me you know nothing and can say nothing of your own theory of final holiness and happiness, so far as it is accomplished after death. It is, Sir, a constrained, but, I think, an honest confession. Mr. Skinner, you are a bold adventurer: you profess to teach, that, after death, in some place which you do not like to call Heaven, Hell, or Purgatory, men will suffer as much punishment as will fully expiate their sins, without the need of mercy or forgiveness; yet you now say, when put to the test, that you can tell nothing about it; and that you dare not now say whether they will cease sinning on their entrance or at the end of their torment. If you are not at sea without rudder, compass, pilot, tempest-tost, and shipwrecked, I should be at a loss to imagine such a case. Yet to relieve you, you would even insinuate that you have never taught these doctrines!

7. I asked for a proof of the mercy of your God in forgiving sin, or in remitting punishment. You decline even the attempt. Instead of this, you quote, without daring to comment on it, a few words from David, Psalm lxii: 12—"To thee, O Lord! belongeth mercy: for thou renderest to every man according to his work." Why did you not quote another passage in David to explain this?—Ps. xviii: 25, 26. "With the merciful thou wilt show thyself merciful: with an upright man thou wilt show thyself upright; with the pure thou wilt show thyself pure; and with the froward thou wilt show thyself froward." Your intimated sense of the passage would convert mercy into justice: and thus you would make your God merely just!! You then make sin a disease, a moral distemper; and thus annul the idea of remission or forgiveness: for what should we think of the Doctor who pretends to forgive his patients when curing them! You will still be dabbling in Greek, and explaining words of which you can form no critical or correct idea. You do not, par. 23, write the word correctly. It is APHIEMI, and not aphemi—to remit. Men can remit punishment; but your God can not. Your punishment is the effect of sin! The penitentiary and the gibbet are, with you, the temporal effects of sin. Take away murder and theft, and then the penitentiary and the gibbet cease! What an interpreter of language! What a philosopher of circumstances! But do you make mental pain, or remorse, the punishment of sin? If so, (and your reasoning is intelligible only on that hypothesis,) then it will follow that the greatest sinners suffer the least punishment; for the most frequent and the most hardened sinners suffer the least remorse, while the least sinners suffer most!

8. Permit me to "inform you," as you very courteously do me, that sin is reckoned in Scripture as a debt; and, as such, is said to be forgiven. The man who owed ten thousand talents was forgiven. His sins, or debts, were remitted. And hence the Saviour taught that we must forgive our debts, or our heavenly Father will not forgive us. Jesus taught his disciples to pray, "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." Your God could not forgive ten thousand talents, for he must punish sin according to its full demerit. He will not let any one out of prison (or your Purgatory) till he has paid the last farthing. His mercy is to punish every one according to his sins! I know of no ism, ancient or modern, that so abuses reason and Scripture, as your system of Universalianism. But of the forgiveness of sins I may reason farther after other matters are disposed of.

9. Your 24th paragraph is a positive perversion of my words. I have never said what proportion of mankind shall be saved! Your trilemmas and your perversions of my words are too glaring for any comment. They are suicidal.

10. Your 25th paragraph is perfectly reckless of truth, Scripture, and reason. You say that punishing men according to the full demerit of their crimes, is salvation by grace!!—nay, "punishment is a means of grace"!—Punishment, as you explain it, viz.—according to the full extent of all our demerits, and as the natural and necessary effect of sin, is the means of grace that sanctifies and saves multitudes of our race!! Satan is, then, almost sanctified, and his sins almost pardoned, if six thousand years' exile from heaven is to be considered as any punishment for sin! But you believe in an impersonal devil.

11. Your 26th paragraph is a perversion of my remarks on the attributes of your restorationism. My reasons for preaching the Gospel are happily expressed by Paul: "If by any means I may save some of them" that are wholly lost and ruined. But, Sir, your system saves none from ruin; but increases the positive sufferings of many.—Our system saves multitudes that, without it, would have been forever lost. Your system saves not one such: for all men will be saved from hell, if there were not one Universalist believer or preacher on earth—if there be one word of truth in it. Unless, then, preachers of your doctrine save themselves from starving, they are of all men the most useless members of society.

12. I now return to the 11th paragraph, which, indeed, contains the real gist of the whole controversy. I challenged you, Sir, to select one or two texts, on whose clear and fair construction you would rely, and on which you would enter into a philological or exegetical examination and debate. I only asked for one such text as would prove the ultimate holiness and happiness of all men. Well, Sir, did you meet me? Did you make such a selection? You have not done it. You mention six passages; but decline to meet me on any one or all of them. You say, "When you [myself] have disposed of these, I will name as many more as you [I] wish." That is not what I asked.—To quote a string of texts, and when I had examined them, to throw down another string for my examination, is a very different thing from meeting me on any of them. What will the party now think of you, Sir? To see you unequivocally decline to offer any one text, or texts, on which you dare rely to prove the final holiness and happiness of all men! I have repeatedly called your attention to this. In the September number, and 32d paragraph, I said, "Not one of those scriptures, which you quoted, speak of the ultimate holiness and eternal salvation of all mankind; nor have you, by any sort of reasoning or proof, attempted to show that they do—nor can you!" I said this after the above challenge had been given, for the purpose of provoking you to make the attempt.—But you can not be provoked to such an effort, although it is the very thing which lies upon you. What is the use of quoting a thousand texts, if you do not show their relevance? Do you expect me to show that they are irrelevant before you attempt to show their bearing on the question? Is there a text in the Bible that says, "All men shall be made holy in this life, or after death?" Not one. You have not, in fact and truth, done any thing to prove your 4th proposition, more than you did in the first letter—threw a mass of scriptures together without a single effort to show their meaning.—And even now, when the controversy is within two letters of its close, you are filling your pages with every thing you can see through the planks of your reveries, rather than meet me on the only proposition on which your whole doctrine stands or falls.

13. I presume you think the six texts which you have now adduced, contain your strongest evidence in proof of the eternal life, or the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. True, you have not even quoted them; you have not shown their relevance to the proposition; and logically viewed, you might as well have referred to all the Bible. And do you expect that I must show that the whole Bible, or the texts you have quoted, do not prove your proposition, when you do not show how they prove it?

14. For example: Your first and principal text is Psalm xxii: 27—"All the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee." Not one of the terms of your proposition is found in this verse. "All men," "holiness, happiness, eternal life," are not found in it. This is undeniable. You then suppose that something equivalent is in it. But you have not shown it.—You can not show it. For, 1st. You can not prove that "all the ends of the earth" means "all men" without exception. 2d. Nor can you prove that "all the kindreds of the nations" is equal to every individual man. These are phrases that respect classes of persons—such as Jews, Gentiles, Barbarians, Scythians, etc., rather than every son and daughter of Adam. Again, "turning to the Lord" is supposed to be equal to being finally holy. And, 4th. "Worshipping before the Lord" is supposed to be equal to final happiness. Not one of these four points, all of which you have silently assumed, is proved, or can be proved. Make the attempt, and we will try your proofs. I need not labor all these texts.

15. Your second proof-text is Psalm cxlv: 9—"The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works." God's tender mercies extend to every creature that he has made—in air, on earth, and in the sea; but where is the proof in this that all men shall be finally holy and happy, especially seeing we have so much temporal misery in the present state, where the tender mercies of the immutable God are over all his works!

16. Isaiah xlv: 22-24, is your third proof—"Look unto me, and be you saved, all the ends of the earth"—"I have sworn by myself that unto me every knee shall bow—every tongue shall swear," or confess. Where is the proof of universal holiness and happiness here? Does the bowing of every knee, and the confession of every tongue that Jesus is th Christ, imply universal holiness and happiness? This might be said of either friends or foes. All shall one day be constrained to admit his Messiahship—"Every eye shall see him, and they shall wail because of him." The passages, "Look unto me all the ends of the earth," and "All the ends of the earth shall turn to the Lord," were both spoken in the Jewish age with a reference to Gospel times. They are a prophecy, or a promise of "the grace that bringeth salvation to all men;" but do not so much as allude to the final holiness and happiness of all men.

17. Your fourth proof-text is 1 Cor. xv: 22—"As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." This only proves the resurrection of all who die in Adam. The resurrection, and not the ultimate holiness and happiness of all men, is the subject of this chapter. I need not fill my pages by disproving what you have not attempted to prove. Remember, Sir, that you have not exegetically or philologically, or even in the most common sense way, made one of these texts bear upon your proposition. They do not support it; and therefore I reiterate it, that you can not find one text in the Bible to prove your main proposition: not one, that, by the rules of interpretation agreed upon, will at all apply to it. If you can only find one such, I ask not a second. Do not again shuffle this aside, if you please. It is worthy of your best effort. Your cause is completely killed, even your friends must say, unless you can do something now. Stand up to your capital proposition. You will not be able to divert me from this point, if you would caricature and abuse me in every sentence you may write. We want Scripture, reason, and argument.

18. I shall add a word on punishment; and, as my last letter transcended the prescribed bounds, I will shorten this one. To remit a debt and to forgive a sin on the part of men, are actions so similar, that, in all languages and ages, they have stood for one another. Punishment is not mere remorse, and therefore remorse or guilt is not the punishment of sin. The Lord has often laid his hand on property and person in punishing sin; and not only inward remorse, but outward pain, has always marked the way of transgressors. The Scriptures therefore do not speak of sin as a disease, nor of punishment as a cure. They rather regard it as a fiery indignation—a burning vengeance that shall devour the adversaries of Jesus. And surely there is one text in the New Testament so clear and positive as to be out of debate, which wholly subverts your assumption about punishment. It says, "The wages of sin is death." The punishment, or wages of sin, tends not naturally to the cure of itself; but rather to the destruction of the sinner.

19. It may, however, be remitted. God has promised to forgive, and he can forgive. He can remit its punishment as easily as we forgive a debt. "Jesus was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification"—"His blood cleanses us from all sin"—"He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, when we confess them, and plead for pardon"—"Repent, then, and be converted that your sins may be blotted out"—"Repent, and be baptized for the remission of your sins"—"Repent and pray, that if possible the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee." "Unless you repent, you shall perish." These all not only refute your doctrine, but suggest to yourself the necessity of "repentance towards God and faith in Jesus Christ," that God, peradventure, may grant you "repentance to the acknowledgment of the truth."

Faithfully yours, A. CAMPBELL.

☞Please address your next to me, Evergreen, Anderson's District, South Carolina; also send a copy to my office. A. C.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DEBATING SOCIETIES BENEFICIAL.

In essaying upon the various sources of improving the mental and moral powers, debating societies may be said to hold a prominent place, especially when directed by that unison of feeling, and oneness of sentiment, which is ever the characteristic of a good mind. No class of citizens are more benefited by these associations, than those of limited scholastic advantages. For the student, the farmer, and the mechanic, after closing their labor for the week, to retire for an evening to some commodious room, well warmed and lighted, and participate in a friendly and well-directed discussion, is truly a source of pleasure as well as of mental and moral improvement.

An eminent author has justly remarked, that "much time is spent in foolishness," and could the young men of our country, who are in the habit of spending their leisure hours at the side board, and the midnight gaming-table, be engaged in a profitable interchange of opinion upon the various moral, political, and scientific subjects which engross the attention of the more thinking and judicious part of community, they would soon find the mind enlarged, the heart improved, and their mental and moral powers would enter upon a train of thought which, by industry and untiring perseverance, would ultimately lead to new fields of interesting and useful reflection, and draw out those thinking and reasoning faculties, which might otherwise, like the concealed diamond, forever remain undiscovered.

Mankind are naturally diffident; and to be occasionally in the practice of public speaking, will tend to do away this kind of embarrassment, and establish in its place that confidence, without which, man, however good his motive, pure his intention, or however well versed in the literary world, will find himself unfit and unprepared to speak, or to take a conspicuous part in the deliberations of public councils. Hence, it not unfrequently happens that the true merits of important questions are lost, for no other reason than a want of confidence to place them before the meeting in their true and proper light; and if the attempt is made, it is more than probable that it will result in a total failure, and the person be made the subject of uncharitable scorn, and not unfrequently of sneering and unjust ridicule.

Another benefit arising from an association of this kind, is, that the attention is directed to search for the opinions of eminent and useful authors, which will have the two-fold advantage of storing the mind with useful knowledge, and affording something which will strengthen the argument on the question in debate. Were it not for an association of this or a similar kind, our minds and thoughts might be engaged in something of a deleterious nature, which by its injurious influence, would neither benefit ourselves, nor be instructive to others.

It is an erroneous opinion, that the refined and literary only possess the means by which to insure success in the field of knowledge, and should be corrected. Knowledge is not intuitive. We should therefore labor to attain it, especially in this land of republican equality, where the means of acquiring a respectable education are within the reach of every one.

"Honor and fame from no condition rise—
Act well your part, there all the honor lies."

Knowledge is power, influence, wealth—in a word, it is a prize of infinite value, and is the same, whether gained in the academy or the college; whether sought in the field, the workshop, around the domestic fireside, or in the humble debating school; and when attained, it is not easily eradicated, or soon forgotten. It will stand as a safeguard against the whirlpools of vice and dissipation, and enable its possessor to defend the principles of truth from the attacks of the cunning and crafty, who lie in wait to deceive.

It is said, "Man does not know his weakness." It is quite as true that he does not know his strength. How many, by industry and untiring perseverance, have risen to be men of talent, of honor, and of usefulness.

"He that by the plough would thrive, Himself must either hold or drive," is the true saying of Benjamin Franklin, who was both a friend and a patron to the encouragement of debating associations. And we trust it is hazarding nothing to say, that the first discovery of that mighty genius of intellect, which, in after years, enrolled his name among the wise and great, is attributable to the fact, that he availed himself of every favorable opportunity of speaking in debating societies.

Patrick Henry, in early life, was more inclined to indolence than industry; and regarded the reading of books, and the improvement of the mind, more as a task than a benefit. But in a more matured life, when from necessity, rather than choice, he was compelled to provide for himself, the reading of books and the improvement of his mind became an object worthy of his care and attention, he made it a rule, when in his store, to introduce questions of debate; and when by his crafty management, he had succeeded in getting the parties at issue, he would place himself carelessly on the counter, and study what he called native genius. Thus he continued from a variety of stratagems, to learn human nature; until the study of law attracted his attention; and he proceeded, step by step, in the improvement of his mind, until at the important crisis of the dawning of the revolution, he was called upon to express his views and opinions of a nation's freedom. On that occasion, the full powers of his mind were manifest, and the inalienable rights of man were depicted in such vivid colors, as to light the whole country in a flame.

We would not be understood from these remarks, that the advantage to be derived from debating societies will necessarily produce the inflexible and great mind of a Franklin or a Henry, but we offer them as an illustration of what man has done, and of the fact, that the mind without cultivation, must forever remain a blank. We live in an age of progressive improvement, and he who neglects to cultivate his mental and moral powers, does violence to his own happiness, besides setting the example of ignorance, which is the sure and legitimate offspring of vice and oppression. Then let debating societies be encouraged by young and old. They will serve as an auxiliary in the improvement of the mind, and be instrumental in leading the wayward and wandering prodigals into the paths of virtue and peace.

Hamilton, N. Y., November, 1838. MARIUS.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

RELIGION.

"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." JAMES i: 27.

It appears by this, that the duty of man, as a lover of religion, is to visit the fatherless in their affliction, and to comfort those that mourn. Christ, when on earth, went about comforting the mourner, binding up the broken-hearted, healing the sick, giving sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, causing the lame to walk, and even raising the dead, to comfort the afflicted mother. When we contemplate those transactions of our Saviour, and then survey our conduct, and compare it with that of the Redeemer of mankind, we can see at once how far short we come of pure religion. We who are clothed and fed by the unbounded benevolence of an all-wise Creator, too seldom cast a thought on those of our fellow-beings who are in want of both food and raiment. Too seldom do we go to the cottage of the poor, and seek to alleviate the distresses of the wretched inmate, or soothe the last moments of a dying fellow-mortal. But instead of neglecting those duties which constitute pure religion, we should seek to alleviate the distresses of the widow and orphan, and pour the balm of consolation into their afflicted bosoms. In doing this, we take an important step towards pure religion; and to accomplish it, we must keep ourselves unspotted from the world. We should "cease to do evil, and learn to do well;" we should add to our "faith, virtue, and to virtue, knowledge, and to knowledge, temperance, and to temperance, patience, and to patience, godliness, and to godliness, brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness, charity." We should bless those that despitefully use and persecute us, and try to imitate, in every respect, our divine Lord and master. HENRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate

GOD UNRECONCILED.

Br. GROSH—Not long since, a respected friend of mine, and a member of the Presbyterian church, handed me for perusal, a sermon written by the Rev. Samuel Davies, who for some years was president of a college in New-Jersey, called "Nassau Hall." In the course of my perusal of the sermon, my attention was particularly arrested by the following curious passage:—"I have also joyful news to communicate even to you rebels, if you are disposed to hear it; and that is, that your injured Sovereign is now willing to be reconciled to you, after all your hostilities, if you will now submit to the terms of reconciliation."—See Davies' Sermons, vol. ii, sermon 36, page 364.

That such a sentiment as the above, should originate at camp and protracted meetings, and pass for a doctrine of the Gospel, among the thousand and one over-heated religious fanatics, who usually swarm around them, can not be very surprising to any one who is at all acquainted with the character of those meetings, and those who conduct them. But that it should come from a man like President Davies, who was undoubtedly a man of ability, talent, and learning, also, and who professed to be endowed with wisdom from on high, and worse than all, that it should have been printed and handed down to succeeding generations, as the plain and simple teachings of the blessed Gospel of Jesus, is what I am unable fully to comprehend. What! God willing to be reconciled to the sinner! Is God, then, in a state of *un*reconciliation? If so, I would inquire, when was this mighty and important change brought about in the Deity—a change from reconciliation to unreconciliation? For even President Davies would not, probably, contend that the Almighty was always in that state; consequently, he must be possessed of attributes susceptible of change. This, surely, is an important discovery; for, according to this doctrine, the old fashioned notion that God is "the same, yesterday, to-day, and forever"—"without variableness or" even a "shadow of turning"—is erroneous; neither is there any necessity for preaching the doctrine of repentance and reformation, for there need be no change in the sinner, if so be that God is the one to be reconciled. But what would be the effect of this change upon God? When man becomes reconciled to his God, we expect to behold displayed in his daily deportment, more of the character and disposition of his heavenly Father—in short, we expect that he will become more godlike. Must we, then, by a parity of reasoning, suppose that when God becomes reconciled to man, he will display more of the character and disposition of man, and that he will become more man-like? (I speak with reverence.)

But it is not true that God is in a state of unreconciliation, consequently, he can never become reconciled; for the very fact of his becoming reconciled, pre-supposes a previous state of *un*reconciliation. He is now the same kind, benevolent, and affectionate Parent that he ever was—manifests the same parental care and love for his erring and wandering offspring, that he has ever done—and, in short, is all that infinite, unbounded, and unlimited goodness, mercy, and benevolence can make him. And can such a God need reconciling? Nay. But we, the favored children of his protecting care, and the daily recipients of Heaven's choicest and richest favors, have shamefully departed from the paths of rectitude and filial obedience. We have become unreconciled; for, instead of coming freely to the "fount of God's unchanging love," and partaking without restraint of the cool and refreshing waters of life, we "have hewn to ourselves cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." God has done all things well; but man "has sought out many inventions." "All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned, every one to his own way." Man, then, and not God, is the one who needs a work of reconciliation brought about, that he may "cease to do evil, and learn to do well."

What a strange contrast between the preaching of President Davies and the Apostle Paul! One teaches that God is in a state of unreconciliation with man; the other, that man is at variance with his God. One preaches, that "God is willing to be reconciled to us, the other exhorts us to become "reconciled to God." One lifts up his voice in "the great congregation," and declares: "I have good news to communicate, even to you rebels, and that is, that your injured Sovereign is now willing to be reconciled to you;" while the other exclaims, "All things are of God, who hath reconciled us to HIMSELF by Jesus Christ, and hath given unto us the ministry of reconciliation, to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself"—(not himself unto the world.) "Now, then, we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." Let "whoso readeth, understand," and wisely decide which preached the pure and unadulterated Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," and which the doctrine contained in creeds of man's creating, whereby they deceive those who will not "search the Scriptures daily, to see whether these these things are so." H. L. H.

Russell, October, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

FRIENDSHIP.

BY G. W. GAGE.

Friendship is the immortal echo of virtue, gilding the rough tide of existence; it is the pure image of Deity sparkling in the bosom of humanity. It reflects its beauty over the dreary scenes of time, and lights her cheering torch at the pyre of hope. It is the meek angel of mercy, ministering to man. When dreaming youth first launches upon the treacherous wave of life, friendship's golden chain is linked around every fibre of our being. It entwines its soothing sweetness with the earliest buddings of rash ambition, and wreathes her rich treasures through every feature of our loftiest aspirations to greatness. It purifies the sunshine of juvenile bliss, and pinions a new star in the bright constellation of happiness. When the mystic flight of years extends the silken cord—when childhood and delicacy are clothed with the fortitude and vigor of manhood, friendship then spreads her holiest gifts about our pathway; she pours forth her blessings, more bountiful than the welcome profuse of Autumn. Her tender ties are the faithful bonds of society, which bind man to his brother, throughout the world. They extinguish the last flickering ray of envious malignity, and unfold a nobler and more generous principle. They enlarge, expand, and deepen the communion of mind with mind; they kindle an increasing flame in the innocent heart, and their tacit influence beguiles the dreariness of the lone hour of misfortune. They pencil new colors over the haggard form of gloom, and pour the cheering balm of peace upon the desolate waste of disappointment.

Clinton Liberal Institute, November, 1838.

Before we passionately covet any thing which is our neighbor's, we should examine into the happiness of its possessor. Such a course would save much misery to both parties.

For the Magazine and Advocate

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1838.

1 PETER IV: 1-8.

If any student of the New Testament will only read from the commencement of this epistle to the present paragraph, even in our imperfect common Version, he will readily discover that the people to whom it was addressed were suffering persecution, and that many things are mentioned in it calculated to encourage and console those who were in such a situation. So bitterly, indeed, were the professors of the new religion hated, both by Jews and Gentiles, that the records of the first century of our era, contain little besides accounts of persecutions to which the first Christians were subjected. In accordance with this well known historical fact, we find, in almost all the books of the New Testament, traces and evidences of the Christian converts being hated of all men—being persecuted, tortured, tormented.

The attentive reader will discover that the first verse of this chapter is connected as a deduction or conclusion with what is stated at verses 17 and 18 of the former chapter. The apostle, in these verses, had stated to the brethren of Pontus, that so long as a man is conscious that he is engaged in a good cause, it is better for him, if the will of God be so, to suffer in consequence of his attachment to such a cause, than to be engaged in any cause for which his conscience does not approve him; and farther, that suffering gave no occasion for any one to conclude that the sufferer was a wicked person, or one not approved by God, for Christ had been put to death as an evil-doer, but by his resurrection from the dead, had been proved innocent of the crimes laid to his charge; and, also, a man approved of God. Armed with the consciousness of a good cause, Peter exhorts his brethren to imbibe a portion of that spirit which Jesus displayed, in his suffering, for calling himself the Son of God, and to be prepared to suffer death itself, rather than renounce their faith. As an argument for this amount of self-sacrifice, the apostle thus reasons:—that he who is resolved to suffer in the flesh rather than renounce his religion, is, by virtue of this very resolution, so long as it bears sway, rendered superior to the power of all other temptations to apostacy.

From these views of suffering, and of the cause in which his correspondents were engaged, we can easily perceive that Peter, in conformity with his Master, Paul, and some other promulgators of Christianity, set a low value upon suffering, and even death, when they could at all be rendered subservient to the promotion of a faith in the divine mission of Jesus. To promote and diffuse this belief, and to make a personal application of the teachings of this Heaven-sent Messenger, were the prime duties of the first Christians. For us, at the present day, there is an obligation equally binding, to promote the cause of Christ; but the manner of aiding this cause is different from what it was in the first ages. Now, there are few who doubt the divine authority of Jesus; but thousands, by their conduct, declare that there is no divine excellence in his views and precepts. To force upon those around us a conviction of the heavenly nature and efficacy of the Christian spirit and doctrines, seems the appropriate duty of the modern professor of Christianity. How may this promulgation of the Gospel be best effected? Assuredly by a life and conversation becoming the Gospel—by a holy life—by making our light so shine in our conduct, that men may glorify their Father in heaven for the gift of Jesus, his spirit, and his teachings. Thus, and similarly, may we best promote that cause for which the first converts were required to shed their blood. Our warfare is with inward foes; theirs was more an outward enemy. And, brethren, if resistance even unto death, striving for the establishment of Christ's kingdom, was required and expected of the first Christians, what struggles, what sacrifices would be too great on our part, that this kingdom may be established in our own hearts, and in the hearts of those around us, there to have the undivided sway over all the powers and propensities of our lower nature?—What exertions, what restraints, what amendments in spirit and in life would be too great for us in such a cause?

The Christian converts to whom Peter wrote this letter, were not merely exposed to persecution on account of their faith, but also to contempt, ridicule, and hard names, on account of their abstinence from the gross indulgences mentioned in verse 3. They were reviled, doubtless, as unsocial, particular, puritanical, hypocritical. For their support under this scornful treatment, the apostle suggests a very encouraging thought,—viz., that they had the testimony of a good conscience; that their conduct was agreeable to its reasonable requisitions, and that it was enjoined by him who would soon be the Judge of both themselves and their revilers—both of those who had a name to live, and those who were dead. To what better tower of strength and bulwark of defence can we have recourse, when conscience and our Master require us to be transformed to any of the world's customs? What will best sustain us when the finger of malice and scorn is pointed at us—what, but consciousness of being right; what but our own souls; what but an appeal to the Judge of all the earth?

Finally, as applicable for support to them alike, whether as persecuted or reviled, the apostle recommends to those who are suffering in the cause of Jesus, that they should regulate their conduct by wisdom's dictates; that they should cultivate a prayerful habit, and, above all, that they should comfort and assist each other, by having and manifesting mutual fervent love. In this way, however much blamed, they might be by opposers, they would see few faults among themselves; or seeing, could most cordially forgive and pardon. No advice do modern Christians so much require. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CONVERTED ONE.

A FRAGMENT.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

"Is it not much that I may worship him,
With naught my spirit's breathings to control,
And feel his presence in the vast, and dim,
And whispering woods, where dying thunders roll
From the far cataracts? Shall I not rejoice
That I have learned at last to know his voice
From man's?—I will rejoice!—my soaring soul
Now hath reclaim'd her birth-right of the day,
And won, through clouds, to him, her own unfettered way!"

MRS. HEMANS.

"Now, sister Alice—now, for a walk in the green fields. Look!—see how pleasantly the sun shines—and then the birds are singing so sweetly. Come, sister, let us go"—and away Emma ran to the closet for her bonnet. She did not see that tears were in the eyes of Alice, and that sadness and melancholy were pictured in her countenance. Back she soon came, attired for a walk in the "flower enamelled" meadows.

"Come, Alice, dear! put this on, and then for the walk"—and she reached out the Tuscan she held in her hand.

"No, Emma, I can not go to-day—I do not feel well—and, beside, I have much work to do. You can go alone—or, Trip can go with you"—and she patted the little Spaniel by her side.

Emma was much disappointed, but she did not stop to reply. Calling Trip, away she ran, "for a walk" as she said, "in the green fields."

The sun was indeed shining pleasantly—filling the heavens with the blaze of his glory—causing every thing animate to rejoice! The thousand-voiced choirs of the grove were making every hill and valley vocal with melody—and from old forests, and murmuring streams, a song of praise was continually going up to the great Creator!

But Alice was sorrowful. The lyre-like strings of her heart were broken, and gave back no response to the music that was around her! Her mind was desolate of joy—the spoiler had been there!

"——— Wo for those who trample o'er a mind
A deathless thing—they know not what they do,
Or what they deal with!—Man perchance may bind
The flower his step hath bruised; or light anew
The torch he quenches; or to music wind
Again the lyre-string, from his touch that flew—
But for the soul!—oh! tremble and beware
To lay rude hands upon God's mysteries there!"

Alice B——— was the victim of a "modern excitement"—had "experienced," as it was said, "a change of heart"—and become an "heir of salvation" through the great Redeemer! But it was a contracted system of faith she had embraced—one that limited the boundless grace and love of "our Father," and set bounds to the universal dominion of Christ. There was no peace and joy for her in believing—no hope like that of the great apostle, to throw its glorious beamings in upon the darkness of her soul! Her days were spent in weeping—and at night, gloomy spectres of the imagination stood by her bed-side, and chased sleep from her eye-lids!

But the day of her deliverance was at hand.—Br. G——— a "messenger of glad tidings," was to lecture on a certain evening in the village of M———, where she resided, and she would attend. For, although the victim of a cruel creed, she was no bigot—and the shackles of prejudice were not so firmly riveted but that she could shake them off.

The appointed time arrived, and Alice was in attendance, prepared to listen. The preacher did not shun to declare the whole counsel of God.—The Gospel was preached in its purity and loveliness—and the salvation of a lost and sinful world, showed to be the good pleasure and purpose of the Almighty. Alice was all attention; and long before the final "Amen" was pronounced, the big tears of joy were gushing from her dark eyes.—The victory was won! and another child of error ushered into that glorious kingdom, which is "righteousness, joy and peace in the Holy Ghost." She now possessed a higher and a holier faith—even one that overcomes the world! Light had broken in upon the darkness of her mind, and the heart that once was desolate, was now filled with joy and rejoicing!

Harford, November, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CHRIST-IANS.

In the sketch which was given in the Magazine and Advocate some time ago, of conversions in the ministry, I am set down as a convert from the Christ-ians; and in the Register for 1839, I am marked as having formerly been a Partialist preacher. The last is incorrect; and the first is not exactly as it should be—I was never a Partialist preacher; I was once a member of the Christ-ian denomination, and commenced preaching while in that denomination: but I was as well known to be a believer in, and an advocate of, the final holiness and happiness of all mankind when I joined them, and during my stay with them, as I am now. There were also eight or ten members of the same church, who embraced the doctrine of the restitution; three of whom were preachers; and we were all, in effect, though not in form, excommunicated, on account of our increased faith, from that church which rejects all names for itself but that of Christian, because every disciple has an equal right there, whatever may be the peculiarities of his religious faith, only so that he believes "that Jesus is the Christ."

I have said that we were, in effect, excommunicated. As the Bible was our only creed, and every member had an equal right to understand and interpret it for himself, it was manifest that no one could be censured, much less excluded, on account of his faith; yet, as many facts will testify, the bitter enemies of Universalism, whatever may be their professions of liberality, will not long endure a connexion with zealous and active Universalists. During the days of union, peace, and prosperity to this church, we cherished a tender regard for each other's feelings; so much so that we generally avoided saying much, and especially in public, against any doctrine which some of us deemed important divine truth; consequently little was done to spread the knowledge of the great salvation, until Br. Abner Wood, an esteemed minister, who had been a destructionist, was brought to the knowledge and acknowledgment of that truth which maketh free indeed. In the eyes of this brother, truth was more precious than the feelings of his brethren. He preached the doctrine with zeal and energy; and the consequence was, that as a church, our boasted liberality "when weighed in the balance, was found wanting." As there was no way provided by which Br. W. could be excommunicated, merely for being an honest man, and as such a violation of the laws of Partialism as Br. W. was now guilty of, could not longer be endured by Partialists, the consequence was, that a majority of the church when assembled in church meeting, by a formal act withdrew from the church. And then, what was very curious, almost immediately thereafter they were the church, and associated with the sister churches of the denomination as such.

Such is the story of my separation from that denomination whose professed object is to tear down partition walls, and unite all the followers of Jesus in one church. If I had been allowed to remain there unmolested, and in the enjoyment of equal rights, I should never have broken my connection with them. For I still believe that if their practice was as liberal as their profession, they would deserve no censure for rejecting sectarian names.

It is not from a desire to insult or offend those people, who arrogate to themselves the name Christian, that I substitute the above italicising and division, but to do justice to myself and others, who, though not members of that denomination, still profess Christianity; for surely it would be inconsistent with such a profession, for me to say, that I am not a Christian. They are entitled to the name Christian in common with others, but not to distinguish them from others.

J. FRENCH.

 Christian Palladium please copy.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

MOTIVE TO OBEDIENCE.

Various are the motives which have been, and still are presented to the consideration of mankind, to induce them to lead lives in conformity to the teachings and requirements of the Gospel of the Redeemer. But when we examine that Gospel itself—when we look at the teachings of Christ and his apostles, and consider the manner in which they persuaded men to "walk in all the ordinances of the Lord blameless," we shall discover that they founded all their warnings and exhortations upon the mercy and goodness of the Almighty. They did not appeal to men's fears and passions, the wrath and terror of a vindictive Deity, nor the everlasting flames of a fabled hell, as reasons why God's name should be honored, and his commands observed. For though these had all been proclaimed, with all the display and power which was attendant upon the delivering of the law to Moses, they would have failed to have secured their end. Men can not be forced to love God, nor to practice virtue. We do not deny that fear has, and will exert an influence. It may induce outward submission. It may cause the knee to bow and the tongue to confess. But it will be the cringing submission and forced submission of a servile slave, rather than the free, ardent homage of a pure and grateful heart. It is not that homage which the Eternal requires. "He is a spirit, and they that worship him, must worship him in spirit and in truth." God's character must be known, his goodness seen, and his love felt in the heart, before men will become "followers of him as dear children." We urge the love, the undivided, ever-enduring love of God, as the great inducement to holiness. This was the motive which Christ ever presented to those whom he addressed. He pointed to the sun and the rain, dispensing their blessings alike upon the good and the evil, and declared that the same impartiality, the same boundless goodness was manifest in all the works of God. He assured his disciples that they had all one Father—that they were all brethren.—And he urged them to love their Father, because he first loved them, and because in all his dispensations, he sought their highest good and happiness. He loved them in giving them an existence; and when they had wandered from their Father's house into the deserts of sin and wo, he still loved them, and manifested his love by sending his well-beloved Son to die and redeem them from their iniquities. He will continue to love and bless them forever.

We confidently believe, that when men shall see the character of God in this light, they will diligently obey his precepts! They will not cringe and bow down before him as does the slave before his cruel, tyrannical master; but with childish confidence and simplicity, lift up their hearts and cry, Abba, Father. Then will error and sin fall away—righteousness and truth prevail, and then will God indeed "dwell with men on the earth."

Claremont, N. H., October, 1838. H. R. N.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1838.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. XVI.

"And again I say unto you, it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God."—MATT. xix: 24

This passage is frequently applied indiscriminately against riches. How often riches are represented as preventing men from entering the kingdom of God.—All men, with few exceptions, desire to be rich. If all men who desire to be rich, which of course is the same thing as being rich, so far as the motive is concerned, if they can not enter a future heaven, well may we join with the disciples, and say, "who then can be saved?" But that this indiscriminate tirade against riches, amounts to nothing, is evident from the fact, that those who make it, and claim to be saints, are desirous of becoming rich, and many of them are rich. But we proceed to explain.

1. "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle." Some suppose that this expression is very extravagant, and I have been myself inclined to the opinion, that the translation should be, "it is easier for a cable to go through the eye of a needle,"—but after a thorough examination, I am convinced that camel, from Kamelon, is correct. Clarke, Campbell, Calmet, Improved Version, Cottage Bible, all agree in it. In Babylonia, where elephants were known, they had the expression, "it is easier for an elephant to go through the eye of a needle." In Palestine, elephants do not live, but camels do; and hence the expression. It is simply a strong saying, denoting impossibility. We have some sentences after the same principle. We say, "heaven and earth will come together, sooner than we will break our word"—that is, it is impossible for us to falsify our pledged word. So, our Saviour, simply used this figure to denote that a rich man could not enter the Gospel.

2. The impossibility of a rich man entering the kingdom of God. This was a fact only in the circumstances then existing. Let us look at the account. A young man inquired of our Saviour, what he should do to "inherit eternal life," or "enter the kingdom of God," or receive "the Gospel"; for these are all synonymous terms. He was told to keep the commandments. He answered, that he had kept them from his youth up.—He was then told, to sell all that he had, give it to the poor, and follow the Saviour. When he heard this he went away sorrowful, "for he had great possessions." Then came the assertion, that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God. It was particularly necessary, at the commencement of the Gospel, for men who intended to follow Christ, to give up all their possessions, lest their attention should be distracted by them, and because the time was soon coming when riches would be of no value in the overturn of the Jewish nation. Now it was impossible for this young man to enter the Gospel, because he loved his riches so well that he would not part with them; consequently, remaining among the Jews, when destruction came upon the Jewish nation, he and his riches were both swept away. This is undoubtedly the true, and only application of the passage.

That it is correct to attain riches by honorable industry, is clear as light—it would be folly to deny it. We are only to see to it, that desire for comfortable competency does not degenerate into a miserly spirit, so that we lose all charitable disposition and endeavor to defraud others of their property—this is wrong in the sight of God and man—but virtuous exertion is right; nay, a duty. Some, however, place their happiness on the possession of riches; but how mistaken is such a notion. It is not gold that constitutes happiness. Many a poor wretch, that has rolled in silks and gold, has been unable to enjoy them, because of vice and iniquity. There are other riches besides money. To have a knowledge of God and the Saviour, to follow Christ sincerely, to walk in the paths of virtue and holiness, form the true riches of happiness and peace. Nor do I believe it right, for a parent to slave himself night and day, to deny himself the comforts of life, for the sake of leaving large portions to his children. I have seen children brought up in idleness to inherit large amounts of property, and then scatter it in dissipation, and finally sink in ruin; and I have concluded, that it would have been better for all such children, if their fathers had been poor men. Far better do I believe it would be for children to be taught industry, and to have a good education, with a little assistance to make their own way in the world, than to be fixed amid millions, without any exertions of their own

G. W. M.

DO WE WORSHIP CHRIST?

(IN REPLY TO BR. WHITTEMORE.)

In No. 43, current volume, I noticed an article in the Trumpet, by Br. Whittemore, in regard to Rev. Richard Roe's declination to be a Corresponding Secretary of the Universalist Historical Society, lest he (Mr. R.) might seem to fellowship Unitarians. Br. Whittemore, in order to obviate Mr. Roe's objections, among other differences between Universalists and Unitarians, declared that Universalists considered Jesus Christ a proper object of worship; and quoted several passages of Scripture in proof, in which the word "worship" occurs in connexion with the Saviour's name. As Mr. Roe is a Trinitarian, and objected to fellowshipping us on account of our Unitarianism, and as Br. Whittemore was removing his objection, by pointing out wherein Universalists differed from Unitarians, Br. Whittemore must have intended that Mr. Roe should understand the term "worship," as Trinitarians understand that word when applied to Jesus in the Scriptures. Certain am I, that, taking in the whole scope and object of that article, and the absence of all explanation or limitation to the contrary, Trinitarians would so understand him. I, and several brethren here, so understood him.

Knowing that many—very many Universalists do not believe that Jesus is a proper object of worship, in the Trinitarian sense of that word when applied to Christ, (i. e., in the sense I believe Br. W. meant Mr. R. to understand it,) I replied to the article as above stated—declaring that Br. W. either used the term "in some other than its commonly understood meaning, or that he misrepresented the views of Universalists." I explained my terms fully and clearly, stating, that if Br. W. meant by the term worship "what all Unitarians [perhaps I had expressed myself better, by saying, Unitarians generally] understand by the term as used in the Scriptures," then he was correct—but then, mind you, his pretended difference between us and Unitarians ceased, and his object was not attained. But I said, that if by worship, he meant "what our Trinitarian brethren generally understand by it," then his statement was incorrect; for that Universalists "never worship Christ in the strictest, highest, and most common meaning of the word." By turning to my article, the reader will see how carefully I guarded my meaning from being misunderstood, and see that Br. W. could not have misunderstood me, if he read the whole article.

Well—Br. Whittemore replies in the Trumpet of November 17th, in three long columns of that paper, (equal to two pages of our sheet,) and quotes numerous passages of Scripture, and verses from our hymn books, in which praise, adoration and worship is said to be offered to Christ—all of which I, and Unitarians generally, as firmly believe, and as honestly use, as he does! He spends much room to show that Unitarians can not consistently worship Jesus; still construing the term "worship" in the Trinitarian sense; for in the other sense of the word, Unitarians do worship Christ, as I am prepared to prove. Consequently, he still hangs to the Trinitarian sense of the word "worship," when it occurs in connexion with the Saviour's name, and insinuates in genuine ad captandum style, that I, and all Unitarians, depart from the practice of angels, Paul, the two Marys, the Magians, etc., etc.!

Now I have neither leisure nor inclination to go into a labored reply to such insinuations, and to show that I believe all the Scriptures and hymns he has quoted, and to point out his numerous evasions of the point in dispute. Nor is it necessary. The whole subject, is, briefly, this:—

Br. Whittemore evidently meant, that Mr. Roe should believe, that Universalists generally worship Christ, as Mr. Roe understands the word "worship" when applied to Jesus in the Scriptures—in other words, in the Trinitarian, and not in the Unitarian sense of the term. This is his position—and to this position he yet clings in the reply before us.

I deny that Universalists generally, worship Christ, in that sense of the term worship; and affirm that they worship God, only, in this highest, most commonly understood meaning of the word. Remember now, that I do not affirm that Universalists never worship Jesus in any sense, (for I do contend that they, and all Unitarians, do worship him, as they understand the word to mean in the passages quoted by Br. Whittemore;) but I contend that we do not worship Christ in that sense in which Br. W. uses the word—in the highest, supreme sense of the word—or, with what is commonly called religious, or divine worship. This is my position, taken clearly and positively in my first article, and here as unequivocally re-asserted and maintained.

Now, it must be evident to every mind, that Br. Whittemore's numerous quotations of Scripture and hymns, where the words "worship," "adoration," etc., are applied to Christ, do not help him in the least; for I believe all those declarations as firmly as he does--but not in the sense he puts on them. Let him prove that Universalists generally, understand and believe those passages in the sense in which he evidently meant Mr. Roe to understand them, and his point will be gained—but not till then. This is his duty, if he would sustain his assertions—and this labor, I respectfully assure him, he can not perform.

On the other hand, it is my task to prove, that Universalists generally, worship (that is, with divine worship—in the highest, supreme, and most commonly understood meaning of the term, "worship") no one but the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. And in doing this, I need not even attempt to prove that we do not worship Jesus in a sense infinitely below that highest sense; for I believe that all Universalists (and nearly all Unitarians, Br. Whittemore's assertions to the contrary notwithstanding,) do thus worship Jesus. But to my task.

1. All our prayers, so far as my knowledge and information extend, are addressed to God, and to God only. He, alone, is supplicated and thanked for favors and blessings. Br. Whittemore endeavors to evade this proof, by asserting—"yes, Universalists in their sermons, in their prayers, and in their hymns, and I trust in their HEARTS, give glory, honor, praise and power both to God and the Lamb." Admitted—I never denied it—but do they address their prayers to Jesus Christ? In the same evasive style, Br. Whittemore says, "I sing his (Christ's) praise, I make ascriptions to him in prayer," etc. So do I—so do the Unitarians, Br. Whittemore's assertion to the contrary notwithstanding—but do Universalists ADDRESS THEIR PRAYERS to Jesus Christ? If not, then they do not worship him in the highest, most commonly understood sense of the word, but God only.

2. Our houses of worship are dedicated "to the only wise God, our Saviour"—"to the only living and true God, the Saviour of all men;" and are NEVER dedicated "to the worship of Jesus Christ." I know not, and never heard of, a single Universalist meeting-house dedicated to the worship of Christ, but of his and our God and Father, only.

3. Though our preachers seldom touch on the subject under discussion, yet some of them have urged this point, as a distinguishing sentiment among us, in their sermons and other publications. The following extract from Br. S. R. Smith's Occasional Sermon, delivered before the U. S. Convention of Universalists, at its Jubilee session, (1835,) in Hartford, Conn., may serve as a sample of the proofs in store under this head.

"The doctrine of the Trinity destroys also, the simplicity and purity of religious worship, by distracting the mind with doubts respecting the nature and kind of service that should be rendered. For as the offices of the respective persons of the Godhead, are supposed to be extremely different, so the devotions adapted to each, must necessarily be varied to suit the character of the object." [The same applies to Br. W.'s views of God and Christ, if both are to be worshipped as he contends.] "While, therefore, we have labored to remove this doctrine from the temples of Christian worship, we have endeavored to rebuild the fallen altar of the God of Israel—to present HIM as the ONLY object of ALL RELIGIOUS HOMAGE AND PRAISE.....We have appealed to the well known and acknowledged devotional practices of our Saviour, as ample proof, that he [himself] could not be the being whom he adored—to the language of the Bible, which asserts that 'Jehovah is one Lord,' and that 'beside him there is no God.' And we have always and urgently endeavored to re-establish this fundamental truth of the Gospel, that to the Christian 'there is one God, even the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him.'"

Now, the preacher not only gives his own views and arguments in this passage, but he expressly declares what Universalists, as a body, have done—namely, labored to present "the God of Israel" "as the only object of all religious homage and praise." Br. Whittemore speaks of his own "twenty years acquaintance with Universalists." He has therein some six or eight years the advantage of me; but I presume that Br. S. R. Smith may claim a few years of advantage over him. Besides, if Br. W. will overhaul his file of the Trumpet, he will find that he gave a synopsis of this very sermon, and endorsed its statements!

4. Our hymn books, though compiled mainly from Trinitarian collections, and perhaps not cleanly sifted, nevertheless testify that God is regarded by us as the only proper object of divine worship. I have room for but a few samples of proof under this head. In the collection by Br. H. Ballou, 2d, the 40th hymn, says of God,

> The power is thine alone,
> To make it [the truth] spring and grow.
> Do thou the gracious harvest raise,
> And Thou alone shalt have the praise."

Again, hymn 80, it says of Jehovah,

> "To him alone let praise be given."

Again, hymn 82 says of our Maker,

> "Whose glorious name alone
> Deserves our endless praise."

Again, hymn 89, of the only God,

> "Worship to Thee alone belongs—
> Worship to Thee alone we give."

And again, hymn 95,

> "He formed the living flame,
> He gave the reasoning mind;
> Then, only He may claim
> The worship of mankind."

Much more can be given, if necessary. In Streeter's Collection, such clear declarations are not so frequent; but even here many more than "two witnesses" can be found. For instance, hymn 48,

> "He reigns alone; let no inferior nature
> Usurp the honors of the sole Creator."

Again, hymn 336,

> "God of mercy, God of grace,
> Hear our sad repentant songs;
> O, restore thy suppliant race,
> Thou to whom all praise belongs."

And again, hymn 479,

> "Greatest of beings, Source of good,
> We bow before thy throne,
> Which from eternity hath stood,
> And worship Thee alone."

I will not retort Br. Whittemore's ad captandum questions—If Br. W. worships Christ, how can he sing our hymns?—nor will I quote those passages of Scripture which say that God, only, shall we serve, etc., and accuse Br. W., of worshipping differently from the Patriarchs, the Prophets, the Apostles, and Jesus—of violating the first commandment, etc.—nor will I say that if Universalists sing these hymns, and believe these texts of Scripture, then do they worship God, only, etc., etc.—No—it is enough for me that I have fully proved my position, and that Br. Whittemore can not prove his! Of course, he will admit that the impression he aimed to give Mr. Roe, in regard to Universalists worshipping Christ, was erroneous.

But, as I have several times stated that Br. Whittemore's declarations, that the Unitarians can not consistently worship Christ, as Universalists do—that they do not sing Christ's praises, nor make ascriptions to him in their prayers—are not correct, I will now show that he is not correct in those statements.

He quotes Mr. Emerson's—blasphemy, I had almost said, but Pantheistic nonsense were a better term—to prove that Unitarians can not worship Christ. Does not Br. W. know that the leading Unitarian periodicals unanimously disavow, and reprobate severely, that sermon of Mr. Emerson's—that Professor Ware has preached and published an able and generally approved refutation of it? How ungenerous and unfair, then, to hold up Mr. Emerson as a leading Unitarian, and to charge that denomination with holding to his transcendental Pantheism! As to the views of Priestly, Lindsey and Belsham, in regard to the nature of Jesus, they are those of every Universalist, who believes, that Jesus Christ was, by nature, a man. How numerous that class is among us, I can not say—I know several among our preachers in this State, besides myself—probably a dozen—and they are among the ablest, most zealous and devoted of our preachers—one of them is scarcely excelled in his standing as a scholar and a preacher, by any in our order. I know that they profess belief in the passages quoted by Br. Whittemore, and freely use many, if not all the hymns he refers to, and I have such entire confidence in their integrity and nobleness of soul, as to believe them honest in all this. Consequently, they can and do worship Christ, in the sense in which the word "worship" in those texts and hymns, is understood by them. Besides, if Br. W. will look into Greenwood's Unitarian hymn book, he will find that they sing Christ's praises; and by reading their books of devotion, he will find that they make ascriptions to Jesus in their prayers. Strange that a man living in the midst of New-England Unitarians, did not know these facts! Highly disingenuous—yes, disingenuous and unfair, if he knew them, and stated otherwise! I fear, very much, that Br. Whittemore's hostility to the miserable policy of our Unitarian brethren, has either blinded or warped his understanding.

And this brings me to explain and retract my charge that Br. W. was disingenuous in his first article, and that he strained a point to gain a convert.

Br. Whittemore, has always condemned, in severe terms, the Unitarians, who, in preaching respecting the destiny of man, applied the Scripture phrases "everlasting," "forever," and "eternal" to punishment, without explaining that they did not use them in the commonly understood meaning—thus leading their Partialist hearers to suppose that they believed in endless misery, when, in fact, they did not. Now, when I read his article on Mr. Roe's declination, I supposed that he did not believe that the term worship, applied to Christ, was used in those passages of Scripture in its highest, most commonly understood sense—and yet that he purposely so used it as to be understood in that very sense. Consequently, I did believe him disingenuous, and stated so. I supposed him prejudiced against the Unitarians, and anxious to lead Trinitarian Universalists to believe that we differed from the abhorred Unitarians in regard to the worship of Jesus; when he knew that we did not differ from them. Consequently, I believed that he strained a point to gain a convert. But if I understand rightly his last article, he did, himself, understand the term "worship" as he meant Mr. Roe to understand it—and he did suppose that we differed, as a body, from Unitarians in our views of the worship of Christ. Consequently, I have accused him wrongly in both cases. He was only mistaken in supposing that his views of the worship of Jesus, were the views of "ninety-nine in a hundred of the Universalists of the United States;" whereas it appears, that that number, at least, entertain the general Unitarian views on that subject—that Universalists, generally, to say the least, (and to use the language of Belsham, quoted by Br. W.,) "disavow all those personal regards to Christ, and direct addresses to him, either of prayer or praise, which properly fall under the denomination of religious [or divine] worship." His judgment, not his heart and conscience, were in fault—and I was wrong in attributing his error to intentions of gaining a convert, or to disingenuousness.

He regrets that I did not copy more of his article. I copied the entire paragraph in which the single objectionable sentence occurred—much more than he copied of my article—indeed, he hardly copied enough to let his readers see my meaning.

He fears that our readers may understand, from my article, that he is a Trinitarian. I think not—but to satisfy him, I now assure them that he does not believe in the Trinity—in the Athansian creed—though he holds to the worship of Jesus in the highest, supreme sense of that word.

Thus ends this long article. Unless Br. W. proves his position, or, failing to prove, refuses to retract it, or convicts me of error in my statements, I shall hardly return again to the subject. A. B. G.

IS CHRIST THE CAUSE OF SALVATION?

In number 43, under the caption, "do we worship Christ?" I noticed an error of Br. Whittemore concerning our general views on that subject. I feel some delicacy in again undertaking the duty of correcting another similar error, which he has committed in the Trumpet of October 20th, under the question, "Have Universalists no creed?" In reply to the question, "Now, what are the points on which Universalists are all agreed?"—Br. Whittemore gives, as the fourth point, "That all men at last shall be saved from sin and death by the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ." And he adds—"These are the cardinal points in which Universalists are all agreed, whether they be followers of Murray, Winchester, Ballou, or Balfour."

If Br. W. means by this, that the grace of Christ is the first and only cause of our salvation, I deny the correctness of his statement. There are not, probably, five Universalists in the State of New-York—a State containing nearly one-fourth of all the Universalist preachers in the United States—that hold as Br. Whittemore has stated. Certainly all Universalists do not hold it; for, to go no further, the writer of this article does NOT believe "that all men at last shall be saved from sin and death by the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ." I believe in the result—the salvation; but not in the sole cause to which it is here ascribed. I look to a higher, more efficient cause, even the "One God, whose nature is Love, revealed in one Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of Grace, who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness." The grace of God, which gave us Jesus Christ, and inspired him with grace, is, with me, the only cause of salvation; and it seems to my mind, like idolatry and ingratitude, to ascribe salvation to any other cause, or to offer divine worship to any other being for it.

Now, let me be understood. I am not condemning Br. Whittemore or any other brother for believing what Br. W. has stated, or for offering divine worship to Jesus, as the proper cause of salvation—no; that is not the question—the error (as I believe it to be) on that point, is not what I would correct in this article. This is the subject. Br. Whittemore has stated, if I understand him rightly, that all Universalists ascribe salvation to Jesus Christ as its proper cause, and worship him with divine worship. I say, all Universalists do not thus believe, and do not thus worship. In proof, I adduce my own faith and practice on this subject, and the faith and practice of many brethren, lay and clerical, whose views I am well acquainted with. They do not believe and practice as Br. Whittemore declares—consequently, his declarations respecting the views and feelings of all Universalists, are incorrect in point of fact, and unjust to the brethren whom he has, probably ignorantly and innocently, misrepresented.

Whether many brethren at the East agree with Br. Whittemore, I can not say—but, being one whose character for veracity and consistency—whose conscientious feelings in regard to the worship of the only true God, as the sole and supreme Giver of all good—are injured by Br. Whittemore's misrepresentations of the faith of all Universalists, I humbly request him to correct his mis-statements, either, by excepting all who believe and worship with me, out of his "all Universalists," and his "Universalists generally"—or, by leaving the divine worship of Jesus, and the ascription of salvation to his grace only, out of his views. Will Br. Whittemore do us, and himself, this justice at his earliest convenience?

A. B. G.

TO OUR CANADIAN SUBSCRIBERS.

Dear Brethren—Without expressing any opinion as to the causes of the disturbances which now agitate you, and which may render social and religious intercourse between us difficult, we may be permitted to sympathise in your sufferings and privations, and to assure you that it is with great regret we are compelled to pursue the course below pointed out. It will lose us, at least for a time many valuable subscribers—it will delay the advancement of our holy faith in your several vicinities, and it will deprive some of you of what we fondly trust, was a weekly fund of instruction and pleasure—the Magazine and Advocate.

But should the present troubles continue (as there is reason to believe they will) for some time, many of you will find it as difficult to receive your papers, as to send us the pay therefor. Under these circumstances, we feel compelled to adopt the following rule.

1. No papers will be sent to any subscriber either in Upper or Lower Canada, after the first day of January, 1839, unless expressly ordered, and paid for in advance.

2. We will do the best we can with such bills as may be sent us, but all discount above five per cent we must charge to the sender.

Such are our rules—we can not deviate from them, until times grow more favorable. When that period arrives, we hope to find you again among our patrons; and, even, that many of you will order the back numbers which these rules may cut you off from receiving. Praying God to have you in his holy keeping—to preserve you in the belief and practice of our most holy faith—we are fraternally yours,

GROSH and HUTCHINSON.

By the above, it will be seen that we shall probably lose several hundred subscribers by the present troubles in Canada. We hope that some of our friends in this State, who now take no paper, will be prevailed on to step forward, and take the places that will be vacated by our Canadian brethren. A. B. G.

BANK NOTES.

Our agents and subscribers, in making remittances, will please send us New-York State notes, if possible. If not, we prefer good eastern notes as next best with us; but will take good notes of Pennsylvania, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Maryland, Delaware, Indiana, Kentucky, Illinois, Ohio, and the regularly chartered banks in Detroit, Michigan. We shall have to pay a discount on most of these foreign notes, but would rather have them, than have our subscribers delay their payments.

☞ Those sending us money for other periodicals, must send current money. We can not afford to pay discount on money for the privilege of doing business for others. G. and H.

Br. Rogers—Some time in April last, you were requested to send the Pro and Con, from commencement, to Amos F. Woodbury, West Winfield, Herkimer county. He has received but two numbers, the 7th and 8th. This is the third time we have given notice that the work is not received. Will Br. Rogers please attend to it, as Br. Woodbury is anxious to have all the numbers. We are informed by Br. G. W. Montgomery, that he does not receive Pro and Con. Send Pro and Con from commencement, to Lorenzo A. Phinney, Cazenovia, Madison county, N. Y., and charge $1 to G. and H.

To DISCONTINUERS.—If any are determined to discontinue, and can not or will not get another to take their place let them see 1st, That their account with us is fully paid—2d, That notice is given to us before the close of the present volume. In neglecting either case, as they will see by looking at our terms, they render themselves liable, in honor, in morality, and in law for the subscription of the next volume. We have no desire to force our paper on them; but it is very unjust and burdensome to us, to delay a notice of discontinuance until after a new volume has been commenced, and files of the paper have been broken by sending them several numbers thereof, thus taxing us with a considerable loss, unless we compel the discontinuers to abide by our terms. A word to the wise, etc. A. B. G.

THE LADY'S BOOK.

There is no agent in this city for this excellent monthly—but if any of our friends or neighbors wish to procure the next or present volume, and will give us their names and subscriptions (three dollars), before the middle of December next, we will see that they get the work. It is edited by Mrs. S. J. Hale and Miss Leslie, whose names are a guaranty for the excellence of the work, and its worthiness of female patronage. Its tales and essays are of a pure and high order, and are calculated to amend the manners, improve the heart, and instruct the mind, while they amuse the fancy. A. B. G.

UNIVERSALIST UNION.

Two numbers of the Quarto, and one of the Octavo edition of the new volume of this beautiful and interesting periodical have been received and read with much pleasure. They are filled with articles mostly original, the selections are in excellent taste, and the whole contents evince a high order of talent in the Editors and contributors. We hope a brighter day is dawning on its proprietor, and beaming forth from his pages on his numerous readers. May the Union go on prospering, and to prosper the holy cause to which it is devoted.

A. B. G.

THE KNICKERBOCKER

For November would have been noticed earlier, but for want of time to read it. This is certainly a very superior Magazine, and this number out-Knickerbockers, even, many of the previous excellent numbers. We have not room to particularize, where nearly every article is so well calculated to elicit heartfelt praise. We will publish the contents in our next.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in December, by Br. C. S. BROWN, in Vestal.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in December, by Br. C. S. BROWN, in Bainbridge, and in the evening in the Kirby settlement.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper

G E P, Kanawha, C H, (Va) for self and A W Q—J A R, Schenectady—P M, Meig's Creek, (O)—C L, Attica, for C D, C D E, and S J. ☞ Where does the letter take his paper?—P M, Knowlesville—E C, Lockport—Rev W Q, Bristol, for J P, E C, W W M, F M, Z W G, Z P, C S, D S, J A, R H and R S—P M, Holland, (Mass) for J T—T W C, Cincinatus—P M, Borodino, (Mich) for self, W L, A B and H F—F J W, Schenectady, for self and S E—P M, Portageville, for M W—E G, Elmira—E H C, Palmyra.

POETRY

[From the Universalists Union.]

THE VOICE OF FREE GRACE.

A new hymn adapted to an old piece of Music.

The voice of free grace, from the Lord's holy mountain,
Inviteth our race to the life-giving fountain.
The fountain that burseteth, becometh a river,
And he who now thirsteth, may drink and thirst never;
For freely it floweth, and floweth forever.

Still soundeth the voice.—'tis the voice of the Saviour,
That biddeth rejoice in his full and free favor.
The might of his spirit from sin shall deliver,
And man shall inherit his blessing forever,—
The fountain of mercy in him faileth never.

We'll love him the more when life's journey is over;
For then we the more of his grace shall discover.
In God's holy mountain, where light shineth ever,—
Where burseth the fountain whose stream faileth never,—
All nations, all kindreds, shall praise him forever.

A. C. T.

MARRIAGES.

In Elbridge, Onondaga county, November 14th, by Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Mr. GEORGE A. MASON, of Jordan, to Miss AMY E. BROWN, of Elbridge.

In this city, on the 18th inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. WM. H. MANDEVILLE, to Miss MARY A. HOLLEM, both of Orange, Essex county, N. J.

DEATHS.

In the city of New-York, on the evening of the 27th October, Colonel CORNELIUS HARSEN, aged 55 years, after a long and painful sickness.

It seldom falls to our lot to record an event which will be more generally felt by the denomination of Universalists, than the decease of Br. Harsen. For many years he has taken an active and prominent part in every measure connected with the interests of our cause; and by the Third Universalist church in particular, of which he was an Elder, his loss will be deeply felt. He was one of the very small number who first undertook the establishment of a Society in this part of the city, and it is to his exertions and assistance that it is much indebted for the stand which it now occupies.

While as a society and church we mourn the loss of our brother, and mingle our tears with his bereaved family, there is much to console us in the afflicting dispensation. As our brother had lived in the faith of universal salvation, so it was his happiness to die in its consolation. He afforded an eminent example, if any more were needed, that such a belief is fully equal to all the exigences of life, as also, in the hour of death. He marked the progress which disease was making on him, and contemplated the issue with the composure and resignation of a Christian. When ever he had sufficient strength to speak, his conversation was made up of the happiness, peace and joy which his views of the divine government inspired. The words of his mouth and the meditation of his heart were devoted to his praise who was his strength and his Redeemer. In the last conversation which the writer had with him, he expressed how he was sustained in all his sufferings by the blessed influence of his faith, and appropriated to his case the experience of the apostle, "though the outward man perish, the inward man is renewed day by day." In his addresses to his wife and children he always directed them to his hope and trust in God, and told them that it was assurance he felt that he should meet them in a holier and happier state together with the ransomed family of mankind, was the rich source from which he drew consolation and support in the prospect of parting from them.

He has now left us, that he might go to his rest. We feel that we have lost a valuable member, a faithful brother; a widow mourns for an affectionate husband, and a large family of children for a kind and indulgent parent. May a merciful God dispense to each accordingly according to his need, and may we live in the enjoyment of the same blessed faith, that when our work shall be finished on earth and the summons arrives to call us hence, our latter end may be as peaceful and calm as his.

C. F. L. F.

In Champion, Jefferson county, on the 28th ult., Mr. O. V. CONE, in the 25th year of his age. Mr. C. was industrious, amiable and intelligent. He inherited what he had well earned,—a good name. His sickness, (that dread destroyer, consumption,) was endured with becoming patience; and, although he had espoused no religious creed, he expressed a willingness to die, and with his dying breath, said, "I put my trust in God."

J. FRENCH.

In Upper Lisle, October 27th, Mr. JAMES GRAHAM, aged 58 years. In his death, community has lost a kind neighbor, and an honest man. In his religious views, it was his conviction, that after the resurrection to immortality, man would be free from the corruptions of earth, and be like unto the angels in heaven. Sermon by C. S. B.

At Triangle, October 1st, SHORT WHITNEY, aged 12 years. May the consolations of the Gospel, comfort the afflicted. Sermon by C. S. B.

TO THE PATRONS OF THE EXPOSITOR AND REVIEW.

As the current volume of this work is nearly at its close, the Publishing Committee request me to express our gratitude for the liberal subscription received the year past, and also to give a few seasonable notices in relation to the ensuing volume; the first No. of which will appear in the beginning of January next.

1. The size, paper, type, mechanical execution, terms, etc., of the next volume, will be the same as those of the present.

2. From encouragement given by several writers, and from other favorable circumstances, I feel safe in promising that additional talent will be employed, and that an improvement will be made in the literary style of the work. We hope to approach still nearer towards our object, which is, to fill our Numbers with thorough and finished Essays, to the exclusion of every thing that falls below that character.

3. All who intend to subscribe for the work within the coming year, are earnestly requested to send us notice by the 7th of December next; that we may determine the number of copies to be struck off. We do not intend that the edition shall much exceed the subscription.

4. If any of our present subscribers intend to withdraw their names at the close of this volume (which we hope they will not do,) they are requested to send notice immediately; as all such, who do not apprize us to the contrary, by the 7th of December, will be considered subscribers for another year.

Subscriptions, communications, etc., to be directed (post paid.) to G. W. Bazin, Trumpet office, Boston.

Medford, October 24, 1838. HOSEA BALLOU, 2d.

☞Publishers of our periodicals will confer a favor by giving this an insertion.

PROPOSALS

For Publishing in the City of Utica, N. Y., Volume Ten, (for 1839,) of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.

G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

The extensive circulation and well established character of this periodical, render many words unnecessary in this place. We shall make such improvements in the next volume, as our increased experience (and, we hope, increased means) may enable us to make. The Editor has disengaged himself from all stated engagements, for the purpose of devoting his whole time to our publications, and making all practicable improvements in their manner and matter. Increased typographical beauty and correctness will be secured, and exertions made to induce our numerous and able correspondents to cull their best thoughts, and to tax their energies on the most interesting subjects, that the Magazine and Advocate may be a credit to them, and an honor to the denomination.

The great and glorious doctrine of "the restitution of all things," will be advocated, defended, and illustrated, as zealously as ever, in all its doctrinal and practical bearings and tendencies. In manner we will endeavor to be mild and courteous, and in spirit, candid and charitable, to friends and opposers—the style will be pure and elevated, and withal as plain and familiar as the different characteristics of writers employed, and the various subjects discussed, will permit. We shall blame frankly, where we must, and praise candidly where we can, in all Christian humility and truth.

The difficulties of the two years, last past, have borne heavily on us—cramped our energies and crippled our means—pressed many faithful patrons from our support, and compelled us to strike off some, on whose payments we waited long and in vain. But as times are improving, may we not hope, that not only will those in arrears, honestly and speedily release us from pecuniary distress, but, also, that our list will again be increased to what it was at the beginning of 1838? We beseech delinquents to pay us speedily, and our friends every where to make renewed exertions to aid us, by adding new subscribers to our list. May God abundantly reward them for what they have already done towards promoting a knowledge of truth and a practice of righteousness among men.—And may they continue to exert themselves, to secure to us our hard earned reward for past labors, and our needed amount of encouragement for the future.

GROSH AND HUTCHINSON,
Utica, October, 1838. PUBLISHERS AND PROPRIETORS.

CONDITIONS.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE will be published every Friday, commencing with January, 1839, on a royal sheet, good paper, and fair type, in a neat quarto form, each number containing eight pages, (the volume four hundred and sixteen,) including a complete Index at the close of the year, at $1.50 per annum, in advance; $2.00 if not paid within four months; and $2 50 if not paid within the year. Agents or Companies paying for EIGHT copies, will be allowed the NINTH COPY GRATIS; and so in proportion for any number over three. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money be paid in advance; and none discontinued until all arrearages are paid. Punctuality will be expected and required. A failure to notify a discontinuance before the close of one volume, will be considered as renewing subscription for the next.

AGENTS.—Universalist ministers in good standing, and RESPONSIBLE men, especially Postmasters, friendly to the work, and disposed to assist in extending its circulation and usefulness.

All communications to the Publishers or Editors, (unless they enclose at least a five dollar bill,) must be POST PAID OR FREE.

Names of new subscribers must be returned by the first of January, 1839, or as soon thereafter as possible, to the Proprietors.

UNIVERSALIST INSTITUTE, OHIO CITY.

The Fall term of this Institution commenced on Monday, the 24th of September, 1838, under the care of Alvan Dinsmore, as Principal. Terms of tuition are the following:

Common branches of Education,	$3.50 per quarter.
History, Rhetoric, Natural Philosophy, Logic and Astronomy,	$4.50 " "
Higher branches of Mathematics, Chemistry, and the Greek and Latin Languages,	$5.00 " "
French Language,	$6.00 " "

The following books will be used in the school:—American First Class Book, Smith's Geography, Adam's and Emerson's Arithmetics, Kirkham's Grammar, Tytler's History, Hale's History of the United States, Wilkin's Astronomy, Comstock's Philosophy and Chemistry, Hedge's Logic, Blair's Rhetoric, Day's Algebra, Legendre's Geometry, Flint's Surveying—Gould's Latin Grammar, Jacob's Latin Reader, Virgil, Sallust, Cicero's Select Orations, Horace, Livy, New Latin Tutor—Fisk's Greek Grammar, Jacob's Greek Reader, Xenophon's Anabasis, Greek Testament, Homer, Fisk's Greek Exercises, Græca Majora—Levizac's French Grammar, Boimer's Perrin's Fables, Telemaque, and Charles XII.

There will be a vacation of one week at the close of every quarter. Students will be received at any time and charged accordingly, though it is desired that all should commence with the terms.

Board will be obtained in private families as low as it can be had in the country.

JOHN H. SARGENT, Clerk,
WM. F. DENNIS, Treasurer.

TRUSTEES.

Richard Lord, James S. Clarke, Wm. F. Dennis, James Dodge, Bostwick O'Conner, Haynes Johnson, Asher M. Coe, James Hartness, Phila Rowley.

J. WHITNEY, General Agent.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1838. NUMBER 49.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 37.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

New-York, November 19, 1838.

DEAR SIR:—Your 34th letter, dated nearly three weeks after my 33d was mailed for you, and mailed to me nearly three weeks after its date, reached me in ten days after it was mailed, making nearly eight weeks for me to get an answer, after you had agreed to "furnish me with a letter in manuscript by each mail," so that the discussion could be all written out before I should leave for the South! Your 36th letter, which you knew I must have before I could answer it, reached me in this city, via Utica, (from whence it was forwarded immediately on its reception there,) today, the 19th inst. You seem fully determined to prevent the possibility of closing the discussion the present year, because, forsooth, it would oblige me! I shall now proceed to answer these long delayed letters, 34 and 36.

2. In order to lay before our readers the connected and uninterrupted arguments in favor of my fourth proposition, I informed you, letter 25, that I should proceed with that object for two or three letters before replying to aught that you might say. I fulfilled that pledge, and you now accuse me, Letter 34, paragraph 1, of doing it in order to throw myself so much in the rear as to screen my imbecility from the view of the reader! You had once before accused me of not daring to publish a single letter from you without accompanying it in the same paper, with my reply! Most admirable consistency!! Need I reply to such grumbling puerility? This letter answers all you have yet written, however far you thought to have outstripped me.

3. You next accuse me of denying the history of satan as given in the Bible. The charge is utterly truthless. I devoutly believe in all the Bible says of satan, devil, etc. I only reject your wild and baseless chimeras about satan, founded only in Heathenism, tradition and the perversion of a few metaphorical expressions of Scripture. You charge me with skepticism and infidelity, and class me with known and avowed infidels. Sir, Paine, Hume, and Voltaire were Deists, if I mistake not, though I am not as familiar with them as you appear to be. They believed in a God—you believe in the same; therefore you are a Deist by the same rule by which you condemn me! An Atheist believes Martin Van Buren the most suitable person for the office of U. S. President, or, he believes Henry Clay or Daniel Webster would be more suitable; you agree with him on this subject, therefore you are an Atheist! Fie, fie, friend Campbell, on such reasoning! Because an infidel is wrong in rejecting the Gospel, can he therefore hold no truth!—believe in nothing reasonable?

4. Sir, so far from being driven by you, as you seem to imagine, to avow my present opinion of satan, the devil and his angels, etc., I published my views thereon more than eight years ago, in a series of letters to Rev. S. C. Aikin. A second edition of that work was published in 1833, and at least 6000 copies of those letters have been circulated in the United States. To that work I refer you and our readers, both for a refutation of your present charge, and a more full exhibition of my views than I can here give. The word satan signifies opponent. We read Num. xxii: 22, "The angel of the Lord stood in the way for an adversary (a satan, in Hebrew) against him," [Balaam.] Here it seems was one good satan, not a bad one, nor a fallen angel. The word devil [Greek diabolos] signifies a slanderer, an enemy. It is often applied to individual men, and even to women, (see it applied to the deacons' wives, 1 Tim. iii: 11,) sometimes to communities or bodies of men, (as to the Jews, who slandered and persecuted the disciples,) and sometimes it personifies lust, or the principle of evil. Peter was called a satan, and Judas was called a devil. The words daimon and daimonion, translated devil, signify lunacy, epilepsy, or some other mental or bodily disease, once applied to dumbness. See Matt. xviii: 15; Luke xi: 14. These kinds of devils of antiquity, resembled the witchcraft of Salem, Mass., in the days of Cotton Mather, and had just as much personality about them and no more. Both kinds of devils were spoken of in Palestine among the Jews, just as the people of Massachusetts spoke of witches, wizzards and witchcraft, when they were in vogue. And had any one the rashness to avow his disbelief that these supposed witches and wizzards were really under the influence of some personal devil at that time, his temerity would probably have cost him his life.

5. But, Sir, I avow it as my solemn, deliberate and conscientious opinion, that the Bible contains no evidence of the real personal existence of a being called the devil, any more than it does of a real personal being called Wisdom, which is personified by Solomon, and represented as a female, a lady, "uttering her voice in the streets,—crying in the openings of the gates," etc. Where, Sir, is your evidence of the personal existence of such a being, or if he exist, that he was once an angel of purity in heaven? You have none but tradition.

6. In answer to your 4th paragraph, I again repeat, that Solomon said nothing about the world of spirits in Eccl. ix: 10. If he did, and is to be believed, the world of spirits is a state of unconsciousness, and can neither be happy nor miserable. The word hades here simply means the grave, and has no has no bearing on the future existence or condition of spirits. You say, paragraph 5, I "have annihilated satan to get rid of hell," and "made foolish the death of Christ, to obviate both punishment and pardon!" Another false charge: for I believe in all the satans and hells, and just such ones as the Bible speaks of; and you knew I believed both in punishment and pardon, while you do not, but are obliged to reject one to make room for the other. Your perverseness is truly astonishing. In your very next paragraph, you say, my "hope of heaven" is founded on the belief that there "is no satan, no devil, no hell!" Sir, suppose there were none—would this prove the existence of a heaven? You know it would not; and you knew you were perversely wicked when you penned the charge. You next introduce a common infidel pun to get rid of meeting the strength of Calvinistic and Arminian Universalism. What a faithful disciple, and what a brave soldier!

7. Your 11th, 12th and 13th paragraphs, are too obvious and ridiculous a carricature to deserve any notice, excepting the sentence in which you state that the object of your 28th letter was "to show that the ultimate destiny of the wicked shall not be as the righteous." If such was your object, you wholly failed in your proof; for not one of the passages you quoted says one syllable about the ultimate destiny of the wicked. You are too prone to apply temporary judgments, to express the ultimate destiny of their subjects. I have proved the ultimate destiny of all men to be salvation through Christ Jesus the Saviour of the world. I have never, as you accuse me, quoted the Apocrypha in proof of my sentiments, and but one text in illustration; while you have not only resorted to the Apocrypha, but even to the Targums. You say, "Remember, Mr. Skinner, that we all die because our father stole an apple." I remember, Sir, that the Bible says no such thing. Read Luke xii: 47, 48, and blot out your 14th paragraph forever!

8. The much talked of "Universalist dogma," often commented on by you, and quoted by me, letter 13, paragraph 7, fully refutes your 15th paragraph, and shows it to be a mere carricatnre. Your 16th, 17th, and 18th, are of the same perverse character. It is useless to repel and disclaim, again, and again, and yet again, the scores of false charges you bring against me. If you wish to continue the game of carricature and ridicule, I might inform you that two can play at it as well as one; and your own weapons could be turned against you with tenfold power. But I despise that game that only excites for it the regret of sober minds and the contempt and ridicule of infidels. Indeed, Sir, the bona fida features of your system are altogether more abhorrent than the misshapen carricature of mine, which you play upon. For at the very worst, mine only embraces a limited, temporary and remedial evil, resulting in universal good, while yours embraces an illimitable and endless evil, resulting in no possible good, and that too, foreordained in the eternal counsels of God! Suppose by caricature and sarcasm, you could make me or any private opinion of mine, entirely unconnected with either of our propositions, appear ever so ridiculous, would that refute my yet unanswered arguments, or help you out of the strong ramparts of Universalism with which you are completely environed? Have you the presumption to believe that you or I can save immortal souls from endless wo, and give them endless bliss? What folly! you or I may by our influence, affect the temporary characters and well-being of our fellow-men; but I rejoice in believing their eternal destinies are in safer hands.

9. The apostle says, and I say, and you repeat, that "perfect love casts out tormenting fear." It is obvious too, that tormenting fear never produces perfect love. Why, then, leave perfect love untouched, untold, and seek to reform men by tormenting fear alone? I urge all the motives of fear that the Bible does. My system, Sir, presents as much stronger restraints against vice, in the certain punishments it holds up against every sin, and as much purer motives to virtue, in the lovely character of God, and the endless purity and beatitude it holds up, than yours does, as heaven is purer and better than hell. The grace of God manifested in Christ, in which I devoutly believe, has converted thousands from Belial to Christ—from sin to holiness—from vice to virtue. But where are the converts made by the preaching of endless wo—your hell-fire converts? Answer, they are either hypocritical pretenders that fear hell, not love God, or else are driven to open infidelity and the abhorence of the very name of religion.

10. To your 9th and 10th paragraphs, I can reply in few words. Paul says, "Jesus expiated or purged away our sins:" Mr. Campbell says, sin shall never be expatiated or purged away. John says, "We love him because he first loved us:" Mr. Campbell says, We love him for fear he will hate us if we don't. David says, "Unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy; for thou renderest to every man according to his work:" Mr. Campbell says, if God render to all according to their works, he can not exercise any mercy towards them. Paul says, "he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, and there is no respect of persons." Mr. Campbell says, there is great respect of persons; for some shall receive, and others shall not receive according to the wrong they have done, so as to make room for the pardon of a few. Paul says, "How shall we escape [from the coming calamities of Jerusalem] if we neglect so great salvation?" Mr. Campbell says, how shall we escape [from an endless hell] if we neglect so little salvation?—Christ says, "The night cometh," etc. Mr. Campbell says, death and hades cometh. Christ says, "They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." Mr. Campbell thinks the heavenly Physician will cure the whole only, and make the sick still sicker. He thinks he has but one kind of medicine, and can not vary his prescriptions to suit different cases—that it would be monstrous absurdity to think sweet medicines could cure one patient, and bitter another, or that judgments and mercies could alike be made efficacious by the divine Physician.

11. You fill nearly two pages with L. C. Todd's second renunciation of Universalism in 1833, (for recollect he had once before renounced the doctrine). You consider it a triumphant argument against Universalism. You say he is good authority.—Sir, did you ever know a traitor speak well of the company he abandoned? You say that I "most shamefully abused him because of his honesty." Sir, I appeal to the whole world, including Mr. T. himself, when I affirm that I never abused him, either for his honesty or any thing else. I published the whole of his renunciation in my paper of August 10, 1833, accompanied with some mild strictures and remarks, breathing altogether a kinder spirit than either of your letters to me has for months past. That was the only article I ever wrote about him. To that I appeal. God knows I never had an unkind feeling towards, or wish to injure him. But if he is good authority against us, then all who have renounced your doctrine and embraced Universalism, are equally good against you. L. C. Todd's venerable and worthy father, was once a Baptist preacher, like yourself; but he renounced the barbarous notion of endless damnation, and embraced the doctrine of universal salvation, and will now testify as unfavorably against your doctrine, as his recreant son does against ours. Moreover, we have at least ten converts from your doctrine where you have one from ours, and by your own rule, we have ten times as much evidence against you as you have against us.

12. If I am rightly informed, Mr. Todd as deeply regrets his renunciation of Universalism, and the course he pursued in that matter, as a man can do—he has stopped preaching, abandoned the Methodists, and it is believed that nothing but pride and mortification prevents him from returning to us. If you wish for any more articles of a like character, I suppose I can furnish you with one or two more Universalist renunciations, to enable you to fill out your other two letters.

13. I now hasten to notice your letter No. 36. It is made up of vain efforts to garnish a desperate cause in its last struggles for existence, to reiterate threadbare gasconade and caricature, and to evade arguments which you are now obviously convinced you can not refute. It reminds one of the croaking of frogs when afflicted with cold, of the grating sounds of a musical instrument sadly out of tune, of the faint and evanescent glimmerings of expiring embers. Your first four paragraphs give a wretched analysis of my 35th letter, without an effort to refute it. But truly, it is news to me that my rule for explaining the phrases, all, all men, etc., is also your own rule! Let this fact be remembered, and let the reader just turn to letter 35, paragraph 5, and see what doctrine is there proved.

14. I neither stultify Adam Clarke nor quote him on the Apocalypse with less approbation than on other books. Will you tell our readers in what paragraph I have said, "all sorrow, crying and tears have ceased ages before we were born"?—You say you argue "that such words as elect, saved, condemned, etc., always imply another class of men who are not approved, justified, saved, etc." Well, do you argue that none but those called "the elect" will ever be saved?—that when God says he will have all men to be saved," it is implied he will have another class to be damned?—that when Paul says, "the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life," it is implied that another class should receive condemnation to endless misery?

15. You call it a "calumny" to mention Destructionists as your brethren! Take care, or your brothers Thomas and Shepard will be in your hair. You say Destructionism "is indeed less revolting to sinners [should you not have added, to saints and all good beings?] than endless misery."—You say my 13th paragraph is "a beggarly account of empty boxes." Most true! I handed you the box and asked you to contribute a reason for the well known fact that the early Fathers, who were known advocates of universal restoration, spoke, notwithstanding, frequently of ever [age] lasting punishment. You return the box empty—and can give no reason!! I have replied to all your letters and more than all your arguments.

16. You decline, as I expected, giving your own Notes from the Family Testament, to your readers. You dare not do it! You know they refute your positions in this discussion. Hundreds of your readers have never seen them. They will, they must know your motives. What a predicament! Your 6th paragraph is a lament because you could not prevail on me to acknowledge all your caricatures to be true representations of my sentiments. Still, you half repeat, though with a faint heart, in this and your 10th paragraphs, the same miserable caricatures. Your 7th paragraph is another vain effort to maintain the old serpent's doctrine, that God will not "render to every man according to his work," and to set aside the Psalmist's doctrine, that he will. Ps. xviii: 25, 26, so far from explaining away Ps. lxii: 12, is but a confirmation of it, and another refutation of the doctrine of the deceiver. On both of them I remark, that if God "render to every man according to his work," and your doctrine be true that every sin deserves endless damnation, then universal endless damnation must be the portion of our race! Again, God says, Amos iii: 1, 2—"Hear this word that the Lord hath spoken against you, O children of Israel, against the whole family which I brought up from the land of Egypt, saying, You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore, I will punish you for all your iniquities." Of course, if your notion of the deserts of sin be true, not a soul of the children of Israel down to the days of Amos, can escape an endless hell!

17. You still talk, paragraphs 7, 8, 18, 19, of justice and mercy, as though they were jarring and discordant attributes in the divine character, and as though, to maintain the justice of God, I am obliged to deny his mercy and the doctrine of pardon and the forgiveness of sin; whereas, I as fully believe in the latter as you can, and am not, like you, obliged to deny the former.—See Letter 25, and Letter 35, paragraph 23. God "is a just God and a Saviour." He both punishes and forgives sin in the same individuals.—See Ps. xcix: 8; lxii: 12. His ways and thoughts are as far above ours, as the heavens are above the earth.—If you can find a single text that speaks of God's forgiving the punishment of sin, why do you not adduce it? There is none. You will have punishment exclude forgiveness, justice annihilate mercy, penitentiaries to confine criminals after sin is finished and an end made of transgression, and gibbets to hang folks on after there shall cease to be any murderers! Your little hypercriticism on the accidental omission of a letter in writing or printing aphiemi, is greatly to your credit!

18. The six texts referred to in my last, and quoted in previous letters, on four of which you profess to comment, paragraphs 14-17, are no stronger in favor of Universalism, than scores of others quoted in letters 23, 25, 27, and 29, which, with my comments thereon, yet remain unanswered. Your comments on these four are but a ruse de guerre which will prove wholly unavailing to your cause. Look at the plain language and obvious meaning of Ps. xxii: 27—"All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee." This language implies, first, every individual of the human family, unless you can find some one who is neither of any nation, nor a kindred or relative of any nation; and if you can find any such, you may have them eternally damned, if you please! Second, That, as yet, they had not remembered or turned unto the Lord and worshipped before him. Third, That all certainly should do it. Fourth, That remembering, turning to the Lord and worshipping before him, is equivalent to hearty reconciliation to him, and consequently implies salvation. And, fifth, The next verse assigns the reason for all this, viz.—"For the kingdom is the LORD'S, and he is the Governor among the nations."

19. On Ps. cxlv; 9, I ask, If God knew that any soul would be endlessly miserable when he gave it existence, was he good in giving an existence which he knew and intended should prove an endless curse? If this is goodness, what would be evil? If this is benevolence, what would be malevolence? How is God good to those he intends to make endlessly miserable? If not endlessly miserable, (as they can not be if this text be true,) they will be ultimately happy: for we both reject annihilation. If God be now good to all, he eternally will be. Isa. xlv: 22-24, not only asserts, on the oath of God, that every knee shall bow and every tongue swear, but tells us what they shall swear, viz., that in the Lord they have righteousness and strength, and this, Sir, is sufficient salvation for me. Paul not only reiterates the sentiment that every knee shall bow and every tongue confess, that Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father, but also assures us, that no man can make this confession but by the Holy Ghost; consequently, the divine spirit must then dwell and operate in the heart.—See Philip. ii: 10, 11; 1 Cor. xii: 3.

20. 1 Cor. xv, proves something more than the mere resurrection of all men. It proves the manner and character of the resurrection and its subjects—that they shall be raised in incorruption, glory, power, with spiritual and celestial bodies, which can die no more—that death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed, the reconciled kingdom delivered up to God the Father, and God shall be all in all.—See the whole chapter. Paul not only teaches these great truths here, and that all shall be made alive in Christ, but in 2 Cor. v: 17, he says, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold all things are become new." Thus, Sir, the more these texts are examined, the more clearly are they seen to teach the salvation of all men. You suppose, paragraph 18, because God sometimes superadds outward calamities to mental anguish and remorse of conscience, as a punishment for sin, that therefore the latter are no punishment at all! Was the remorse of David, of Joseph's brethren, of the Prodigal, of Judas for betraying Christ, and of Peter for denying him, no punishment? What a theologian! The last part of your 18th paragraph, is evidently better calculated to serve the cause of Destructionism than endless misery. To make Rom. vi: 23, subserve your cause, it must read, "the wages of sin is endless damnation, and the gift of God is not eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." I prefer the apostle's reading to yours.

21. I will now present our readers with a few of the sublime beauties and glories of your system. You first people your heaven of immortal purity and glory, with a race of ambitious, sinful, and rebellious angels, who, growing tired of such a paradise and such a government, mutiny against their Sovereign King, raise a rebellion, where no discord or sin can ever exist, and after a long and bloodless fight, (because the combattants are immortal.) are hurled from heaven's high battlements, down to the shades of endless darkness and despair, and bound in chains of adamantine wo and endless pain. To console himself for this loss in heaven, your Divinity next creates an earthly paradise, and peoples it with human beings, all innocent and pure; but lest they should remain so, he places an apple-tree loaded with inviting fruit before them, and inhibits their partaking thereof, although he knew they would disobey, and the consequence be infinite wo. He next unchains his demons of darkness, whilom his companions in glory, (or else they have escaped without his knowledge or consent,) to make sure of the ruin of man, who succeed in seducing the first human pair from purity and bliss.

22. Your Divinity next gets mad at Adam and Eve, for doing just what he knew, and ordained, and provided means, that they should do, and pronounces the malediction of endless damnation on them and all their innocent, unborn, and unoffending offspring, down to the latest posterity. He, however, soon began to relent somewhat of the severity of this dreadful malediction, and although he had unequivocally threatened it, and the chief fallen fiend had told Eve it would never be inflicted, he concluded to verify Satan's words and falsify his own! So he set about a plan with the least possible appearance of falsifying his own word. He pretended that his justice was wronged, and he must either inflict the threatened penalty on man, or on some substitute; so he shapes himself over into a human form, calls himself his own son, and is the Father of himself! Then he inflicts the whole weight of his own almighty wrath upon the head of his innocent son, and lets the rebel sinner go unpunished, and this is his justice! Nay, not exactly so—he inflicts the penalty on himself! for the son was but himself under a different name!! His justice can not relinquish one iota of the infinite debt recorded against the sinner man, and so he himself pays the debt to himself which himself demands!! And after all, the debt is not paid, nor is justice any more satisfied than before; the whole of this bloody exhibition of infinite wrath, cruelty, and injustice, is but a tragic pageant—the ill fated rebel still owes the infinite debt—not one iota of it has been cancelled—infinite wrath still hangs over his head, and endless wo still awaits him!!

> "Far in the deep where darkness dwells,
> The land of horror and despair,
> Justice has built a dismal hell,
> And laid her stores of vengeance there!
> Eternal plagues and heavy chains,
> Tormenting racks and fiery coals,
> And darts t'inflict immortal pains,
> Dipt in the blood of damned souls."

23. Your Divinity is so well pleased with rebellion, that though he has the power, he determines never to put a period to it, but to prolong it to all eternity! He likes sin so well, that he resolves it shall never cease, but be perpetuated as long as he himself shall exist. He sets his jarring attributes at war with each other. His justice, which with you is synonymous with revenge, would fain consign the whole human family to endless damnation; his mercy, which with you has no regard to the claims of justice, would fain send them all to heaven. He, therefore, like the false mother under Solomon, calls for the sword to divide the living child, (the human family,) and send one part to heaven to laugh and shoutingly exult there over the other part, no more sinful than themselves, while howling in the endless torments of hell! As you doubtless expect you shall be one of the laughing company, and as you say a majority of mankind that hear your Gospel reject it, and thereby enhance their endless wretchedness, this accounts for your zeal in propagating your Gospel, so as to get as many to hell as possible, over whom you expect to exult to all eternity!—You send the little child of three years old, which has never committed but one fault in all its life, and that a venial one, to an endless hell, to wail in hopeless and irremediable anguish forever; and exalt the grey-headed sinner of four-score years, whose long life of the most flagrant crimes of theft, robbery, arson, and murder, has been wholly devoted to crime, to an endless heaven, without any punishment here or hereafter, if he repents ten minutes before he dies!

24. Although you say that for aught that appears in your premises, nine-tenths of human kind may be saved, yet you say a majority of the world, as yet, have died unbelievers—yea, that a majority even of those who have heard the Gospel, have rejected it; and we know that but a very small portion of mankind have ever heard it at all. Therefore your construction of the text, "He that believeth not shall be damned," compels you to send all infants, from the first to the last of Adam's race, to an endless hell; for not one of them either has or could believe, in this life. All idiots must share the same fate for the same reason. The whole Heathen world must go the same road; all Mahommedans, and all Jews, (except the very few believers in Christianity,) all infidels, and a majority of those who live in Christian lands—nearly or quite all Papists—in short, all but the few who believe in your own orthodoxy, and are baptized in your mode, including at least nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand out of every million of the human family, from the morning of time to the present moment, must sink down in billows of almighty wrath, and wail and shriek in hopeless despair, while ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands of years and of ages shall slowly, s-l-o-w-l-y roll away, and still their sufferings will be but just beginning to begin! Eternity. ETERNITY, E-T-E-R N-I-T-Y of misery is still before them!! And all this inconceivable misery and anguish is—for what? Cui bono? Why, for nothing in creation but to glut the vindictive wrath and satiate the merciless cruelty of an almighty tyrant, and to please the few choice spirits in your almost empty heaven, and give them supreme felicity in beholding the endless rebellion and ceaseless woes of their fellow beings whom they are required to love as themselves! O my God! what a theory is this! and what a heart and head must that man have, who, like you, can swallow down the whole!! Why, Sir, Mahommedanism, or Heathenism itself, is beauty and consistency, when compared with those parts of your system above exhibited. But I forbear—though I might fill many pages with such revolting but true descriptions of your doctrine—in mercy to you and your friends I forbear, and hope the lesson will not be lost upon you.

Faithfully yours,
D. SKINNER.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

RELIGIOUS ERROR—ITS TENDENCIES AND REMOVAL.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

Religious error has long proved an uncomfortable and troublesome companion of human beings. It has arbitrarily drawn the sable veil of ignorance over the mind of man, filled the heart with cruel prejudice, and sunk the soul in grief, despondency and wretchedness. It has perverted the original nature of man, engendered in his breast the destructive spirit of party zeal and malevolence, and blunted all the finest and most noble sensibilities of its willingly-oppressed subjects. It has wantonly trampled upon the valuable dictates of pure morality, while it has rashly abused and reviled the holy principles of genuine religion. Yes, it draws its aliment from the caverns of destruction, and its highest gratification from groans and tears! Who will venture to dispute the correctness of this faint and brief description of error's doings? The history of the religious world, our own observation, and the infallible testimony of inspired men prove it, most conclusively.

But there is a consideration relating to this subject, of far greater importance to the present generation, than a contemplation of error's devastating and withering tendencies; and that is, how to effect its removal. The facts will not be disproved, that it is the deformed and refractory offspring of human imperfection; and that its existence is temporary, not eternal. It can, therefore, be overcome and removed. But the momentous question returns, how? A few remarks will now be offered in answer to this question of universal interest.

1. Let men learn the utility of reasoning in their investigations of religious principles, as well as of their temporal matters. It has ever been the case, that men who would reason philosophically and logically, and arrive at just conclusions, upon almost any worldly subject, would immediately, when the subject of religion was introduced, prohibit the exercise of reason entirely; and, under the bewildering impulse of tradition, fanaticism, or a blind and reckless zeal for God, which was directly contrary to knowledge, flatly contradict every true principle of moral nature, truth, and consistency. But error has been their teacher, and they have proved themselves faithful pupils. They have been repeatedly assured, that reason was always carnal; that it never had any thing to do with religion, and should, therefore, be wholly discarded when religion came under consideration. And it is in this deceptive and dogmatical way, that error has so long and so generally triumphed, and the world suffered under its usurped and relentless dominion. Now, let reason be admitted to her rightful seat in the mind, and permit her to exercise her office, as well in religious investigations as in matters of minor importance, and the despotism of this monster of deception and darkness, will be materially weakened and exposed.

2. Let men learn to examine religious principles carefully and impartially, before they adopt or reject them. Under error's dictation and influence, men have generally been in the habit of adopting their religious theories prematurely, ignorantly, and blindly, and then of defending them with weapons dipped in the scalding lava of heartless bigotry and insatiable barbarity. Examination and careful investigation of religious sentiments, anterior to their reception and adoption, have too long and too generally been neglected, while error, with its black and ruthless progeny, has ingeniously profited by the neglect.

Let no religious sentiment, then, be patronized or embraced, without close and critical examination, whether it comes floating in assumed majesty on the broad current of popularity, or appears from the desert, clothed in frightful costume. Exercise, therefore, the noble faculty of reason, which God has kindly bestowed upon us, and by the bestowment of which, he has distinguished us as lords of this lower creation, and examine with sedulous and critical attention, every moral sentiment and proposition which may be presented for your acceptance. Let this course be generally pursued, and Gospel truth will soon prevail over religious error; superstition, fanaticism, persecution, and moral madness, will be superseded by mercy, mildness, and peace among mankind; contending sects will become united in one spirit of love and forbearance, while their numerous and contradictory creeds, which neither maker nor recipient have ever examined, investigated, or understood, will be consigned to the oblivion which they so richly merit, and human society wear a new and much more glorious aspect, than it ever has in all past time. May God hasten on the blessed period,

> When truth shall o'er the world extend its happy reign,
> And error's blood-stained banner fall, and fallen, there remain.

Let a man live but two or three years without affliction, and he is almost good for nothing; he can not pray, nor meditate, nor keep his heart fixed upon spiritual things; but let God smite him in his child, health, or estate, now he can find his tongue and affections again; now he awakes and falls to his duty in earnest: now God has twice as much honor from him as he had before.—"Now," saith God, "this amendment pleaseth me; this rod was well bestowed; I have disappointed him to his great benefit and advantage." And thus God is in friendship with his people again.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PUNISHMENT.

BY REV. S. MILES.

If the attentive or even superficial observers, will pause but for a moment, and turn aside from the common walks of life, and give the subject of punishment a passing examination, they will find a near resemblance between the penal codes and doctrines of civilized nations. They are twin sisters, in perfect resemblance of their original parents.

The great object of all punishments should be, the prevention of crimes, and the reformation of the criminal. Aside from this, the heart of the poor sufferer will become deeply imbued with the spirit of cruelty and revenge. He will come forth from the school of his masters, like a fiend of darkness, a wild savage of the forest, and a roaring lion from his den. When punishments are inflicted without mercy, or with a degree of severity beyond what is necessary to accomplish the reformation of the criminal; the example, the code, and the doctrine, which sanctions them, will become an engine of cruelty, a pattern of injustice, which, sooner or later, will be reacted upon, in the nation, country, or society, where such punishments are inflicted, such examples are set, and such doctrines are taught. The infliction of pain in body or mind, should not be extended to torture, in any degree whatever.

Let this be carefully observed in regard to the criminal, as well as the public, who stand as spectators, lest the horrible and degrading administration should have no other tendency than to harden both him and them. "I make no scruple to affirm," says the philanthropic Mr. Howard, who visited many countries and prisons, "that, if it were the aim and wish of magistrates to effect the destruction, present and future, of young delinquents, they could not desire a more effectual method than to confine them in our prisons." In confirmation of the truth of this remark, see the Hon. T. F. Buxton's "Inquiry, whether crime and misery are produced, or prevented, by our present system of prison discipline." The following administration of punishment will serve to show the effect of the code or doctrine, which dictates the same amount of punishment to few or many, great or small offences, against the laws of God or man. "In France, prior to the revolution, the punishment of robbery, either with or without murder, was the same; and hence it happened, that robbery was seldom or never perpetrated without murder." Is it not dangerous then, to hold out that doctrine to men, which teaches them that both the young and the old, the blooming youth, and the man of grey hairs, shall be consigned to the same awful prison in never-ending wo?

The law of Moses required an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, and life for life; but the doctrines of men require more; they require the endless punishment of the man or child, who is guilty of the least sin; hence we can not but conclude, that thousands have plunged into great and horrible wickedness, while under the influence of such laws, and such doctrines. For when men see no distinction made in the punishment of the wicked, they will be generally led to make no distinction in crime. If a sinner is just as liable to suffer endless punishment for a small crime, as he is for a large one, he may just as well venture to take "an old [illegible] as a lamb." He will risk no more in taking [illegible] thousands of wealth, than he will to pilfer a petty article of merchandize, or a single penny from his fellow-traveller.

Now, such laws, and such doctrines, can not but increase the number of criminals and offenders, in every part of the world where they are permitted to exist, and spread their unhappy influence.—This is most strikingly exemplified in the reign of Henry VIII, in the fifteenth century; an age of crime and punishment; which certainly did not arise from the mildness of the laws, or their administration. In that reign alone, which was but the space of 38 years, seventy-two thousand executions took place for robberies alone, exclusive of religious murders, which amounted to about 83 220 persons. Let this number be added to the above, and we have the total sum, of 153.220 souls, that were hurried into eternity by the defender of that cruel faith which consigns the spirits of men to remediless wo, for the smallest crime imaginable.

Poor Cain took the life of but one man. His brother perished at his hand, in the early dawn of mortal existence. Well, now suppose that Cain died, and sunk into the burning billows of a never-ending hell. And suppose, too, that Henry VIII, who slew his hundreds of thousands, has gone into the same fiery region, there to dwell with devils world without end. Poor Cain must have been very unfortunate to have been doomed to suffer more than 5500 years longer than the above monster in human form. If this is rewarding every man according to his deeds, how does it happen, that the God of justice should have threatened many stripes upon those who are the most guilty?

If it be positively certain that God will do as he says he will; then it is positively certain that "the wages of sin is death." "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." The wages of sin is as positively certain, as it is that God has said, "Wo to the wicked! it shall be ill with him;—for the reward of his hand shall be given him." Isa. iii: 11. Now, if endless punishment be as positively certain to the wicked, as it is that God will do as he says he will, in the above declarations, then all who have sinned must receive according to their deeds in endless wo, or God's word never declared that cruel doctrine.

If it is impossible for any being to suffer endless wo, in a shorter time than endless duration, then Christ, our Saviour, has not suffered the penalty of endless torments in our room and stead. Now, if God, who will not vary from his word, should exonerate both Christ and the sinner from the reward of his hands, which he says shall be given him, then it is not positively certain that God will do as he says he will.

It is therefore as positively certain that the cruel doctrine of endless wo is false and unfounded, as it is that God "will render to every man according to his deeds," and yet save all to whom the reward of their hands shall be given.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

REFLECTIONS.

BY J. M. ELWOOD.

After time has in some degree assuaged the intensity of anguish that rends the mourner's bosom, what emotions struggle in his mind, as he stands at the grave of the friend whose loss he deplores. With an effort of mind, he holds the past, the present, and the future. Heaving with sensations, thrilling and untold, his mind concentrates its energies on the heap of dust that moulders in the mound beside him. There, perhaps, is the faded blossom of his hope—the rose of his enjoyment. There, perhaps, lies the remains of that friend whose presence was his joy, and who faced with him the storms of adverse life—whose desires for his welfare could find a generous reciprocation in his own bosom—whose friendship was bounded by no motives of selfish policy—and whose sympathy in the moment of anguish, could mitigate its excess and allay its violence. Retrospection unlocks the storehouse of recollection, and paints the past with the vivid colors of reality. The playground, with its countless associations—the schoolroom, with its fancied perplexities, where they together lisped the rudiments of knowledge—the giddy circle, where the sprightliness and vivacity natural to earlier years, would enliven the feelings and dispel the momentary gloom which sometimes gathers upon the vitals of enjoyment, and cankers the heart of pleasure—break upon his mind, and it is overwhelmed by the rush of contending emotions. These happy scenes are past—have glided down the oblivious tide of time—and their recollection only adds poignancy to the sorrow of the grief-stricken soul. To the present he looks in vain for consolation; for before him lies the relics of his lamented friend, and no object, no circumstance that the present can afford, can console his desponding bosom, or revive his animation. To the future only can he look for consolation and comfort. The only ray that can penetrate the heart thus shrouded with gloom, is the radiant light gleaming from the Star of Hope. The effulgence of this isolated ray, kindles up the dark arena of the sorrowing soul, as Faith pours over it the flood-tide of its consolation, and bids its throbbings cease. The promises of the Gospel cheer his desponding spirit, and in anticipation he is united to his departed friend, in scenes where grief no more can mingle its bitter in the cup of happiness; where anguish and separation find no admittance, and where the intelligent universe of God shall be assembled in the bonds of charity and love.

But, alas! while he finds solace in these reflections, the *fool appears before him, and sagely tells him that the promises of God, and the Gospel, are the fabrications of designing men; that the Saviour was an impostor; that man is the production of chance, and that nought awaits him beyond the brief period of his terrestrial existence, but the darkness of the grave and the silence of oblivion! O atheism! O cursed spirit of pride! which, disdaining to acknowledge a Superior, would wrench the only remaining stay from the grasp of the aged sire, as he mourns the premature departure of an only son—would pluck the banner of hope from the couch of the dying, and place in its stead the dismal ensign of doubt and despair—would make the present existence a curse, and the future the dreary charnel of unconscious being! Talk not of delusion, of weakness, or of folly! Be it weakness—be it delusion!—it is a delusion which gives zest to life, and reality to enjoyment, and elevation to man. Yes, if it be a delusion, he who believes it, labors under a happy error, which shall never know correction, and which will cheer the hour of his dissolution, as he sinks into the dreamless sleep of death. Strive not, O atheist, to undeceive the pilgrim, if your faith is to be substituted for his; for it would be offering bitter for sweet; it would be presenting a cup of wormwood to his lips; it would be

> More cruel thus to mock his hope,
> And rob him of his faith,
> Than leave him on through life to grope,
> A slave, in error's chain.

Clinton, November, 1838.

---

*"The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;

FOR SUNDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1838.

1 JOHN II: 1-17.

During the remaining Sundays of this year, we are to be occupied in meditating upon some passages from the writings of the beloved disciple.—Those familiar with these writings, or whoever will read attentively this first epistle, will discover two striking peculiarities which belong to John. The most prominent of these is the depth and fervor of his piety and philanthropy; and next to it, is the artlessness of his discourse, and its utter want of connexion. We doubt not but that the apostle had some leading design in view; but we can not find any continuous train of reasoning bearing upon that object, any logical series of propositions leading onwards to the ultimate conclusion. John seems to have written down his thoughts just as they occurred, in the manner of those unaccustomed to writing. As to the other peculiarity we mentioned—his glowing, ardent devotion—we are reminded of it in almost every other sentence of this epistle, and almost as frequently does the following historical trait of him recur to our recollection. It is related by Jerome, an early Christian Father, that when John was far advanced in years, he was too feeble to walk to the meetings. He still, however, attended, and was carried thither by his disciples. Being unable to say much, he repeat-

'ed continually these words:—"Little children, love one another." When he was asked why he always repeated these words alone, he replied, that such was the commandment of the Lord, and that it was quite sufficient if this was done.

Kindred with this devotion and charitable spirit, is that tender and affectionate method of address which occurs in the first verse of this paragraph, and frequently throughout the epistle. "My little children," or "my dear children," is an affectionate, endearing appellation, denoting, as Dr. Lardner has observed, paternal authority, love, and concern, which in the character of an apostle, John might have used in any period of his life; but which, in this epistle, seems to imply not only apostolical authority, but also advanced age.

As there is no strict continuity of thought in this paragraph, we may select for our meditation any portion. We pass over the former part of the paragraph, as it requires some knowledge of Jewish modes of thinking, and some acquaintance with certain errors and heresies which prevailed among the Gnostics, Nicolaitans, and other sects, at the time of John's writing this epistle.

In the 9th, 10th, and 11th verses of this chapter, we find a test by which John would try, and have others try, whether their knowledge of divine things was really true illumination or not. The sense of these three verses is as plain as it is important. It is this:—He who boasteth that he understands the teachings of the Great Luminary sent of God to dispel the darkness of Heathenism, and the twilight of Judaism, and yet entertains any malevolent feelings towards his brethren, or any one of them, that man remains in the very darkness from which he boasts his emancipation, being uninfluenced, unbenefited by the light and love which have shone from heaven. On the other hand, it is equally certain that whoever entertains benevolent, kindly, brotherly feelings towards his brethren, and manifests these in his conversation and conduct, has, indeed, come to the true knowledge and enjoyment of that light of which we have spoken. Furthermore, it may be affirmed of him who loveth his brother, that all things appear to him in such a new light, that there is little danger of his being led into those deceitful and forbidden paths, into, and along which those destitute of this true light, do continually stumble in their search after their "being's end and aim." The apostle, then, in the 11th verse, reiterates what he said in the 9th, adding this thought, that the darkness in which such a malevolent being walks, is so great that he can not see to what consequences, what results, his course is infallibly leading him. His understanding does not perceive any thing in its true light.

If we would ascertain how much of the true light of Christianity we have received, how much benefit we have obtained from the Sun of Righteousness, let us try ourselves by this test of the apostle John. We may be assured that it is quite an authoritative test, for it coincides with all the precepts and doctrines of Jesus, and is virtually the same with that which Jesus represents as testing relationship with him, in the 25th chapter of Matthew. P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ANCIENT UNIVERSALISTS.

Many of our Partialist friends affect to be astonished and struck with amazement when told that the most eminent of the early Christian fathers believed and advocated the doctrine of the final restitution of all things. Alexander Campbell, that most notable imitator of Alexander the coppersmith, spoken of by the apostle Paul, has, as the readers of the Discussion are already aware, scouted in very insulting terms, at the idea, that the primitive Christians believed in that doctrine. The Christian Spectator, the well known organ of the New-Haven divines, uses, in a very bitter article against Universalism, the following language: "The doctrine that, in the revolutions of the eternity to come, a period will arrive when sin and suffering are to cease from the universe of God, is by no means an invention of modern times. It is not to be denied that as early as the third century, and perhaps even in the second, some Christian writers expressed, if not the decided opinion, at least the conjecture and the hope, that after many ages of future punishment, all the lost will finally be reconciled to God, and saved. By Origen, in the third century, the notion of a final and universal restoration seems to have been expressly argued for. By Clemens of Alexandria, in the second century, it seems to have been adopted as a principle of reasoning, that the end of punishment is always the reformation of the offender; and some of his expressions seem to imply a probability that the punishments in a future world may ultimately result in bringing all lost spirits to repentance. And few, probably, will be inclined to deny that from the days of Origen onward, the same sort of opinions may have been entertained in every age." So much for the Spectator. When we consider how very near the times of the apostles these great lights of the church lived, and the vast amount of evidence adduced by them from the writings of the apostles in support of final universal salvation, we can not resist the conviction, that Universalism was the very doctrine taught and promulgated by the apostles themselves, as the anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast. W. R.

Utica, November, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PRAYER.

Prayer is the simple aspiration of a feeling—the flow of native eloquence, speaking in the language of love, and emanating from a bosom conscious of its dependence. It is the expression of the sympathetic soul which feels for the sufferings of humanity, and a heart that vibrates in kindred unison with the injuries of its fellow. It is the gush of holy pity, that drops a tear over the follies of mankind. How many there are who have never experienced the holy rapture of an hour spent in humble acknowledgment, but, judging from those who utter the dissembled shouts of enthusiastic piety, believe that it is but the offspring of superstitious ignorance, or the impassioned utterance of a mind rent by anguish, or pining over the delusive dream of unending wo.

I envy little that cold and apathetic indifference which sees in the works of nature no Supreme; which reads her laws, and acknowledges no Lawgiver, and which owns no superior to whom can be offered up the sincere thanks of a grateful heart, in the happy hope that affliction's shafts shall be robbed of their sting, and sorrow's cup of its poisonous dregs. Still less do I envy the sour moroseness of that individual who lifts his soul in the depth of despair, to a partial God, and mourns in hopeless despondency, the decree of an avenging Creator. As for me, I love to retire in the silent hour of evening, when Cynthia steals in majesty along the star-lit pavilions of heaven; when silence holds dominion over the animate world, and naught speaks save the ever-eloquent voice of nature, and tune my heart in accordance with the sweet tones which charm the soul and bear it to heaven, entranced by the beauty, and partaking in the simplicity which reigns around. It is solitude's lone retreat which often gives the hour of prayer its richest zest. But shall I say it is a solitary season, when the mind soars aloft, and holds converse with the Supreme on high? No, I would rather say that it is a happy retirement from the cares which palsy mental enjoyment, and render us incapable of participating in the higher and purer pleasures of this existence. Then, need any one ask what is prayer? If they do, let them answer by realizing for one short season, its hallowed influence. EUGENE.

Home can never be transferred, never repeated in the experience of an individual. The place is consecrated by maternal love; by the innocence and sport of childhood; by the first acquaintance with nature; linking the heart to the visible creation, is the only home. There is a living and breathing thing in nature; every familiar object has a history—the trees have tongues, the very air is vocal. There the vesture of decay does not close in and control the noble functions of the soul. It sees, and hears, without the ministry of gross material substance.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1838.

WITHOUT GOD IN THE WORLD.

There is one phrase which is often used by our good Partialist brethren, for the purpose of exciting fear in the minds of those whom they wish to proselyte. Let a man be ever so much disposed to seek for happiness in the practice of genuine benevolence, and by imitating the example of the Saviour, if he lacks conformity to the popular faith, he is told that he is without hope and "without God in the world." And alas! too often has it been the case, that he has been made hopeless, fearfully hopeless, by being led to believe that he was without God in the world—that is, that God was his enemy.—But this is an unfeeling and malicious attempt to destroy the peace of mankind, which, I confidently trust, will sooner or later be looked upon with horror by the very sects which now practice it. I admit that such representations, may have occasionally arrested the footsteps of the hardened wretch, for a short time, and have caused him to seek an antidote for his falsely attributed malady, in the way which his spiritual directors have pointed out to him; but daily occurrences abundantly prove that the pause is more like the partially hushed fury of the tempest blast; it will resume its work of destruction again, with merciless power, the moment it overleaps the mountain obstacles which may have impeded its progress. Man will not long be restrained from the commission of crime, by false, erroneous motives to practice virtue. He will soon discover the imposition which has been thrown around him, and thinking that his advisers have no better reasons to offer, why he should abandon vice, he will throw off all restraint and hastily, and, there is much reason to fear, fatally look upon all Christian rectitude as a mere pretence. If there can be no better means employed to improve mankind, than to impose a restraint, which chains the hands without reforming the heart, we had better resume again, the use of the rack, the gibbet, and the stake.

It becomes us, then, before we teach men that they are "without God in the world," that we understand what is meant by the phrase. If it is to be understood literally, that an intellectual being can ever be so unfortunate, as to lose all care and protection from the divine Being, then it is truly a dangerous sentiment to promulgate.—The Christian finds that a consciousness of being under the guardianship of him whose eye never sleeps, is his sweetest solace in the midst of earths trying scenes.—Deprive him of this consolation, and he sinks beneath the pressure of constantly recurring misfortunes. Tell him that he is an orphan in a strange land, doomed to struggle for a while through unrequited anxiety, and then to sink forever into oblivion, and wo to that man who feels his confidence in his eternal Father, shaken by these dark insinuations. The consequence, if possible, would be still more disastrous to him who knows not, by experience, the hopes and joys of the righteous. With a mind debased by iniquity, he gives loose to all his vicious propensities, and flatters himself, that if he can escape the vigilance of the human eye, he is thus far unobserved.

But no! I would teach him that he never did, and never can escape the knowledge of Omniscience. But I would teach him also, that the Being who notices every act and every event of his life, is not a malignant, nor even a wrathful Being, in the common acceptation of that term; but a wise, benevolent, pure, and all-gracious Father. That though he is acquainted with all his wanderings, he nevertheless extends to him the invitation, to "come and taste, and see that the Lord is good." There is no person but what would be more averse to offend against the will of the pure and righteous, than to transgress the requirements of a tyrant. Make known to him, so that he can appreciate it, that the pure in heart are his friends, and sincerely wish to do him good, and he must be destitute of human feelings, if he despises their just requirements. Indeed, if he did do it, it would be evidence that he had no knowledge of them, or of their disposition towards him. In this sense, he may be said to be friendless—that is, he is without a knowledge of his friends.

To be without God, then, is to be without a knowledge of his character and will. Paul to the Ephesians, holds the following language:—"That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world." In this language, the apostle reminds his Ephesian brethren of their situation in time past, when they were "Gentiles in the flesh." Until the appearance of the Messiah, the promise of salvation, though designed ultimately to extend to the whole world, had never been promulgated to the Gentiles; the knowledge of it had been confined to the Jewish people. Hence the former were "strangers from the covenants of promise," as was evinced by the fact of their "having no hope and being without God in the world." They were ignorant of the promise of life and a happy immortality beyond the grave, and hence, had no confidence in the future—they had no knowledge of the will and character of the true and living God, and hence they were idolaters, being, so far as their knowledge only was concerned, without God in the world. God was their friend, but they did not appreciate it. He was rolling on the period, in his providence, when they were to be brought into the enjoyment of the Gospel which was preached before unto Abraham, but they did not, they could not perceive it, until Jesus Christ "came and preached peace to them which were afar off, and to them which were nigh." Then it was that they were "no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God."

The reader will perceive that this destitution of the Gentiles, did not consist in their being strangers to the covenant of damnation, for the Bible says not one word about such a doom as the final portion of any human being. No, they were strangers from the covenant of promise, and the peace consequent upon a knowledge of that promise. Nor could the reason why they were without God, be because they did not worship fickle minded and partial deities; for all this formed the prominent characteristic of their religion, and the only important difference between them and modern Partialists, is, that they attributed revolting propensities to false gods whereas, the latter attribute them to the true God. If any one doubts this statement, let him reflect that modern professors of Christianity, teach that the glory of the infinite Jehovah will consist in tormenting a portion of his dependent offspring without mercy, merely because they fail of pleasing him—the same propensity precisely, which the Gentiles attributed to their false gods. Thus far, then, the difference is in favor of the Gentiles. And though they bowed to false gods, yet they worshipped them because they imagined that they possessed the same good qualities, which, by Christians, are attributed to the true God; and they feared them because they imagined that they were as vindictive as the true God is supposed to be by some Christians. Hence, they were without God in the world. But when they "who some time were far off," were "made nigh by the blood of Christ," they abandoned their old errors, and through the knowledge which was imparted to them, became members "of the household of God."

From what has been said, we conclude that were these people ever again to be "without God in the world," they must lose the knowledge which they have of his benignity, and imagine him to be as cruel and malignant as they formerly did their idols. How nearly akin to this, would be the state of mankind, if they were to yield to the representations of Partialism! If a man believes that God is infinitely good, and will never inflict evil upon any being as the ultimatum of his spiritual existence; that he possesses every attribute, which it would be proper for mankind to imitate, and none, which, if imitated, would produce misery; if he believes this with that faith which is the result of an experimental knowledge of God, he is told that he is "without God in the world." And however strong may be the hope of mankind, based upon the evidence of God's goodness, they are said to entertain a false hope. To escape this situation, they must believe that themselves are really without God in the world, and that others will be so in eternity. They must change their confidence in God's unchanging and impartial goodness, and believe that the period will come when our heavenly Father will not be good to all, and hope that he will then be good to themselves. Now if we compare this with the former situation of the Ephesians, we shall find that instead of bettering their condition, they have imbibed erroneous views of the divine character, and become "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel." Instead of being "made nigh by the blood of Christ," they are "strangers from the covenants of promise."

That man who supposes that God is an enemy to man in this life, and that he can be made his friend by any act that the creature can perform, or who supposes that he is friendly to the human race in this life, and can be made its eternal enemy, by any act that man can do, has not a knowledge of the character of his heavenly Father, and will feel all the misery which results from a lack of confidence in him under whose control he exists. He who feels that he can be happy in eternity, whether any other being is saved or not, is a stranger to the benevolence which warmed into a spirit of forgiveness the soul of a dying Saviour, and is without God in the world.—He who thinks to frighten men into the kingdom of heaven, by threatening them with eternal destruction, is ignorant of the power of persuasion and kindness over the heart of man.

And he who supposes that he can lie, cheat, swear, or get intoxicated; or follow the impulse of his depraved propensities, and find happiness therein, is very ignorant of the will of our heavenly Father. In fine, every one, be his profession what it may, who wilfully practices contrary to the divine injunctions, is without God in the world—that is, he is without that enjoyment which attends all those who have a practical knowledge of the divine will.

Universalists, on you rests an important duty. It is no less than to convince the doubting, that a man can believe in the impartial benevolence of God, and at the same time be an honest man. Strange as it may seem, there are still very many, who think that the doctrine is decidedly pernicious. Many who think that Universalists are especially without God in the world. And you must admit that unless you manifest a degree of purity, corresponding with the exalted superiority of your [illegible] your opposers will feel justified in rejecting it. The faith which you profess has done much, when exhibited in righteousness, to soften the prejudices of community, and prepare them for the reception of the cheering good news contained in the Gospel. But much remains yet to be done. Methinks the burden of our hearts' desire should be to proclaim, fearlessly, the truths which we enjoy, and to show to the world, not in gloom and despondency, but cheerfully, the fact, that we possess a knowledge of God, which will lead us in all cases to do unto others as we would wish to be done by. If we would do this, we shall thereby honor the cause which we have espoused, and effectually destroy most of the opposition which will otherwise be used against us.

A. R. B.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS—NO. XVII.

"And Jepthah vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into my hands, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth from the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt offering."—JUDGES xi: 30, 31.

In order that the passage which I here introduce may be better understood, a clear statement will be presented, which will be applicable to an important point. The history of the United States records, that in the Revolutionary War, the interesting Miss MacRea, who was soon to be united to an officer in Gen. Burgoyne's army, was murdered in cold blood by a party of Indians. This is an act which makes the blood chill to its source—but does any person think of doubting the truth of the history itself, simply because it records this sanguinary act? Surely not—for every person knows, that history may be as true when relating cruelties, as when relating goodness; while it is an evident truth, that history ought not to be made amenable for the cruelties it notes down.—Its whole duty is to record facts, of whatever nature, and it is to be objected to, only, when it gives fiction for fact. Let these statements be remembered, while we proceed.

During the period when judges reigned in Israel, the children of Ammon made war against the Jews. In order to defend themselves, the Jews made a courageous man their general, whose name was Jepthah. When Jepthah went forth to fight the Ammonites, he made a vow before God as follows:—"If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into my hand, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house, to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering."—Judges xi: 30, 31. Jepthah went forth and overcame the children of Ammon, and as he returned to his house, "behold, his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and dances; and, she was his only child; besides her he had neither son nor daughter—and it came to pass, when he saw her, that he rent his clothes."—Verses 34, 35. His daughter, being first to meet him when he returned, was cause of great grief to Jepthah, because his vow was, that he would sacrifice the first thing which met him from his house. That he did not recede from the spirit of his promise, is clear from the statement, "she returned unto her father, who did with her according to the vow which he had vowed." Verse 39. This sacrifice by Jepthah, has been urged as an objection to the truth of the Bible, because it is a sanguinary deed. But any person who will consider this matter, will perceive that it can not form any objection at all to the truth of the Bible. Admitting that Jepthah did sacrifice his daughter, does the Bible in any place praise or approve that act? Does it sustain it, or lend it countenance? Does it do any thing, any more than record the mere fact itself, as true history? And can the record of that fact make the Bible any more untrue, than the record of the murder of Miss McRea makes American history untrue? The Bible as a correct history, faithfully records the murder of Uriah by king David, but instead of being answerable for that crime, the Bible denounced the most severe punishment against David for his wickedness. Besides, human sacrifices were by no means uncommon at the period of Judges; for the heathen nations around Palestine did practice such sacrifices to their gods. Even the Jews, when they turned away from the God of their fathers, did offer their children to the brazen Molock, in the valley of Hinnom.—And at the present day, some of the Hindoos sacrifice their children in the river Ganges, and burn their widows upon the funeral pile of their husbands.

But it may farther be objected, that this vow was made to the God of the Bible, and that his reported acceptation of such a cruelty from the hands of Jepthah, proves that he was not the real Lord who exists, as he would not permit any such sacrifice. The remarks which have heretofore been made, are founded on the simple supposition that Jepthah did murder his daughter. I now affirm that Jepthah did not kill his child. This affirmation once established, puts an end to all objection. This we shall show.

1. Because the Jews were expressly forbidden to sacrifice their children, like the abominable practice of the heathen around them. And so far was this commandment carried, that the first born child, which belonged to God, or was an offering to him under the Mosaic covenant, instead of being slain like the first born of animals, was redeemed for a certain sum, as any person can see by consulting the 18th of Numbers. Can it be supposed then, that God would permit Jepthah, or that Jepthah would murder his daughter under such circumstances?

2. There is the most express directions in the ancient covenant concerning such vows as Jepthah made. God directed Moses to say, "When a man shall make a singular vow, the person shall be for the Lord, by thy estimation. And thy estimation shall be, of the male from twenty years old unto sixty years old, even thy estimation shall be fifty shekels of silver, after the shekel of the sanctuary. And if it be a female, then thy estimation shall be thirty shekels."—Lev. xxvii: 2, 3, 4. In this language we find an equivalent stated, which an individual could give in place of the child whom he had vowed unto the Lord. Can any one suppose it possible, that Jepthah, with such a provision as this, would pass it by and murder an only daughter, whom he loved with deep affection? Surely, it can not be. I know that those who are desirous of proving that the sacrifice of children was sanctioned by the Mosaic Law, will refer to verse 29th of the same chapter, which says, "none devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death;" but this, instead of having reference to children, refers to individuals, who, for their crimes, have been devoted to punishment. The Canaanites were so devoted; hence we read, "and Israel vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, if thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hands, then will I utterly destroy their cities."—Num. xxi: 2. The Canaanites were very sinful, and when the cup of their iniquity was full, the Lord devoted them to punishment through the hand of the Jews; consequently there could be no redemption to them from the death which they justly deserved.

3. That the daughter of Jepthah was not murdered, is clear from the account itself. It appears, that in some cases, when a man had made an express offering of his child to the Lord, though he could redeem the life of the child for so many shekels of silver, yet the child was not wholly exempt from farther restrictions. Hence the direction in the ancient law—"notwithstanding no devoted thing that a man shall devote unto the Lord, of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possessions, shall be sold or redeemed; every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord." Lev. xxvii: 20. From this provision, it will be seen that the daughter of Jepthah, though redeemed from death, was not redeemed from being holy, consecrated or set apart to the service and worship of God. This is the very view of the matter taken by the historian, for the daughter said to Jepthah—"Let me alone two months, that I may go up and down upon the mountains, and bewail my virginity, I and my fellows. And he said, go. And it came to pass at the end of two months, that she returned unto her father, who did with her according to his vow which he had vowed: and she knew no man. And it was a custom in Israel, that the daughters of Israel went [illegible] to lament the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite, four days in a year." 38–40. The nature of her sacrifice is now clearly seen. She was wholly set apart to the service of God, before assuming which, she bewailed that she was cut off from social life and the joys of posterity, while her companions made it a rule to bewail with her four days in each year.

With this view of the subject, and we feel persuaded that it is a correct view, all the ground of objection to the Bible as far as this passage is concerned, is removed at once and entirely. She was not immolated, nor do we believe that the Deity would have any more permitted Jepthah to have sacrificed her, than he permitted Abraham to murder his son Isaac. And we believe that all the objections to the Bible are as easy of solution, and will melt away before those who examine thoroughly for themselves.

G. W. M.

Br. Tompkins—Credit Miss S. N. House, F. Bannister, and H. Gould, Le Ray, Genesee county, each $2, Miss Almira Marsh, $2, and Rev. S. Goff, $1, Alexander, Genesee county, and charge the amount, $9, to

G. and H.

MR. SKINNER AND THE DISCUSSION.

Br. Skinner probably sailed for St. Croix on Saturday, November 24th. His health remained good as usual up to the period of his departure. We hope to receive accounts of his journeyings, for our columns, from time to time, and to gratify our readers much by publishing them.

One word in regard to the correspondence between him and Mr. Campbell. Every effort was made by Br. S. to have the whole discussion closed and published in our paper, before his departure. In reply to two notes, dated August 3d and 7th, urging this measure, Mr Campbell replies, August 20th, objecting to their publication in our paper before they appeared in his, but offering to write out the discussion in full immediately, and publish one from each party per month. On August 30th, Br. Skinner accepted this proposition, stating that he would wait for Campbell's 32 letter before he would write No. 35, and for Nos. 34 and 36 before he would write No. 37. And in a note to the 35th letter sent to C in MS., Br. S. again informed him that he would answer to Nos. 34 and 36 in No. 37, and urged the speedy writing of those two Nos. and the forwarding of them in MSS. September 19th, Mr. C. writes that he has not received a letter from Br. S.; but he received No. 35, about that time, and No. 35 in MS. (as we learned afterwards) immediately before he (C.) started for Richmond, Va. Mr. Campbell, so far from regarding his own proposals, has sent his MS. from Richmond to Bethany, to be there put in type, and then, only, sent to Mr. S.—thus causing a considerable unnecessary delay in regard to the whole, especially in regard to No. 36, for which Mr. S. waited in vain to the last moment previous to his departure and which reached him at New-York from here, barely in time. In consequence of these delays on the part of Mr. C., we will have to send his next, (which will be the last but one,) to Mr. S. at St. Croix, and wait for his closing letter from there. Mr. Campbell, of course, will get his final letter out some time earlier. This statement of facts is due to our readers, and the public, and is made merely to explain why the discussion was not closed this year. Mr. S., at least, is not in fault.

TO PATRONS.

The paper on which we print being rather thinner than usual, we have not been able to make as good work of it as we could wish. Measures have been taken to secure a supply of better, soon, when, we trust, we shall be able to do better. The next volume will be printed on new type, also, procured for the purpose. If our subscribers will only do [illegible] us, they may rely upon our doing them justice, and ourselves some credit, in the appearance and contents of the next and future volumes. We have the will, only give us the means.

A. B. G.

BOOKS.

Just received, a new supply of Life of Murray, Whittemore's Notes on the Parables, Ballou's [illegible], Ballou's Sermons, Exposition of Future Retribution, Treatise on Atonement, and Collection of Valuables, Smith on Divine Government, Combe's Moral Philosophy, and Constitution of Man, The Palfreys, Ellen Clifford, Songs of Zion, a general assortment of Universalist, Phrenological, Miscellaneous works, some of which are done up in a style suitable for Christmas and New Years presents.

Universalist Libraries supplied on all orders [illegible] at the dozen prices.

[illegible]

Dear Br.—I know not where a letter will reach you, hence these few lines here. If you can, as well as not, be here by the fourth Sunday inst., you can much oblige me with your aid at that busy season—besides gratifying some others. Can you come?

A. B. G.

Miss E. R. is respectfully assured that no article has been received as she states in her letter of the 27th ult. We should be very happy to hear from her, and believe our readers would also be gratified to see her name again in our columns. Can she, and will she not gratify our wishes in this matter?—she can't come too often.

A. B. G.

CONTENTS OF THE KNICKERBOCKER, FOR NOVEMBER—1838.

ORIGINAL PAPERS:
American Poetry: "To be or not to be?"
The Passions. By Mrs. Katharine A. Ware,
The Wanderer's Return. By Grace Grafton,
"La Francaise,"
The Sympathies. From the German of Wieland.—(Part Two.)
Sonnet. Written on a Blank Leaf of the "Pilgrim's Progress." By George Lunt, Esq.,
Immortality. By the Author of "Wilson Conworth,"
The Miser. A Sketch,
The Dying Artist,
Ignorance of the Human System a Principal Cause of the Encouragement of Empiricism. By a Physician,
Hatteras. By W. Gilmore Simms, Esq., author of "Guy Rivers," etc.,
Random Passages from the Private Journal and Correspondence of the late Mrs. Sophie Manning Philips. (Number Three.)
The Farewell. By Edward Maturin, Esq.,
English and American Steam Vessels. By William C. Redfield, Esq.,
Ode to the Czar. By "Childers,"
Hans Carvel. By the author of "The Kushow Property," "Johnny Marsden," etc.,
Autumnal Stanzas. By the late Mrs. S. M. Philips,
Human Occupations. Comparative Privileges and Effects of the different Occupations in Life. By J. N. Bellows, Esq.,
The Fading Tree. By Mrs. L. H. Sigourney,
Recollections of a Residence in Europe. (Number Three.) A Visit to the Catacombs of Paris,
The Bad Bargain,
LITERARY NOTICES:
Sedgwick's "Public and Private economy,"
Gram's "Sketches in London,"
Vision of Rubeta: a Poem,
Ellsworth's "Sketches of the Upper Wabash,"
The Gift, for 1839.
EDITORS' TABLE:
A Gossip with some of our Correspondents,
Miniature Painting: Mr. George H. Hite,
North American Review, for the October Quarter,
The Messrs. Ballantynes and Mr. Lockhart,
The "New-York Review,"
American Publishing House in London,
New English Illustrated Works.
THE DRAMA.
The "American Monthly;" Park Benjamin Esq.,
Mr. Cooper's Review of Lockhart's Life of Scott,
New Works.
LITERARY RECORD.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. J. S. KIEBE, at Munsville—Br. J. D. HICKS, at Russia—Br. EDDY, at Clockville—Br. C. S. BROWN, in Vestal.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. S. BROWN, in Walton—Br. M. B. SMITH, at Middleville—Br. EDDY, at Otselic.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. SMITH, at Salisbury Centre—Br. HAYWARD, North Norwich.

Br. C. S. BROWN, will lecture on the evenings of December 20th, 21st, and 22d, as the friends in Walton may appoint.

Br. SIAS, will preach on the evenings of December 3th, at Fulton—4th, at Scriba Four Corners—17th, at [illegible]ville—18th, at Weedsport, Onondaga county—19th, at Wellington Corners—20th, at Howlet Hill—21st, at Salina—24th, at Black River village—25th, at Carthage—and 27th, at Copenhagen.

The second Quarterly Conference of the Black River Association of Universalists, will be held at Denmark, on Monday, Tuesday and Thursday, 26th and 27th inst. Ministering brethren requested to attend.

Christmas Eve will be celebrated in the Universalist Church in the town of Marshall. Brs. Gage and McAllister will attend the services.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper

Rev T C E, Dunkirk—Z L G, Buffalo, for A B—C L, Friendsville, (Pa) for self L H and P S—P M, Sempronius for J M—A C, Hammondsport—B H, Stockholm, for self, T C and I M—Rev S G, Alexander—Rev F J B, Canton—P M, Clarendon, for C H and E L—J L, South Canton for M W—L N B V D, Penn Yan, for S S K—P M Evansville, (O) for A M C and N H—P M, Washington, (Mich) for H A and C W H—P M, Plymouth, (Mich) for J B, A B and S B—S E, Lewisville, for self, J L, L E, L J S, B E and P B—P M, Concord, (O) for Z C.

POETRY

THIS WHISPERING VOICE.

There is a whispering voice that breathes
Mementos of another day,
There is a whispering sight that grieves
For joys now fled away.

There is a whispering voice that speaks,
Through midnight's solemn gloom,
Of those once loved and cherished,
'Neath the cold and silent tomb.

There is a whispering sound that breaks
From ocean's distant roar,
'Tis not unlike life's varying scenes,
Unchangeable tho' years glide o'er.

There is a whispering tone that flows
From music's magic swell,
Which sends a ray of hallow'd light,
To cheer life's darken'd spell.

There is a voice that lingering echoes
From yonder hill or plains;
It bids us banish every sorrow,
Tho' our lives are fraught with pain.

There is a voice in yonder hall,
Where gay forms trip the mazy dance;
It bids us grasp those pleasures now,
Ere age with blighted forms advance.

There is a voice I ne'er could speak,
The words which from the bosom swell,
It is a voice from those we love—
"Go—peace be with you—fare thee well!"

[From the Gospel Witnesses]

IS NOT YOUR DOCTRINE LICENTIOUS?

This is a question often asked by the Limitarians, when they are in want of arguments to support their own.—How often do we hear people admit that our arguments are strong, that they accord with sound reason and good sense; but they are fearful of its tendency. It is too easy, the people of the world are too apt to embrace it. Very weighty argument indeed is this! similar to that brought against Christ and his disciples, by the Jews, for not being over scrupulous about ceremonies, and for propagating a doctrine, "so plain that the way-faring man, though a fool, need not err therein." This erroneous idea has kept, no doubt, thousands from advocating and supporting the doctrine of impartial grace; but if they would study and reflect upon it, they would find it to be a doctrine calculated to beget love,—that love which is the fulfilling of the law, and worketh obedience. Our Limitarian brethren seem to think it necessary to hold up to view a place of indescribable torments in a future state, to restrain our evil propensities, and fit us for heaven. They make bold to say, if the doctrine we inculcate was generally embraced, the earth would be filled with violence, and a perfect state of chaos would ensue. Now where do our opponents find the proof that our doctrine has a bad tendency? Do they find more criminals in our jails and penitentiaries that are believers in God's impartial grace, than of any other sect? No, it is a fact as far as we have been able to learn, that those convicts generally have belonged to some sect of Limitarians, or been educated under the influence of their doctrines. From this we learn that the belief of future punishment does not keep men from the perpetration of crime.

Lord Byron says, "it is useless to tell a man not to reason upon the subject of religion, but to believe. You might as well tell a man not to wake but sleep: and then to threaten with torments and all that! I can not help thinking that the menace of hell makes as many devils as the severe penal codes of inhuman humanity make villains." I know that the opinion of Lord Byron will not be thought very highly of by many, because he was not an exemplary character, and pure streams do not usually flow from impure fountains.

Those of our enemies who accuse us of being immoral, should consider, we do not pretend to be over righteous like the Scribes and Pharisees, and go about in sheep's clothing to deceive the foolish and credulous.—Nevertheless the understanding Universalists, those who are such from the heart, will not suffer much in comparison with any other denomination of Christians.

Now what reasonable person will not admit that an earthly parent, who is wise and judicious enough to win the love and respect of his children, is much more likely to be obeyed in his commands, than a father who enforces his commands in a despotic manner, without convincing his children of his good intentions towards them; but that he must be obeyed, because he possesses sovereign power, and has a right to their services without consulting their good individually. We view God as a kind and merciful Father, who has in store the gift of eternal life for every one of his offspring. His tender mercies are over all his works. He delights not in misery, and will finally put an end to all sin and sorrow, and "wipe the tears from off all faces." Now to believe in God as possessing such a character as this, has not a tendency to make men vicious and unhappy; but quite the reverse: it exalts the mind and its intellectual powers; softens the heart, that it may swell with love and gratitude towards God, and our fellow-beings.

The Gospel of Christ as it is illustrated by Universalists, is a glorious theme for our consideration, it is received into the mind in its native simplicity, as it was first announced by an angel, as "good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." Whenever this Gospel is received into the human mind, it exerts a happy influence, in promoting "peace on earth, and good will towards men." May the time soon come when bigotry and superstition will be done away, and the glorious Gospel of Christ spread throughout the world and take possession of every heart. A LAYMAN.

ETERNITY!

The only theme that confuses, humbles and alarms the proud intellect of man. What is it? The human mind can grasp any defined length of time, however vast; but this is beyond time, and too great for the limited conception of man. It has no beginning and can have no end. It can not be multiplied, it can not be added unto; you may strive to subtract from it, but it is useless. Take millions and millions of years from it, take all the time that enters the compass of your imagination, it is still whole and undiminished as before—all calculation is lost. Think on; the brain becomes heated and oppressed with a sensation of weight too powerful for it to bear, and reason totters in her seat, and you rise with the conviction of the impossibility of the creature to fathom the Creator, humiliated with a sense of your own nothingness, and impressed with the tremendous majesty of the Deity.

A CHILD'S FUNERAL.

It is the most touching of sights, the burial of a little creature, which shuts its eyes as soon as the glories of earth open to its view, without having known the parents whose tearful eyes are gazing on it; which has been loved without loving in return; whose tongue is silenced before it has spoken; whose features stiffen before they have smiled. These falling buds closed in the light of the morning, will yet find a stalk on which to lean, and some more genial heaven to unfold them.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 18th ult., by Rev. Mr. Way, Mr. EDMUND MUNSON, to Miss SARAH GARDNER, all of this city.

In Royalton, October 11th, by Rev. C. Hammond, Mr. DAVID TURRELL, to Miss MARY CATHARINE HARDER, all of that town.

In Newark, October 9th, by Rev. K. Townsend, Mr. ALBERT PHILIPS, to Miss VIOLA S. REESE, both of Geneva.

By the same, September 9th, Mr. JAMES SHEPHERD, to Miss ELIZA MARQUAVER, both of Newark.

By the same, November 4th, Mr. DAVID WEED, of Weedsport, to Miss ADALINE HUTCHINSON, of Newark.

In Sennett, Cayuga county, October 24th, by Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Mr. ADAM MILLER, to Miss ASENAH TIBBITS.

In the town of Burlington, N. Y., October 26th, by Rev. I. Hayward, Mr. JOHN PERRY, of Canandaigua, to Miss MARY ANN BUTTON, daughter of Elijah Button, of the former place.

 Union please copy.

DEATHS.

In Denmark, Lewis county, November 2d, Mr. ARSALEM SYLVESTER, aged 56 years.

By this afflictive dispensation, seven children mourn the loss of an only parent, as their honored and excellent mother was called hence a little less than a year before. In the death of this good man, not only his family, but the neighborhood and community, feel that they have sustained an irreparable loss. He was among the first settlers of the town—was honest, industrious, economical and benevolent. He was a firm believer in the doctrine of a world's salvation; and it was the assurance that our heavenly Father controls all events in such a manner as to make them result in the best possible good to all his intelligent offspring, which, he said, sustained him in every season of affliction; so that whether called to close in death the eyes of a beloved companion, or to endure his own protracted illness, or to contemplate approaching death for himself, he could feel that he had joys which the world could not give.

His funeral was attended on Sunday the 4th, by a numerous congregation of friends and neighbors, who listened with devout attention to the consolations of that Gospel which proclaims immortal life as the final inheritance of all who die in Adam. J. FRENCH.

At the residence of his brother, in Henderson, KNOX county, Ills., September 16th, after an illness of nearly two weeks, Mr. EZRA HITCHCOCK, in the 66th year of his age. He emigrated from Eaton, Madison county, N. Y., in the Summer of 1837, and enjoyed good health until his sickness, which terminated his pilgrimage on earth. The deceased has left a daughter and brother in Henderson, to mourn their loss; and we can truly say that they mourn not as those without hope. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the relatives and friends, by Br. J. P. Fuller. Much praise is due to the attending physician, for his attention day and night, during the sickness of Mr. H. May the rich consolations of divine truth be abundantly realized by the mourning friends. A. R. GARDNER.

In Barre, Orleans county, August 13th, Mrs. ALVIRA BARTLETT, daughter of Rev. C. Morton, in the 21st year of her age. Having early imbibed the doctrine of Universalism, she was enabled to bear a very protracted illness with Christian fortitude, and to die without the slightest doubt of her Creator's goodness in eternity. Funeral discourse on the 15th, by C. H.

In Clarendon, September 14th, Mrs. SALLY FARWELL, aged 80 years. She has left an aged companion, with whom she had lived over half a century, and who is brother of the late Wm. Farwell of Vermont. She was a member of the Universalist church in Clarendon, beloved and esteemed by all who knew her, and died as she had lived, a Universalist. Funeral discourse on the 16th, to a large congregation, by the writer. C. H.

In Vienna, October 20th, GEORGE, son of Frederic Bandermark, aged 22 years. The deceased was a young man of much promise, and endeared to a very large circle of relatives and friends. His funeral was attended by a large concourse of people, who attentively listened to the words of truth, as delivered by the writer. May its consolations be felt and appreciated, especially by the parents of the deceased, their numerous family, and large circle of relatives. K. T.

In Sennett, Cayuga county, October 14th, of old age, Mrs. MARY SWIFT, in her 89 year. She was a believer in the Restitution, between 50 and 60 years. Her thoughts were first aroused to the subject, by the doctrine of election and infant destruction, whose horrors filled her with sorrow, until her views became so enlightened, that she discarded that doctrine, and received Christ as the Saviour of the world. She lived in Auburn 32 years, and consequently saw it when it contained only a few dwellings. She was gathered to the grave like a shock of corn, fully ripe, to be with the spirits of the just. May the joy, springing from the resurrection and reconciliation of man, be with her numerous descendents. G. W. M.

In Skaneateles, Onondaga county, November 3d, Mr. LUTA PECK, aged 69 years. Br. Peck was a firm believer in the Restitution, and one who practiced its principles. The Baptist clergyman who attended his funeral, bore honorable testimony to his worth. He said that he had experienced Br. Peck's friendship, witnessed his liberality to the poor, and beheld his daily walk; and "of him," says he, "I know no hurt—while concerning faith we agreed to disagree." His death is another triumphant proof that the sentiment he believed will do to die by, as his opposing neighbors were compelled to admit. He died exhorting his children to sustain the same faith which sustained him, and enabled him to breathe out his life sweetly and in hope, in the arms of the Saviour. May the blessing of the Lord be with his mourning family, to bid their grief be still. G. W. M.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS: HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1838. NUMBER 50.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

"SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES."

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

The command we have used as the caption of this article, although a very important one, has but very little attention paid it. Although living in a land where liberty of thought and speech is allowed, and where free inquiry is tolerated, we find many who either have never seen the injunction, or have not paid the least attention to it: many who have founded their faith, not upon Scripture teachings, but upon the word of man—receiving those things for truth which have no foundation in the word of God. It is true, we find many who have searched the Scriptures, and do continue to search them daily. But the examination is not conducted in a candid and dispassionate manner. They sit down to the work with their minds filled with prejudice, and early imbibed opinions. Such persons do not examine the Bible for instruction—they do not do it for the purpose of ascertaining what it teaches. Whatever portion or portions of it they think accord with their preconceived opinions, they treasure up; and the remainder is cast aside as of no importance. Hence they never arrive at truth—never enjoy that spiritual freedom and peace which the truth imparts to its possessor; but are continually in the bondage of error—groaning under the woes and miseries it heaps on its captives.

Truth should be the object of man's search and investigation, for it is that which belongs to his highest earthly good. It is calculated to purify, perfect and exalt the affections of our natures; and when it shall have gone forth in its might, and have crumbled into ruin every temple of error, and have extended its empire from the "rivers to the ends of the earth," then shall happiness pervade this "globe's vast round"—then shall righteousness, joy and peace be universal,—and then be sung the song of Moses and the Lamb!

From a view of these important results, we may form some conception of the infinite value of truth. And if we will give them an attentive consideration—if we will reflect upon the glorious effects to be brought about by truth, we shall find ourselves stimulated to search diligently until we are put in possession of a knowledge of that combination of heavenly principles, which is calculated to work an entire revolution in the moral world.

By searching the Scriptures, we learn the true nature and character of God. We find in perusing the pages of the sacred Book, that the great Fountain of all perfection is called our Father—the Father of all intelligent creatures. "For," says the prophet, "have we not all one Father?" As a kind and affectionate parent, he is represented as watching over his wayward and transgressing children, with an eye that grows not dim nor weary—as continually encircling them in the arms of his parental tenderness and love—as guiding them by the influences of his holy spirit—and, when they go astray, as inflicting chastisements for their good, and punishment, that he may bring them back to their duty and their God, and place their feet again in the way of life everlasting.

If we will reflect a moment, we can not but perceive that a knowledge of these truths is absolutely necessary to our peace and happiness. We are so constituted—our nature is such that we require a higher source than man, in which to repose our confidence. We feel within ourselves the necessity of trusting in the Supreme Ruler and Governor of the world. But in order to repose a full and an unshaken confidence in God, we must know him—and know him as he is; not as man, with a heart filled with envy, and jealousy, and pride, and sin, has represented him; but as he is set forth in the Scriptures—a God of infinite and immutable benignity—a God whose very essence and nature is Love!

When I look around upon the world, and see its fairest portions deluged with misery and tears—when I see thousands bereft of reason, and despair and suicide meeting me at every turn—when I consider the amount of pain and suffering around me, caused by false views of the character of God, I feel to urge an examination of the Scriptures, that we may thereby obtain a correct knowledge of the character of the Most High, and escape the doubts and anguish attendant upon erroneous conceptions of the divine perfections!

By searching the Scriptures we gain a knowledge of those things which belong to our highest earthly good, and the welfare and happiness of every man. We obtain a view of those holy and heavenly principles, without which the world were in darkness, and the light of civilization forever extinguished. We are furnished with bright and shining examples for our imitation—examples of zeal, and faithfulness, and integrity in the cause of Christ—examples of faith, and confidence and the most unspotted virtue—and practical illustrations of the goodness and purity of the Messiah's religion, and its perfect adaptation to the varied circumstances and conditions of human life!

For the Magazine and Advocate.

NECESSITY AND ACCOUNTABILITY.

BY REV. E. R. CROCKER.

It is becoming very generally believed in Christian lands, that the two above-named doctrines are inharmonious and inconsistent one with the other; that if one be a doctrine of Revelation, the other can not be—otherwise Revelation contradicts itself. This view of the subject is actually becoming quite popular. Asks one, "Do you believe the doctrine of necessity?" I answer, yes. "Well, then," says he, "you do not believe the doctrine of man's accountability"—just as though they could not both be true, and form parts of the Holy Scriptures!

Well, men may say whatever they please upon this or any other subject, but yet I would exhort them to examine the evidences of their faith, and see to the reasonableness of what they say, for the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God. Modern spiritual guides must look to it, that the blind do not lead the blind, and all fall into the ditch, and besmear themselves with the mud of ignorance and unbelief. Our Saviour decided, that where light had come into the world and men chose darkness rather than light, their deeds were evil. But to the subject in hand.

Are the doctrines of necessity and accountability in reality inharmonious and contradictory? That they are not, it will be my object to show. And in order to show this, I have only to prove that they are both subjects of Revelation; for Revelation, in its parts, can not be inharmonious, but consistent and harmonious.

1. What may we understand by the doctrine of necessity? Answer—it is a doctrine, the truth of which I infer from the following Scripture quotations: "He doeth his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" "He worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." "Declaring the end from the beginning, saying, my counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure."

From this Scripture I reason thus: If God worketh all things after the counsel of his own will then, in order for men to have wills, they must, from the very NECESSITY of the case, conform their wills to God's will. There is no liberty in the case—there can be none. Even to act voluntarily, (if that is a proper word to express the idea,) he must will, to have a will, to will in conformity with God's will. For God's will is absolute, unyielding. But suppose that man's will is often contrary to God's—which the free-agent will of course admit. Now, in this case, can man—has he the power to will thus, in opposition to God's absolute will? Is it answered in the affirmative? It is replied: God does not, then, work all things after the counsel of his will—which answer, to all intents and purposes, is a denial of Holy Writ! Hence the doctrine of necessity, as I understand it, is true. Man is necessitated to will as God wills he shall, and to act as God wills he shall act, or God worketh not all things after the counsel of his will. So much upon the doctrine of necessity. We will pass on.

2. Is man an accountable creature? What is accountability? "The state of being liable to answer for one's conduct."—Webster. Agreed.—No dispute here. Now, if I can prove that man shall be punished for his sins, and rewarded for his virtues, it is enough. For God has never said that he will do this or that, when to do it would be wrong and improper. Whatever he says he will do, is right for him to do—not only right, but he will do it, for he is a being who can not lie. Well, He says he "will by no means clear the guilty;" "that every man shall receive according to his deeds, whether they be good or bad." Hence, as it is right that man should be punished for his sins, etc., since he (God) has declared he will punish him, and can not do that which is wrong, therefore man is accountable to his Maker for his conduct, and it is right he should be. "Not," says one, "if he is a creature of necessity." I reply, your declaration has come too late, for I have before proved from the Bible, that man is necessitated to will as God wills to have him—not only so, I have also proved that God holds him accountable to himself, for his conduct—both propositions are proved by Scripture testimony—they are true. And to deny them is substantially to deny the Bible, which no believer can do. So, amen.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ORDINANCES.

BY BR. J. FRENCH.

When I read Br. N. Brown's remarks on this subject, under the head of "New-York Western Conference," (see No. 43, current volume, this paper,) I thought that he had treated it with too much contempt, and that as soon as I could find a leisure moment, I would try to administer some reproof, thinking it might perhaps come more pleasantly from my hand, than from some brother whom Br. B. meant to hit. That article is now before me, and I have just looked it over again with more care, and I must confess it "reads better" to me than it did before. However, as I have set me down to the task, I do not like to relinquish my purpose, but I will endeavor to keep in mind what I deem of great importance, and that is, that he who reproves, should never fail to do it in the spirit of kindness.

Is it certain that "a neglect of greater matters" may not be in some measure owing to "a neglect of ordinances," or, as I had rather say, observances or ceremonials? I suppose Br. B.

would not question its being a more important defect for a man to neglect to deal justly and practice mercy, than to neglect the observance of public worship. But he would be in favor of inviting the unjust and unmerciful to go to meeting, in hope that they might thereby be led to the knowledge and practice of justice and mercy: i. e., that by means of the less important, they might be conducted to the more important—a "shadow" is often very useful in guiding us to the "substance."

I am truly sorry if Br. B. meant to call the Eucharistical Supper, when attended to as commemorative of that event on which are based our richest, choicest hopes, "the baseless fabric of a vision." I know of no Universalist who supposes that "the foundation of true piety and moral virtue rests on" this observance, nor yet on that of public worship; but there are many who do suppose that both, when duly attended to, will have a tendency to nourish and add vigor to these holy principles; and I would reckon myself among that number. But in order to make the common forms of public worship interesting and useful, it is necessary that there should be persons enough in attendance, so that it will not be a perversion of language to call it public, and also that those present should, by their countenances and the common tokens, manifest their cordial union in the services. The same remarks will, I think, apply nearly, if not quite as well, to the observance of the Communion Supper.

Now, if many of our brethren should abandon the first of these observances, and demand a "thus saith the Lord," requiring them once in seven days, or oftener, to leave their domestic duties, and assemble for divine worship, we should doubtless find it difficult to furnish the command, however well satisfied we might be, from our own experience, of the utility and consequent propriety of the practice. To be sure, I should feel that such brethren had an undoubted right to their own views, and that they ought to obey their own consciences; but I could not help lamenting it, if such views and practices were to become prevalent; because I should deem them detrimental to the prosperity of the good cause. I have similar views and feelings, though in an inferior degree, about the very extensive disuse, in our denomination, of both Baptism and the Communion Supper.

I freely acknowledge that I know of no express command which requires us to observe these things, nor do I know of any to direct us when, or where, or whether ever, to build meeting-houses, or what should be their size or construction;—whether they are to be dedicated, and with what ceremonies; nor can I find this kind of authority to sanction our proceedings in our ordinations, or in the observance of Christmas Eve; and in addition to these, we might probably recount a long catalogue of social and domestic duties, about which there is no express direction in the Bible. Yet all these things are very useful when properly conducted, and kept within due bounds.

If I remember right, Br. Grosh, in reply to Br. Rogers, says, that he could unite in the observance of the Lord's Supper, provided it were attended to as a commemoration of the Saviour's death and resurrection. That is the light in which I believe it is generally, and I should think universally, understood by our denomination. Now, brethren, if we are agreed, let us have no more controversy about the matter. Perhaps I have wandered from or gone beyond my "task," but no matter for that, since I have expressed my mind.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

JOB'S COMFORTERS.

BY REV. F. J. BRIGGS.

"Miserable comforters are ye all."

God, in his wisdom, has so constituted the order of things, that people, during the period of their earthly existence, are often visited with adversity and affliction. Sometimes these are so severe, and wear such an appalling aspect, that they seem to deprive us of every remaining comfort, and destroy, for a season, the relish for life. The history of our race from the earliest period to the present time, shows that woes and misfortunes have fallen upon people in all ranks of life, periods of existence, and ages of the world.

It is not my design to discuss the question why these things are so. It is sufficient for us to know that these afflictions "work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

Among all the accounts of the troubles and miseries of individuals, we have none where one of the human family endured afflictions more heavy and severe than Job. Apparently he had attained the summit of earthly felicity. He was in affluent circumstances; prosperity smiled upon him. Advanced in life, he was happy in the anticipation of the support and protection of a numerous family in his declining years. How transient are all our earthly joys! His flocks and herds were driven off by pitiless, blood-thirsty marauding parties, who slew his servants and desolated his fields; all his children, while enjoying a season of festivity together, were overwhelmed in a general destruction. Under these trials, the afflicted man supported himself with this reflection—"The Lord gave, and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

> "Good, when he gives—supremely good;
> No less, when he denies:
> Afflictions from his sovereign Hand,
> Are blessings in disguise."

He was next visited with a terrible disease, being from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet, covered with ulcerating sores, attended with intolerable pain, which so disfigured his appearance, that when his three friends came to visit him, they could not recognize the countenance of their old acquaintance and friend. "And when they lifted up their eyes afar off, and knew him not, they lifted up their voice and wept." Still the patient man supported himself with thoughts of the goodness of God. "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" which words clearly indicated the following sentiment: It is often necessary that we should suffer afflictions, which are designed for our good; why, then, should we mourn and repine at these, more than in prosperity, since they are all directed by the same Goodness? His afflictions were so severe, that he entertained no hopes of recovery, and considered his life drawing near its close. As he expected no rest till he reposed in the grave, he was anxious for the arrival of the period that should terminate his earthly sufferings. As desirable as life is, the grave, to him, was a wished-for rest.

This did not fill up the measure of his afflictions. His "three friends" that came "to comfort him," became his tormentors. Far be it from me to censure their motives. No doubt they acted sincerely, and considered they were discharging a duty. Doubtless they were friendly to Job, had compassion for him, and wished to do him all the good that lay in their power. But it is evident from the whole tenor of the book, that they differed essentially from Job in theological opinions, and considered him in an error, involving tremendous consequences; and from this error they wished to convert him, if possible, before it was too late. As they considered him near his end, they desired ardently to teach him those things that belonged to his peace, before he entered upon the untried scenes of futurity; and undoubtedly they felt sorrowful and alarmed, because he would not hear to them, renounce his former opinions, and do as they directed. "Now when Job's three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place; Eliphaz, the Temanite, and Bildad, the Shuhite, and Zophar, the Naamathite; for they had made an appointment together to come and mourn with him, and to comfort him."—ii: 11. As now, to all appearance, he was forever deprived of every earthly comfort, how did they proceed to comfort him? Did they endeavor to show him the goodness of God, his universal, impartial, immutable and eternal love, and encourage his confidence in him? Far from it; for, as the sequel will show, they thought his confidence in this respect, would be fatal to his security. Did they endeavor to bind up his broken heart, and undo the heavy burden? Alas! no. In an error themselves, they endeavored to deprive him of all his remaining consolation, and fill his soul with terror and alarm. Though "he was upright, feared God, and eschewed evil"—was charitable to the poor, yet, for some cause, if they did not consider this righteousness an abomination in the sight of God, they considered it good for nothing. And their first object was to show him that he was a vile and desperate sinner. They accused him of innumerable transgressions against God; of the very height of impiety and wickedness, and strove to convince him that the vengeance of God was arrayed against him.

Eliphaz went so far as to try to show him that his iniquities were infinite, and, consequently deserved afflictions infinite in severity. "Is not thy wickedness great, and thine iniquities infinite?"—xxii: 5. Zophar endeavored to convince him that his iniquities merited greater sufferings than he here endured; prayed that God would arouse him from his security, and make him sensible of his desperate situation, and unceremoniously called his doctrine lies, and his defence a mockery.—"Should thy lies make men hold their peace? And when thou mockest, shall no man make thee ashamed? For thou hast said, my doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes. But, oh! that God would speak and open his lips against thee. And that he would shew thee the secrets of wisdom, that they are double to that which is! Know therefore that the Lord exacteth of thee less than thine iniquity deserveth."—xi: 3-6. He proceeded, as by immediate repentance it was possible he might be accepted, to exhort him to repent and pray to God fervently. "If thou prepare thine heart and stretch out thine hands towards him; if iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away; and let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles. For then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot, yea, thou shalt be steadfast and shalt not fear."—Vers. 13-15. To this Job replied: "I have understanding as well as you. So mine eye hath seen all this, mine earhath heard it, and understood it. Ye are forgers of lies, ye are all physicians of no value. O that ye would altogether hold your peace, and it should be your wisdom. Hear now my reasoning, and hearken to the pleadings of my lips. Will ye speak wickedly for God, and talk deceitfully for him? Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him. He also shall be my salvation."—xii: 3; xiii: 1, 4-7, 15, 16. This reply aroused feelings in Eliphaz that I can not describe, unless they were a combination of despair, fear, rage, pity, disappointment, and contempt. He accused Job of obstinately adhering to false and pernicious doctrine, when he was self-condemned; of striving against God; of casting off fear, and continuing impenitent and prayerless; and all this, even in prospect of the near approach of death! "Then answered Eliphaz, the Temanite, and said, Should a wise man utter vain knowledge? Should he reason with unprofitable talk? or with speeches wherewith he can do no good? Yea, thou castest off fear, and restrainest prayer before God. Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I; yea, thine own lips testify against thee. Why doth thine heart carry thee away, and what do thine eyes wink at, that thou turnest thy spirit against God, and lettest such words go out of thy mouth?"—xv: 1-4, 6, 12, 13. All this (I should be glad to call it unimitated) abuse he heaped upon the suffering man, because he continued steadfast in his faith, and maintained his confidence in God without the least distrust. This apology, however, is due Eliphaz—he was zealous, and though his zeal was not according to knowledge; he thought it guided by supernatural knowledge; for in the introduction to his first speech, he related a wonderful and miraculous experience, to give weight and solemnity to his words.—iv: 13, etc. And though he believed Job was without that experience, yet, failing into an inconsistency common to many, he condemned another unreservedly for not seeing what he did not, till it was shown him by the special agency of the Spirit. And, added to this, he considered that the influential and the wise were with him; therefore he was right. "With us are both the grey-headed and very aged men, much older than thy father."

Job often manifested a willingness to die, and mentioned death as an event that he could meet with calmness, and without the least fear. But Bildad called it, to him, "the king of terrors," xviii: 14, as if there were consequences of the most terrible and awful nature attending it, at which he ought to be alarmed. In his response, Job repeated more fully his hope which deprived death of its terrors. As the subject was important, and he desired to express himself strongly, he commenced with a forcible and impressive introduction: "Oh, that my words were now written, that they were printed in a book! That they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever! For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand in the latter day upon the earth: and after I shall awake, though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh shall I see God."—(Marginal reading.) Thus he manifested fully his hope in the resurrection; that this would be effected through the Redeemer, in whom "all shall be made alive." And though his earthly body would perish, (for "we sow not that body that shall be,") yet out of his flesh (for "flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God," as "it is raised a spiritual body,") he should see God. A glorious hope to which he firmly adhered. Had these words, as he uttered them, been "written, and graven with an iron pen in the rock forever," if they had been disposed, could they, in case of his death, have had so favorable an opportunity to have reported that he renounced his faith before he died?

I have passed by one "comforter" that some of my readers may think I ought to notice. His wife said to him, while under the severity of his trials, "Dost thou still retain thy integrity? Curse God and die." I have only room to suggest a few ideas. On the word rendered to curse, Parkhurst writes—"The lexicons have absurdly and contrary to the authority of the ancient versions, given to this word the sense of cursing," etc. Wherever it occurs in the Old Testament, it is rendered to bless, except in seven passages; and Parkhurst shows it ought invariably to be translated bless.—This will give consistency and sense to the passage before us. No woman would desire her husband to curse God in death—such an idea is preposterous and revolting. But it would be a consolation to see one piously departing this life blessing God. Does it not appear that this lady differed from her husband in belief, as much as his three friends did, and believed, perhaps, as they did? and that she considered that her husband was holding to a pernicious error, and was in hopes that he would renounce it before he died? Accordingly, when their misfortunes came upon them, their property was wasted, their servants slaughtered, their children destroyed, and he was wasting under a painful disease, she was disappointed, and, in her affliction, asked him, "Dost thou still retain thine integrity," or former opinion? Is it not evident that she considered him destitute of true vital piety; that he never blessed God, at least in an acceptable manner, and could not while he maintained his present wicked doctrine; that she wanted him to renounce, and become truly pious in her view of the subject, and bless God before he died? Hence her expostulation: "Dost thou still retain thy integrity? Bless God and die." The purport of his reply was, that he had no more reason to distrust under these afflictions, than in prosperity.—ii: 10.

His situation was distressing enough to draw tears of pity from every eye. All lost—his children lately torn from him—and he, to all appearance, on the brink of the grave, and no one to comfort him. Surrounded by friends who wished to do him good, their evil and unmerciful doctrines kept them continually tormenting him, and trying to wrest from him his last and steadfast consolation. But I can pursue the subject no farther.

If Job had died at this time, what would his three friends have thought of him? Would they not have been confident that his conscience was seared—that he was insensible of his situation—died without repentance, without grace, without prayer, trusting to a refuge of lies? And would not his death have been a subject of conversation, accompanied with severe remarks, and, perhaps, some scandal, serving to build up error, affright people from the truth, and wound the feelings of his surviving relatives, if any he had?

"Whoso readeth, let him understand."

LOGICAL ARGUMENTS.

Br. Wadsworth, Editor of the Berean, published in Louisville, Ky., had a discussion in Troy, Missouri, in October last, with a Mr. Lancaster, a Campbellite preacher. Mr. L. was assisted by several brethren in the ministry, and some Presbyterians—Br. W. stood alone. The discussion was a calm and candid one, and was discontinued on the part of Mr. L., who, in the whole discussion, carefully avoided laying down a single proposition. The following will show the fortress, with all its outworks, which he had to assault and carry, before he could claim a victory over Br. W. They are a fine specimen of close, pithy reasoning. A. B. G.

The propositions I advanced and defended were these:—

1. "God is the Saviour of all men."

2. He is the Saviour of all men in the same sense in which he is the special Saviour of them that believe.

3. God wills the salvation of all men, and does it, knowing what the result will be; and still wills it, though millions are already dead and unsaved.

4. He does not will all men now saved, but wills all men to be saved, (sothenai,) so that it is an event still future in his will, which relates to the "fulness of times."—Eph. i: 11.

5. "God will render to every man according to his works," and "will by no means clear the guilty." But if any one suffer endless punishment, this can never be true in regard to him, for he never will have received according to his deeds. And on the other hand, if forgiveness saves one from just punishment, it is not true in his case, that God "will by no means clear the guilty."

Besides these propositions, I framed and defended the following arguments, predicated as follows:

Arg. I. 1 John iii: 8, and Heb. ii: 14. 1. "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil—and through death might destroy death;" which is the last work of the devil. Thus the effects are all ceased.

2. "That through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil."—Thus the cause also is ceased;

Therefore, those effects can no more exist, viz., sin and death, for the cause is destroyed.

Arg. II. 1. Most Christians believe that infants, idiots, and Heathen, will be saved in heaven without a knowledge of the Gospel.

2. If so, they are saved independently of faith, for "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God."

Therefore, faith and its obedience is not an indispensable condition of future salvation; no, not a condition at all, for the greatest part of the human family are saved without it.

I will now present the argument called by logicians, reductio absurdem, that is, reducing it to an absurdity.

1. My opponent contends that faith and obedience are indispensable conditions of future salvation. 2. Infants, idiots, and Heathen then can not exercise faith and obedience;—therefore, infants, idiots, and Heathen can not be saved.

Arg. III. 1. Christ can not be said to taste death for any man unless his death produces a saving moral influence either in the man, or for the man. 2. But he is said to "taste death for every man." Therefore, his death does produce, ultimately, a saving moral influence, either in or for every man.

Arg. IV. 1. He who does not believe that he has eternal life in the Son, makes God a liar, for God has recorded it as a fact.—1 John v: 10-12.

2. But if he has not eternal life in the Son, he can not make God a liar by disbelieving it.

Therefore, it is true of him while an unbeliever, that he has eternal life in the Son.

Arg. V. On Mark xvi: 16. 1. Whatever man is required to believe as a truth, must be certain before it is believed.

2. He is required to believe the Gospel as a truth,

Therefore, the Gospel is certain and true before it is believed.

Arg. VI. 1. That which is true and certain, is not conditional.

2. The Gospel is certain: therefore, it is not conditional; or in other words, conditions form no part of the Gospel.

To these arguments I added three more, all predicated upon the promise and oath of God, as follows:—

Arg. I. 1. God has sworn by himself that he will bless all the families, kindreds, and nations of the earth in the seed, "which is Christ."

2. This being blest in Christ, is to be "turned away from their iniquities."—Acts iii: 26.

Therefore, God has sworn by himself to turn away all the families, kindreds, and nations from their iniquities.

Arg. II. 1. Paul makes the immutable promise and oath of God the foundation of our hope.

2. This hope is "as an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast, entering into that within the vail," that is, in heaven. And as this hope of things within the vail is predicated upon this promise and oath of God: therefore, the immutable promise and oath of God refer to things within the vail, that is, in heaven.

Arg. III. 1. The promise and oath of God is, that in Christ all shall be blest by being turned away from their iniquities.

2. The promise and oath reach within the vail, and are of course fulfilled there. Therefore, the blessing of all in Christ, by turning them all away from their iniquities, is to be consummated within the vail, that is, in heaven.

I at first offered but one general argument on the whole subject, which Mr. L. faintly and ineffectually tried to refute. I showed the abortiveness of his attempt, and then offered the three arguments above, upon which I (in effect) challenged all the Partial sects in the land. I furnished my opponent a copy of them, giving him, if necessary, six weeks to refute them. He made no reply to them in the debate.

CHRISTIAN RELIGION.—The will of Patrick Henry, closes with the following paragraph:—

"I have now disposed of all my property to my family, there is one thing more I wish I could give them, and that is the Christian religion. If they had this, and I had not given them one shilling, they would be rich; and if they had not that, and I had given them all the world, they would be poor."

This is the acknowledgment of a gifted man in the last hours of his life, when, we may well believe, that he would speak in perfect sincerity.—And that acknowledgment is a beautiful paraphrase of a sentiment, uttered by an inspired man nearly eighteen centuries ago:—"I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord." Phil. iii: 8.

G. W. M.

THE MOTHER.—Her place can never be supplied; none but she can obtain the entire intimacy with our hearts: in her loss the father feels at once a link broken between him and his children:—she forms the softening medium between his masculine control, and their tender years.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1838.

1 JOHN IV: 1-12.

Perhaps there was not, really, much order and connection in the observations of John, contained in this epistle. To us, at least, of the present day, it is not discernable. But there is a rich fund of spiritual, devotional and practical remark in these detached thoughts. And in meditating upon such a chapter of unconnected instruction, we know of no better method than to select some of the most prominent and practical ideas, and extract therefrom a needed lesson of virtue and resolution.

It is generally supposed, that the first verses of this chapter, have reference to the early errors of the Gnostics and Docetæ, who held that Jesus Christ was a human being only in appearance—that he only seemed to hunger, thirst, grow weary, suffer anguish and pain, during his life; and, after suffering the Jews to waste their impotent malice on the phantom of a body of seeming flesh and blood, and deceiving the whole world by his appearance of humanity, he at last resumed his original and real character as one of the Eons, or bright spiritual emanations of God. This error probably arose from a desire to accomodate Christianity to the feelings and prejudices of the Jewish and heathen worlds. To the Jews, a crucified malefactor as the Messiah, was "a stumbling block," over which their pride and self-righteousness could not go into the kingdom of heaven without a grievous fall. And to the Greeks, or civilized Gentile nations, whose mythology was an endless catalogue of splendid deities, a poor crucified Jew, destitute of the renown acquired by their deified warriors and demi-gods in the field of human slaughter, was "foolishness." To accommodate both parties with such a Messiah as they would receive, the nature of the Christ was exalted by degrees, into the chief Eon of God: and his humanity lessened, until it became a phantom—a mere appearance of flesh and blood. Such, it is supposed, was the error combatted by John in this passage. Every spirit [or doctrine] that confessed or taught that Jesus Christ did not come in real flesh, is declared to be not of God—and the recognition of the humanity of Jesus, is asserted as the, then, test of true Christianity. And though it was unpopular in that world, and the Gnostic heresy was popular, (or, "of the world,") yet he that was of God—who had in him that true spirit of holiness, which sought to please God rather than man—heard the true doctrine and rejected that which made Jesus a deceiver—his history a falsehood, God a liar, and the apostles dupes of an imposture.

But as the truth is of little importance, if it produces not practical effects, the beloved disciple proceeds to urge the highest practical influence of a "Christ crucified," as a commendation of God's love to the world. "Beloved, let us love one another;" (for we are of God;) "for love is of God"—and as "every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God;" so we, who claim to be of God because we receive and teach his truth, must also have in us the perfect fruit of that truth, and prove that we are of God, by loving one another, also.—From the seventh verse, even to beyond the close of our lesson, the duty of brotherly love continues to be urged, and is enforced by every motive that can be drawn from the consideration of God's love to us, and from the necessity that exists of proving that we are "of God," not only by holding and teaching his truth, but by exhibiting his spirit, and imitating his infinitely good and affectionate example.

Brethren and sisters—ours has been and is yet a constant warfare with opposing errors; and manfully and fairly have we endeavored to show that we are "of God," by proving that we hold and teach his truth. But have we sufficiently attended to the other and more important proof that we are "of God"! Have we cultivated in our hearts and souls that spirit of universal benevolence which we teach is God's, and is of God? Have we exhibited to our brethren that brotherly love, which our faith recognizes and requires, inasmuch as it teaches us that God is really and truly the God, and the Father, and the Saviour of all men? Oh, may ours be not only the correct faith, but the perfect practice! P. P.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CONSISTENCY.

I have often thought that there is no subject upon which men appear so inconsistent, as when they talk of honor and justice. This opinion is almost daily confirmed, by listening to the conversation of the (so called) "Orthodox," who assume to themselves this title, because the word originally signified, what it does not in the present application, sound doctrine.

When asked if God will ever cease to be good to his creatures—"God has a law," they will reply, "and that law must be honored." Were it not for this, he might be as kind to his creatures in eternity as in time. But "justice would not be satisfied," neither would God be glorified, without the infliction of pains and tortures beyond the reach of human imagination, upon those of his creatures who bow not to the popular code of theology.

But these views of the nature of the Divine Being, are not only derogatory to his character, but also objectionable because of the influence which they exert upon mankind. The supposition that He possesses such a character, not only deprives us of all real love to him, (inasmuch as we can not love that which is not lovely,) but it shuts us from the blessed practice of loving our enemies, that we may become the children of our Father in heaven; for why should we do acts that his honor will not allow him to do? If God really hates all sinners, we must hate them too; if he inflicts pain for no good purpose, we ought to do the same, or at least desire to do it, otherwise we can not be his children by imitation. And this was the case, undoubtedly, with a certain deacon of the Baptist church, in this town, who, on a visit made in behalf of the church, for the purpose of reclaiming a young lady of the same church, from the almost unpardonable crime of attending Universalist meeting, affirmed that he "could not be so favorable as to hope or wish for the salvation of all men," for "God's law would not be honored by it."

How strange to suppose that God's law would not be honored by the salvation of all men! How strange the supposition that justice can not be satisfied with obedience to God! And doubly strange that those who have themselves felt the dregs of sin, and its consequences, should wish men to continue any longer therein! for not to wish for the salvation of all men from sin, is to wish them to continue in sin. But what is God's law? "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," and "Thou shalt love thy neighbor." But is this all? On these two commandments hang all the law. I appeal to my brethren, to whom I have alluded, or to any other of like faith, to tell me whether God's law can be honored in any better way than by being fulfilled. But shall God's law ever be fulfilled? "One jot or tittle shall not pass from the law until all be fulfilled." And how is God's law to be fulfilled? The whole law is fulfilled in one word, even love—love is the fulfilling of the whole law. When is God's law to be fulfilled? "When every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." And this is the mystery of his will, which he hath made known unto us, that in "in the fulness of times he will gather together in one, all things, both which are in heaven and on earth, even in him." If a son is disobedient to a kind father, which would be more just, to shut him forever from his possessions, depriving him at the same time from the privilege of ever after doing works meet for repentance by obeying that father's kind injunctions, or to take measures to reform him by effecting a reconciliation, and thus restoring him to righteousness and peace? I ask, in which case would justice and mercy meet together? We who hope not for heaven through merit, let us not murmur at the dispensations of God, if he bestow the same free gift upon others, who, like ourselves, are totally unworthy. Let us not wish our fellow-beings to continue in sin; but let us hope for the reconciliation, when "all shall know the Lord," from the least to the greatest.

Warsaw, N. Y., November, 1838. E. R. B.

For the Magazine and Advocate

METHODIST MISREPRESENTATION.

The Rev. P. M. Way, of Cedarville and Litchfield memory, now of this city, has, in connexion with another Methodist clergyman, recently published a volume entitled the "Ecclesiastical Olio," being, as the title page reads, a collection of literary, moral, religious, and miscellaneous anecdotes. Upon being assured by a Methodist friend, that the work contained nothing that any Christian denomination could be offended with, and that the compilers had endeavored to render it acceptable to all, I was about purchasing it; but in looking over it pages, almost the first thing that my eyes rested upon was the following stale and senseless anecdote: "Is there a hell? A pious minister of respectable talents, now in the Methodist connection, was formerly a preacher among the Universalists. The incident which led him seriously to examine the grounds of that doctrine, is striking and singular. He was amusing his little son by telling him the story of the 'children in the Wood.' The boy asked, "What became of the little innocent children?' 'They went to heaven,' replied the father. 'What became of the wicked old uncle?' 'He went to heaven too.' 'Won't he kill them again, father'? said the boy."

Now, that such an incident as the one stated in the above anecdote ever took place, no one who is, in the least, acquainted with the sentiments of Universalists, will pretend, for one moment, seriously to believe. What! a man believe in, and preach, universal reconciliation to God, universal purification, universal holiness and happiness, and at the same time believe that men enter heaven, the habitation of the high and Holy One, with dispositions to kill and murder! Nonsense! The thought is too ridiculous to be credited for a moment. If it could be possible that such a thing ever did transpire, it would only prove that this preacher of "respectable talents" was a "striking and singular"—ignoramus!

But let the truth or the falsehood of the story be as it may, the object of the compilers, in giving it a place in their work, is what I wish more particularly to speak of. The intention undoubtedly was, to convey the idea to those who are ignorant and uninformed as to Universalism, that Universalists hold to the revolting sentiment, that mankind enter heaven unchanged, unreconciled, unregenerated—enter with all their frailties and imperfections, their wicked passions and propensities, their crimes and iniquities—a sentiment which any man in this community ought to blush to charge upon them. Where did P. M. Way ascertain that Universalists hold to such an odious view of the heavenly state? In what Universalist book, pamphlet or periodical did he ever see such a thing advanced? In none? And there is not a Universalist child, six years of age, in or out of the woods, but what could have told him better. Universalists do not believe that any will ever enter the new, the heavenly Jerusalem, until they are cleansed from all pollution, purified and made holy, even as the angels of God in heaven, without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing. They believe that Jesus shall save his people from, not in, their sins—that he will eventually take away, not continue to all eternity, the sin of the world—that the whole intelligent creation shall ultimately be delivered from the thraldom of sin, death and hell, and be translated into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Such is Universalism. Such is the faith which was delivered to the saints, and for which they labored and suffered reproach. And all this

Mr. Way very well knew, for it was Universalism presented in this light, that he attempted to overthrow in his interview with the Rev. L. C. Browne, and in which attempt he was so signally and effectually defeated. Seeing then that these things are so, why should he thus meanly and wickedly misrepresent a denomination whose only fault is, that they believe with St. Paul (what he does not), that God will indeed have all men to be saved, and come unto the knowledge of the truth. Thou shouldst not, friend Way, bear false witness against thy neighbors. Such conduct is peculiarly unbecoming one who makes such uncommon pretensions to piety and religion. He who seeks in any way to make a false impression, says Peter Parley's Almanac, is a liar of a thousand tongues. But I must draw to a close, having written already nearly as much again as I intended, when I commenced. In conclusion, I would observe, that I have not written the above from any ill will, or feeling of enmity toward friend Way. No, God forbid that we should entertain any such feeling towards our erring brother. But I have written thus much, because I thought I observed an intentional misrepresentation by him, of our most holy faith. It is for that reason, and that alone, that I have thus written. "Rebuke a wise man, and he will love thee." W. R.

Utica, December, 1838.

(From the Star in the West)

TO THE BELIEVERS IN THE ABRAHAMIC FAITH, IN THE STATE OF ILLINOIS.

Beloved Brethren:

By the auspicious blessing of divine Providence, I have the happiness of dwelling in this State, and am identified as a preacher of the Gospel of universal love among you, where has been my residence for nearly four years, as a promulgator of that faith "which is every where spoken against." The doctrine of universal salvation, when I came among you, was only known by the misrepresentations of its worst enemies. The eastern missionaries had infused their limited ideas into the minds of all they could induce to become proselytes either by fear or reward, until they could no longer palm their limited ideas of our Father in heaven, upon the inhabitants of the "great valley," nor could the children of the "valley" longer relish the unwholesome food, which had for years been so profusely urged upon them. They deserved and sought for that bread which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life to the world, and to drink from the fountain of everlasting life. Thus did I find my fellow-mortals, when I came among you. The Limitarian clergy, from whom a "messenger of peace" may ever expect to meet with the vile opposition, were scattered through the "Mississippi Valley," ready to oppose every sentiment contrary to the order of their church. Such being the situation when your servant formed his residence in this part of the heritage of our Lord, his hopes and fears may only be realized by those placed in a situation like this; but thanks to the God of heaven, these things were not long to remain; the light of the glorious Gospel began to shine, and the Sun of righteousness has already appeared high in the horizon; the knowledge of the truth is extending through our land; we hear the sound of praise from different parts of our beloved State; societies are springing up around us and calls without number are made to our ministering brethren to "come over and help us."

Twelve months ago, there was not to my knowledge, an organized body of our order in this State. There are now a number of societies, and believers in every portion of the State, and many places where societies ought to be formed without delay. To ascertain where those places are, and to adopt some measures to effect this most desirable object, and the more extensively to extend the "word of life," is the object of this epistle. And beloved brethren and sisters of the faith once delivered to the saints, I trust it will stir you up to action.—Hear, then, I beseech you!!—Hear this appeal, and be not only content to peruse it once, but ponder and act upon it, and follow the plan which I am about to lay down, and in one year more, I am satisfied that it will be a means in the hand of God to the upbuilding of the waste places in Zion. And shall we be idle while every effort is made by our opposing brethren to build up the cause of bigotry and superstion? Shall we lie dormant and inactive and see a moral desolation sweep over our land unmolested—without an effort to ward off its baleful influence from falling upon our children and friends? No; God forbid! but let us "put on the whole armor of our God, and fight manfully for our faith;" and while our Presbyterian brethren are in collision and discord throughout this State, saying, "this is the true General Assembly," and "that is the true General Assembly," let us seek for and build up "our most holy faith;" let us "have a zeal for God," and that zeal tempered with a knowledge of the goodness of our heavenly Father, as manifested in his dealings towards the children of men. But to my PLAN.

In Nov. 1837, the friends of Universalism met for the purpose of consulting upon the best means of extending the Gospel in the State of Illinois, when and where a "State Convention" was formed, which, according to its "Constitution," holds an annual session on the 2d Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, in May, in each year, for the purpose of taking into consideration, from time to time, the state of our cause, and meeting our brethren from various parts of the State, and holding sweet communion together. The Convention has held two sessions, and we are able to testify that thus far, although in its infancy, it has met our most sanguine expectations, and that it may be more and more useful. Brethren, we confidently call upon you for a united effort; and that every portion of our State may be heard from at the next session of this body in May next, I propose—

1st. That in every neighborhood where a society can be, let one be formed, and appoint a delegate who will attend the Convention at Rushville, and that the Clerk give an abstract of the time of its formation, the number of members, and the names of the officers. If a delegate, by distance or otherwise, can not attend, let the Clerk of the Society write a circular to the Standing Clerk of the Convention, J. P. Fuller, Henderson, Knox county, Ill., or to me, same place, and they will be duly presented to the body. Or if thought advisable, appoint a committee to write the circular.

2d. In sections of the State where settlements are small, or but a few friends, so that a society can not be formed, let the friends meet and appoint a delegate, and let the Clerk of the meeting state as near as he can, the number of believers, and whether they have or have not had preaching, and also, if they desire preaching, and all other information necessary to give a knowledge of the cause around them. If a delegate can not be sent, do as in the instruction No. 1.—Send a circular.

3d. Where there are but few friends in a county, let them assemble and appoint a delegate, or write a circular; but in all cases, let delegates attend when they can, and I am satisfied that there is not a county in this State, where a delegate may not, in this way, be appointed.

4th. Brethren, connected with this Convention, is an "Institution" for the purpose of furnishing books of our order, and you who wish books, can give to your delegate a catalogue, and find them at the Convention; by so doing you will assist the "Institute," and extend the knowledge of the truth.

Our ministering brethren, I confidently call upon to urge the necessity of this plan, and I am satisfied that we shall see much good done in this way.

It is desirable that we should establish circuit preaching, and this subject will probably be brought before the Convention at its next session, and to this end, brethren, will you let us hear from you? If so, state what can be done, and give the distance from the county seat of your county, and the distance from other neighborhoods where they wish preaching.

In conclusion, my brethren, do not, I beseech you, do not forget this subject, but make every effort in your power to effect it: and to my sisters, you also, have a work to do; it is your province to encourage, and to put the brethren in remembrance of their duty—stir them up to a proper zeal, let union be our watchword, and truth our guide, and the Lord of the harvest will crown our efforts with a blessing; then let us hear from you all, that you may make the hearts of your servants glad, and rejoice in the fulness of joy.

A. R. Gardner.

Henderson, Knox county, Ill., October 24, 1838.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. Grosh, Editor; A. R. Bartlett, Assistant Editor.
G. W. Montgomery, E. H. Chapin, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1838.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. XVIII.

"After that he poureth water into a bason, and began to wash his disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded."—John xiii: 5.

The fact here related, took place immediately after the supper, before our Saviour went to the garden of Gethsemane; and although the fact itself is simple, yet I wish to direct your minds to an oriental custom, which renders the whole circumstance still more intelligible. It was the custom in eastern nations, and according to Niebuhr, is so among the Arabs to this day, to wear sandals instead of what we call shoes. A sandal is a round piece of leather or wood, fitted to the sole of the foot, and fastened to it by two straps, one of which passes over the instep, and the other over the lower part of the foot.—As nothing else was worn on the feet but sandals, they became covered with dust in walking. Hence, it was a universal custom, when an individual entered the house of a neighbor, for one of the lowest order of servants to advance, take off his sandals and wash his feet; but sometimes, when the guest was very much respected and high in rank, the master himself performed this duty.

In view of these facts, how much stronger appears the statement of John the Baptist; "he that cometh after me, is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear." Matt. iii: 11. That is, he is so much greater than I, that I am not worthy to bear his sandals from his feet in washing, though that is the duty of the lowest order of servants. In what manner could he have more clearly expressed a sense of his own humility? The object of our Saviour in performing this office of a servant to his disciples, is striking. Supposing that the kingdom of the Redeemer would be of a temporal character, the disciples expected to have high offices in it, as a reward for having followed Jesus; and we find, that sometimes they disputed among themselves, who should have the highest office, or be nearest Jesus upon his throne. By performing the menial duty of washing their feet, our Saviour set them an example of humility, teaching them that they should not be above each other, but should be friends, equal in faith and in the discharge of duty.—This example had the desired effect; for in all their future labors, they were humble as well as kind to each other. Indeed, how could they resist such an example? To see the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, who was filled with the wisdom of the heavens, and whose name was to be heard and sung in the uttermost parts of the earth; to see him thus employed, must not only have been a cutting rebuke to their ambition, but also have melted them with the power of divine love.

As it was not forgotten by them, so we should never forget that scene of humility; it is a lesson for us, as well as for the primitive disciples, not to be above each other; but in all things to be friends, cherishing a disposition to assist each other in times of sickness and trouble, considering ourselves as equal brethren and sisters in the faith, made so by the love of Christ in all holiness. The very spirit of our faith is contrary to distinction of feeling. The ambition which it gives, is to be good, to grow in the knowledge of Christianity, and to daily increase in loving God more fervently, and man more universally. We should feel ourselves open to assist all men in righteousness, as we have opportunity. If our blessed Lord could wash the feet of his disciples, surely we can not refuse to be ready to assist the sick and the wanting, and be humble in the discharge of all our duty. Let our prayer be, to possess the disposition of our Saviour, that our hearts may beam with his love, our conduct be warmed with his prudence, our confidence in God strengthened by his example, and our faith brightened by the clear heavenly principles which he uttered.

G. W. M.

EXCOMMUNICATIONS.

There have been, during my residence in Auburn, several excommunications from the various churches in this village, for simple difference of faith. In view of those excommunications, I wonder how people, with the New Testament in their hands, can approve of them, when Christianity gives not the least countenance to the test by which membership is granted or withdrawn. In the days of the apostles, the direction was, "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ," and this was sufficient for a man to be viewed as a Christian believer. But in these days, not only must he believe in Christ, but he must also believe that quite a portion of the human family will be endlessly miserable, or he must subscribe to the General Confession of Faith, before he can be admitted into the church. And, after he is once admitted, if his views become so enlarged, that he beholds Christ as actually the "Saviour of the world," then he is excluded as a heretic; as though the belief, that God is so good as to save all people, is the ne plus ultra of all combined error.

The charge specified against one individual, who was expelled from the Baptist church, was "for embracing the doctrine of Universalism," and for "neglecting" "covenant obligations." In another case, the charge urged against an individual, who was expelled from the 2d Presbyterian church, was, "avowing his belief in the doctrine of universal salvation," and "his disbelief in the doctrine of the future punishment of the wicked, as taught in the Confession of Faith," and for "neglecting to attend upon the stated worship and ordinances of the church." Both of these individuals are firm believers in the Restitution, and their moral character is not to be impeached. Their only crime, is, having a broader faith than the churches to which they belonged; or, in other words, they believe that all will be saved, while the churches believe that only a part will be saved.

In the first place, the charge was, believing the Restitution. This was considered sufficient to withdraw the fellowship of the church from the individual. But, we would earnestly ask the members of the Baptist church, in what part of the Bible, do they find authority for expelling a person on the ground of believing in the salvation of all? Did the apostles ever give any directions for marking as heretics, those who received Christ as "the Saviour of all men"? We fearlessly affirm, that such a reason for exclusion from the church, is wholly unsanctioned by Christ and his disciples; so far so, that they taught, that when Christ shall have subdued all things to himself, God shall "be all in all."

In the other case, one specified charge was, not believing in future punishment, according to the Confession of Faith. By the phrase "future punishment," endless woe is undoubtedly intended. There is a fact here elicited, which is not a little remarkable. The individual is not charged with disbelieving a doctrine which is taught in the Bible, but which is taught in the Confession of Faith—thus the creed-book wholly usurps the place of the Bible. Now, if the sects of the day can find directions in Christianity, instructing them to make a creed-book the test of Christian fellowship, then are they correct in their procedure. But if such instructions are not found in the Bible, then is the whole affair of excluding members by the laws of a creed-book, wholly antichristian. Besides, though the Confession of Faith is made the test of church-membership, yet not one in twenty of the persons, who formally assent to it, believe some of its most leading principles. And we may safely remark, that ten out of twenty are entirely ignorant of what the Confession does teach. More thoughts on this point, will be given in an article to be entitled "the Confession of Faith," soon to be published.

Even if we admit that endless woe is truth, and the Restitution is heresy, yet, it is very evident that the heresy is more comely than the truth. Let a person consider the endless misery of a portion of the human family; a misery which is to increase through eternity, amid shrieks and blasphemies. Let a person, on the other hand, consider this same portion of the human family, as punished according to their deeds, for the purpose of reforming them, that they may become obedient to the Father and be saved from all evil. And then consider which of these two views is most consistent with reason and benevolence; which looks like "good news of glad tidings to all people"; which looks most like the statement, that Messiah is "the propitiation for the sins of the whole world," and that "he shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied." And he will have no difficulty in deciding, that what the Confession of Faith denominates truth, is as foreign from the spirit of the Gospel, as the Restitution is in perfect agreement with it.

In conclusion, let excommunications be continued—they no longer excite the fear which they formerly have done. On the contrary, so far are they from being a fear, that people are beginning to act like the Bereans in searching the Bible, and if, in searching, they are led to alter their opinions, they declare that alteration, in spite of creeds or excommunications. May the good work prosper, until the Bible shall take the place of all creed-books.

G. W. M.

OUR NEXT VOLUME.

However depressed we may be by past and present deficiencies in pecuniary matters, we beg leave to assure our subscribers, that our hopes for the future are yet strong and bright enough to keep us from sinking into the utter apathy of despair. During the next volume we hope to receive amends for much that we have lost and suffered during the past two volumes. Then, we hope, our subscription list will be filled as full as ever—old discontinuers will return, and agents will gather in new subscribers to make up for past deficiencies. Then—but what is the use of telling what we hope our subscribers will do? Their deeds will, in due time, tell the whole story—so let us turn the leaf, and write what we will do, or, rather, what preparations we have been and yet are making towards the next volume.

As it is to be to us one of the most joyful and pleasant of all we have ever edited, we have resolved to make it to our subscribers one of the most delightful and interesting they have ever read. For this purpose, (as they will see by an article devoted especially to that very pleasant announcement,) we have engaged Br. Austin's pen in a series of articles on the duties of Husbands, Wives, and Parents—similar in character to his celebrated Voice to Youth. Br. S. R. Smith will continue, more rapidly than he could during the present volume, his articles on the Evidences of Christianity. These two series, alone, will be worth the entire advance price of the volume. In addition to these bone and sinew portions of the volume—solid matter, and good—we have engaged a series of brief articles, of a highly practical character, on the various duties of life, religious and social, as based on the principles of Universalism. They are from a pen little known, but fully able to make itself favorably known, as will be seen in due time. We have made application to several others of our best correspondents for series of short articles, such as we believed they would excel in, but have not yet received answers. We shall, also, probably apply to some others for special articles on particular subjects, as we may hereafter find time to think of. These things here glanced at, we beg our readers to remember, are the extras—besides these there will be found the usual variety of excellent articles, on various subjects, and from fifty or one hundred correspondents—many of which, I am sure, will very generally be thought equal to any of the specially requested and specially prepared articles. Then—there are the editorials—you all know what they are—suffice it to say of all except my own, that, as they can not well be better than they now are, they will not be any worse; and Br. Chapin's we hope will be more frequently visible than they have been during the honey moon!

For myself—my single self—I can only say, that if raised above perpetual want, I will raise myself above perpetual fretting and heaviness of heart; and, consequently, will be better able to perform my duties as they should be performed. At all events, after the first of January next, I will be free to devote my whole time, whenever needed, to my editorial duties. This, alone, will enable me to do better than I have been able to do for a year past.

Thus have we laid before our agents and friends a brief expose of our hopes, and of the exertions to which they have stimulated us in behalf of the next volume.—We really—seriously believe we can make it worth more than its entire cost to every subscriber that will attentively read it, and as useful to the great cause of God and humanity, as any paper of its size in the order. Believing thus, and thus frankly stating our intentions, we humbly ask the aid of all to still further extend its usefulness, by increasing its prompt paying subscribers.—Now is the time—let all be done that can be done, during this month, that we may regulate our edition for next year with the least possible loss to us, and the certainty of giving to every new subscriber a full file of the new volume.

A. B. G.

A VOICE TO HUSBANDS, WIVES, AND PARENTS.

With more than ordinary satisfaction I am able to announce to our readers, that, after much solicitation on our part, and diffident hesitancy on the part of Br. J. M. Austin, we have at last prevailed on him to furnish for our columns, a series of articles, similar to the Voice to Youth in their character, but addressed to persons in married life. The series will be commenced as soon as Br. Austin can make his preliminary arrangements—probably during the first quarter of the next volume.—It will be published as rapidly as may suit the author's convenience to furnish the copy, and, when completed, will be put into book form, to match the Voice to Youth.

Thus will be completed a series, we have long desired to behold in our denomination. A want, long existing and deeply felt, will thus be supplied by a pen, which, in the Voice to Youth, has already won high approbation and judicious praise, not only from our own periodicals, but from the religious papers of our opposers, and especially from the best literary periodicals in our country—as The New-England Galaxy, The New-York Mirror, The New-Yorker, and The Knickerbocker. Nor is this all. The reading public has endorsed these praises wherever the work has been read; and in the short space of about six months, an edition of 1500 copies has nearly all been sold by the publishers, and a new stereotyped edition been commenced.

We beg to be excused for dwelling so very complacently on this subject; for it is one that gives us unusual pleasure, whenever we reflect on our humble agency in producing that work: and, besides, we believe that it can not but be gratifying to those of our readers who admired it in its progress in our columns, to find their sanguine predilections in its favor thus confirmed by the voice of the public—of the entire literary circle. Will they not, then, anticipate with much delight, the appearance of another work in the same manner, and from the same able pen? If so, will they not endeavor to extend that pleasure to others, by inducing them to become subscribers to the paper in which the work will first be published?

It is not to be concealed that there are difficulties attending the execution of the work here announced, greater than existed in writing the Voice to Youth. The subjects are similar in many respects, yet must be so treated as to avoid sameness—the author has not such a full and long (though a more recent and vivid) experience to draw upon, as he had in the other case. But he is sensible of the difficulties—too sensible of them, I would say—and we are confident that that very sensibility will be the best guaranty that can be given for his avoiding them. At least, as ours is wholly the fault in having fairly importuned him into the task, we feel bound to solicit for him the full exercise of patience, charity and forbearance, should he in any case seem to fall short of his high and generous aim; and to ask that he may be cheered onward, whenever he merits the applause of the good and the discerning. Thus much we say, to satisfy his doubts—we have no doubt of either his will or ability to execute well the task he has reluctantly undertaken.

A. B. G.

INDIFFERENCE AMONG UNIVERSALISTS.

It may seem strange that a denomination of Christians who are ready to defend their faith against the assaults of its enemies, as Universalists generally are, should be charged with indifference. And it must be admitted, that those who really enjoy our blessed faith, are at all times disposed to rejoice in view of the prosperity of Zion, the news of which is almost daily greeting our ears, from all parts of our highly favored land. A spirit of inquiry has gone abroad, which is working powerfully in the hearts of men, and preparing the way for such a reformation in religious faith as was never seen before—perhaps for a universal pentecost. Men are learning that reason can be employed in religious, as well as in secular affairs. Already, there is probably a majority of the members of orthodox churches, who can not in heart assent to the creed to which they subscribe. Besides, even the proselyting meetings of our opposing brethren, are means of increasing our numbers by the addition of many real, practical, thinking Christians, and strengthening our cause by wasting their own energies in wild and fruitless efforts to put it down. Certainly then, if ever a body of Christians has had reason to engage in the work of evangelizing the world with zeal and fidelity, Universalists have it.

But, brethren, permit me to ask if there is not too much coldness and indifference in our ranks upon this momentous subject? How many societies are there, who might, with less trouble than it is to remain within doors all day, assemble together for exhortation, prayer, and social praise, every Sabbath, or, at least as often as once in two weeks, who never think of employing their Sabbaths in public religious exercises, unless they get an appointment from some of our ministering brethren. And how many others who have stated preaching either all or a part of the time, who if disappointed by the non-appearance of their preacher, have not zeal sufficient to carry on a meeting without him, but return to their homes without one single public thanksgiving to God for his past goodness, or song of praise in testimony of the gratitude of their hearts. Ought these things to be thus? Is the public worship of God so devoid of interest to our feelings, that we can not take upon ourselves the duty of sustaining meetings for social prayer and praise? I greatly fear, if this be the case, that, unless we awake from our indifference, the success which has heretofore characterized our efforts, will, ere long, change to mortification and disgrace. Recollect that when the Gospel was rejected by those to whom it was first offered, its great Teacher turned to the Gentiles; and beware lest the blessings and privileges which are now too indifferently prized by us, be taken away and given to those who will be disposed to appreciate them.

For numerous reasons, I am decidedly in favor of social religious conferences, where Christians can get together, and exchange the word of comfort and edification, and contemplate the hopes and joys of religious communion. Paul exhorts his Hebrew brethren, among other things, not to forsake the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some is. And it is evident that this thing was practiced among the early Christians, with good results. The same good will follow its adoption and practice among ourselves. It will serve to cement our hearts together,—to unite us in the bonds of Christian charity. It displays a reciprocity of feeling, and a sameness of interest, which generally prompts to energy in the upbuilding of the cause of righteousness.

Among our opposers generally, it is the practice to meet for religious exercises as often as once a week besides Sunday, and in some places, almost every evening. And yet they have much less reason to be thankful, than we have; while, it appears to me that we display much less zeal in the promulgation of our faith, than they do in the dissemination of what we deem dangerous errors.

I do not advocate, however, the propriety of following entirely their example. For unquestionably, they not only injure their own health, but pervert the morals of many an unthinking youth, by the outrage which they so often commit upon good order, in their meetings. I recollect of once hearing an anecdote of Whitfield, (I think it was, but am not certain,) who, hearing a sailor sing a somewhat rude song, to a beautiful piece of music, desired him to repeat it until he could learn it. Some of his companions, knowing him to be a clergyman, expressed surprise that he should manifest so much fondness for the song. His reply was, that he had no notion of letting the devil run away with the best tunes.

If our opposers run away with the best method of sustaining their cause, let us see to it, that we secure, for the truth, all that is valuable in their example. Let us have the music, and then, they may have the song if they will. I know indeed, that sensible men have become disgusted with the abuses which have resulted from mingling superstition with the performance of religious duties. But shall we throw away the gold because it has been tarnished by the breath of profanity? Shall we despise the diamond because it has glittered on the brow of the bigot? Shall we impotently witness the pearl, trodden under the feet of swine, and not make one effort to redeem it from the degradation which has been heaped upon it, and appropriate it to a better use? Shame upon the man who will act thus in spiritual matters!

Brethren, we must awake! We must manifest more devotion to the cause of universal reconciliation. The good of the cause demands it. Our own enjoyment will be increased by it, and many will be induced to join us, who now complain that they can not see in us, that degree of devotion which their judgment tells them should accompany the conviction of the truth of our faith. We are told by those who have fed upon the husks of popular theology, until they are almost starved, that we are too cold, too indifferent to the spirit of our doctrine.—They have been accustomed to the belief that true religion should warm our hearts with that engagedness which prompts its possessor to diffuse his joy into the hearts of others by all laudable means. And they justly observe, that prayer and conference meetings among brethren and neighbors, are among the best means for uniting mankind in the bonds of peace, allaying whatever spirit of bitterness may have been engendered between man and man, becoming acquainted with each other's spiritual difficulties, establishing the weak in faith, convincing the half persuaded, evincing the spiritual effect of our faith to those who will not hear it defended by a preacher, commingling the affections of heart with heart and soul with soul, in the mutual expression of our desires, and gratitude to God, and of strengthening our faith in the contemplation of his goodness and wonderful works to the children of men. Brethren, think of these things.

A. R. B.

THE BIBLE.

There are some persons, who, in order to derogate from the merits of the Bible, affirm that the simple light of nature and the dictates of conscience, are all the guides we need, to lead us to truth and virtue. But if the same glorious results which the Bible has produced in the world, could be traced to an infidel book for their cause, to Palmer's Principles of Nature, or to Taylor's Diegesis, those results would be claimed as one of the most powerful proofs in favor of the excellency of that book. If skepticism could adorn its brows with the trophies of souls reclaimed from sin, and multitudes comforted in a dying hour, which the Bible claims, it would straightway be exalted as the noblest friend of the world, and its votaries would triumph in such exhibitions. But when the system of the humble Nazarene, shows myriads of souls redeemed from sin and error, as the fruits of its power, they are not allowed as evidence that the Bible is holy. Such a course is neither just or consistent.

G. W. M.

 A VOICE TO HUSBANDS, WIVES, AND PARENTS.—Br. J. M. Austin, the author of the popular work, "A Voice to Youth," has been engaged to write a similar work, addressed to persons in married life, which will appear in the columns of the next volume of the Magazine and Advocate. Br. S. R. Smith's series of articles on the Evidences of Christianity, and some other special articles, from able pens, will also add to its interest and utility. If any other inducements are wanting to secure an increase of patronage, they may be found in the following

OFFERS.

For four new subscribers, and the pay in advance, free of expense to us—or for three new subscribers and a five dollar bill, at our expense—we will give a full file of volume seven of the paper.

For ten new subscribers, and the pay in advance, we will give volumes 7 and 9 in full, and volume 8, except Nos. 22 and 26. This offer will furnish the entire discussion (thus far) between Br. Skinner and Alexander Campbell.

For six new subscribers, and the pay in advance, free of postage, we will give all the numbers containing the discussion between Messrs. Skinner and Campbell, together with all the other numbers of volume 8, except 22 and 26, and of Volume 9, except Nos. 12 and 13.

G. and H.

 Will the Union, and Trumpet, and other papers with whom we exchange, please add the above to the Prospectus they are now publishing for us? We will pay in kind, commencing for the Union and Trumpet next week.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. WOOLLEY, at Oran—Br. T. D. COOK, at Marcellus.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. S. BROWN, in Walton—Br. M. B. SMITH, at Middleville—Br. EDDY, at Otselic—Br. WOLLEY, at Howlet Hill, near Br. Butler's—Br. J. S. KIBBE, at Fly Creek, and at same place, on Christmas Eve.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. SMITH, at Salisbury Centre—Br. HAYWARD, at North Norwich—Br. WOOLLEY, in Madison.

Christmas Eve will be appropriately celebrated in the Universalist church at North Bloomfield, on the evening of the 24th inst. Sermon adapted to the occasion, by Rev. J. CHASE. Also, at Lebanon. Sermon by Br. DELONG. House decorated and illuminated. Also, at North Norwich. House decorated and illuminated for the occasion.

The celebration of Christmas Eve at Denmark, is postponed to the evening of the 25th, being the evening preceding the commencement of the Quarterly Conference of the Black River Association.

Christmas Eve will be celebrated in this city by a concert of sacred music, and an appropriate address.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper

P M, Water Vale, for R S Jr—P M, Phœnix, for A A—D V V, North Almond—Rev W H W, Watertown—J D, Aurora—J H, Tiffin (O)—P W R, Lafargeville, for self and O D—P M, Steshequin, (Pa) for Z F, A M, T R D and R S—E F, Martinsburg, (O) for H D and D H—J P and T P, Liverpool—P M, Gates Mills, (O) for L J—Rev J S F, Darien Centre; for C L, A T, W W, W and T J J—M B, Buffalo, for C M, E D and M B—P M, Leamonsville, (O) for L C P—P M, Tuscarora, for C H.

POETRY

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE MOURNER COMFORTED.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

Come lone mourner, dry thy tears,
Jesus died the world to save;
Banish now thy gloomy fears,
All thy griefs and sorrows leave.

Look to yonder heavens above,
Where in triumph Jesus pass'd,
Soaring on the wings of love,
Where we all shall meet at last.

God our Father rules the world,—
He protects his children here;
Death's dark banner, now unfurled,
Soon shall fall and disappear.

Brighter scenes than here we view,
O'er the world shall soon extend;
Every prospect will be new,
When to God all souls ascend.

Cease thy sighs, thy tears and grief,
Jesus is the mourner's friend;
He will grant thee sure relief,
All thy sorrows soon shall end.

(From the Sabbath School Journal.)

THE CHILDREN'S PRAYERS.

God of the wide creation—
Of air, and earth, and sea,
Accept the young oblation
We children bring to THEE.
We come, Thy saints attending;
And join our notes with theirs;
At mercy's footstool bending,
We lift our youthful prayers.

And will the Lord of glory
Who dwell's beyond the sky,
Hark to our humble story,
And answer from on high?
He will! for he hath told us,
In His eternal word,
His eyes always behold us—
His ears have ever heard.

When Samuel bowed before Him,
And clasped his hands and prayed,
God taught him to adore Him,
And heard the prayer he said;
Now, Samuel's God is near-us,
Where we have met to-day;
He bows His ear to hear us,
And teaches us to pray.

Then bless, O God of Heaven,
Those to our hearts so dear,
Let light and truth be given
To all our teachers here.
O! grant us thy good Spirit
Our wayward hearts to rule,
That we may grace inherit
Within our SABBATH SCHOOL.

SYRA.

"See fruitful Syra stored with grass, to keep
The bellowing oxen and the bleating sheep;
Her sloping hills, the mantling vines adorn,
And her rich valleys wave with golden corn."

This delightful Island of the Grecian Archipelago, anciently known by the name of Syros and Syria, is about forty-five miles in circumference. Its general appearance is rough and hilly. Towards the north, its hills assume the size of mountains, steep, and fantastically shaped.—On the south, those portions which can be elevated to cultivation, are as fertile now, as in the days of the Father of Poetry, who was for many ages considered the best geographer of Greece. The red wine, its principal production, though much valued in Greece, is hardly sufficient to form an object of commerce, or be much known in distant countries.

On the south-east side of the Island, is its capital, bearing the same name. Love of liberty here, as in most other parts of Greece, induced the founders of this town to nestle their habitations, of dazzling whiteness, around the declivities of a conical hill of considerable height. It is nearly two miles distant from the harbor. The houses are built with massy walls, and so precipitous is the ground they occupy, that their flat roofs serve for piazzas to the occupants of the dwellings next above them. The streets are narrow, and resemble slippery staircases, extremely dangerous in rainy seasons. The Catholic cathedral crowns the summit of the hill. From the terrace of this splendid edifice, the scenery, irradiated by a cloudless sky, is one of surpassing magnificence and beauty. To the south-east lies the modern city, Hermonpolis, (or city of Mercury,) so called on account of its extensive commerce. It rises on the acclivities of receding hills, like an ampitheatre, embracing a safe and capacious harbor. Numbers of windmills, erected on the most conspicuous eminences, and hundreds of vessels of all nations, lying in parallel lines, as it were, within the arms of the city, tend to enhance still more the beauty of the foreground. Beyond this the eye of the beholder, without the aid of a glass, can see the clustering Cyclades, spread out in all their rich and varied coloring.

The inhabitants of the upper and more ancient town, are nearly all Catholics. They separated themselves from the Greek or Eastern church, when the Genoese and Venetian republics were at the acme of their power, and promised to protect any of the Grecian Islands against the common enemy of the Christian name, provided they would forsake the peculiar religious tenets of their fathers, and acknowledge the supremacy of the pope.—Though descendants of Greeks, and equally oppressed by the same tyrant, they felt not that impulse which roused the best energies of the Greek nation in 1821.—Promising secretly to continue their obedience to the Porte, they were safe from any invasion that threatened their neighbors. Thus, this Island, lying in the midst of a most bloody arena, when extermination was the order of the day, became the asylum of multitudes who survived the wreck of their homes and families. Fatherless children, widows, and childless parents, there took refuge. The dense population which soon thronged this favorite Island, tempted merchants from various parts of Greece and of other maritime nations, to seek it as their abode.

Hermonpolis thus drew nutriment from the distresses and fears of some, and the commercial enterprise of others. Its population, amounting to nearly forty thousand, for the most part native Greeks, eclipsed the original inhabitants of the upper town in power and influence. Hermonpolis is the residence of the Nomarch, or Governor of a district, including many Islands, who is appointed by the king of Greece. Ever since the commencement of the Greek revolution, it has been the store house of Russian and Egyptian grain, for the consumption of the whole of Greece. Its principal street is about half a mile in length, and from ten to thirteen feet broad. It is paved with large and shapeless stones, irregularly laid.—A kind of awning, made of canvass, suspended over the street, intercepts the rays of the sun by day, and light of the moon by night. This whole street, together with many others which strike off at right angles from ten to twenty rods in length, are filled with merchandize and tradesmen of every name and degree. Besides other places of public instruction, there is a mission school, to which is attached a printing press in active operation, under the direction of Rev. Dr. Robertson, a learned and indefatigable missionary of the Protestant Episcopal church, in the United States of America. At a short distance from the city is a spacious enclosure, with warehouses for a quarantine ground. Hermonpolis contains also a hospital and several beautiful churches; a basino, or merchants' exchange, and many coffee houses.

Varied and interesting associations, connected with a residence of two years in Syra, throng my memory. To describe some of them, would be to me a pleasure. But the space allotted me is expended, and I close with a feeling of gratitude for having been permitted to occupy it; and also, with a consciousness that where brevity is an object, there may be hazard in allowing a Greek to expatiate on any portion of his own dear native clime.

EDUCATION OF CHILDREN.

Mothers should never remit their exertions, until by teaching their children to think, they familiarize them with the power and use of their own minds. Especially let them not "despise the day of small things," nor despair, if the effect of their arduous labor, is not immediately, or distinctly visible. A friend of the great Michael Angelo, saw him one day at work upon a statue. Long afterward, he called, and it was yet unfinished.

"Have you been idle?"

"Ah, no. I have retouched here, and polished there. I have softened this feature, and brought that muscle forth in bolder relief. I have given more expression to the lip, more grace and energy to the form."

"Still these are but trifles."

"It may be so. But recollect that trifles make perfection, though perfection itself is no trifle."

The sculptor upon his dead marble ought not to surpass in patience, us who fashion the living image, and whose work is upon the "fleshy tables of the heart."

HOW SHOES WERE BOUGHT FOR A BAREFOOTED SABBATH SCHOOL BOY.—As a little girl about eight years old returned from her Sabbath School one day last Summer, she told her mother there was a boy in the school, who had no shoes on. "Mother," said she, "what can I do to get him a pair of shoes? Will you get him some?"

"I will tell you," answered her mother. "If you will take the flowers off of your bonnet, I can sell them for thirty-seven and a half cents, which will help get a pair of shoes."

The girl took her bonnet immediately, and began to take off the pretty flowers which she had wished for only a few weeks before to ornament herself. Her little sister,—nearly two years younger,—would not be outdone in this work of self-denial, and she desired to give up her flowers also. Their mother took the dear children's offering, and bought the poor barefooted boy a pair of shoes. —Sunday School Visitor.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 5th inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. CHARLES G. BUNELL, Jr., of this city, to Miss SUSAN A. BELL, of Norwich, Chenango county.

In Fort Plain, September 13th, by Rev. Joh Potter, Mr. ROBERT H. BAR, to Miss MINERVA C. WILBER, both of Sharon.

Also, in Sharon, October 17th, by the same, Mr. JOHN C. RINES, to Miss ANNA MARIA BROWN, both of Sharon

Also, in Fultonville, November 10th, by the same. Mr. DAVID K. POTTER, to Miss ELIZA VAN ANTWERP, both of Glen, Montgomery county.

Also, in Sharon, November 13th, by the same, Mr. L. U BAXTER, to Miss LYDIA ESSIE, both of Sharon.

Also, in same place, November 18th, by the same Mr. JOHN B. COOK, to Miss SARAH ANN ANTHONY, both of Sharon.

In Burlington, October 28th, by Rev. I. Hayward, Mr. JOHN PERRY, of Canandaigua, to Miss MARY ANN BUTTON, of the former place.

Also, in same place, November 15th, by the same, Mr. GEORGE M. MURDOCK, to Miss SARAH ANN PRATT, all of Burlington.

In Canton, October 21st, by Rev. F. J. Briggs, Mr. THOMAS GOODMAN, to Miss ELIZABETH GILL.

DEATHS.

In the town of Ohio, Herkimer county, November 29th, Mr. HORATIO N. FOX, aged 28 years, 10 months, and 18 days. The consoling faith of Abraham spread around his pillow the radiance of an undying hope, and enabled him to die as he had lived, in peace with man, and in love with God. Funeral services by

J. G. McADAM.

In Skaneateles, October 30th, of dropsy in the head, SAMUEL H. CASE, aged 2 years and 6 months. In the morning of his days, was he taken to live in another and a better world. May the truth of him who blessed little children, console the afflicted parents. G. W. M.

In Nelson, Madison county, June 26th, of consumption, Mrs. CHARLOTTE, wife of Benjamin Hammond, in the 35th year of her age.

Though a believer in the doctrine of endless misery, she seemed to have lost its selfishness, by an increased confidence that the goodness of her heavenly Father was not confined to any number of his dependent children, short of the whole. When told that she was dying, she expressed her gratitude at the goodness of her God in making her dying moments the happiest of her life, and her joy in even the faint hope that he would not be less kind in a future world, to the whole human family.

Also, August 15th, OLIVE W HAMMOND, aged 1 year. May the husband and father find his faith in a world's salvation, amply sufficient to sustain him under all his trials.—Com.

In Newport, November 15th, of dropsy on the brain, EUGENE, son of Norton and Charlotte Douglass, aged 14 months, and 26 days.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months: $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1838. NUMBER 51.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

Delivered in the Free Church, Clinton, on Thanksgiving Day, November 29th, 1838.

BY REV. T. CLOWES, LL. D.

(Published by request of the Congregation.)

"Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men."—PSALM cvii: 8.

"To acknowledge the bounties of the Giver of all good, and to cherish grateful recollections of his beneficence, is eminently worthy of an intelligent and highly favored people. Whether we contemplate our condition in reference to the number and magnitude of the benefits we have received, or in contrast with less favored portions of the earth, we find abundant reasons for devout thankfulness to the sovereign Arbiter of nations. In an especial manner are we furnished with persuasive motives to gratitude in his providential dealings with us during the past season. Our fields have been fertilized by the early and the latter rains—the toils of the husbandman have been rewarded with plentiful harvests—our habitations have been preserved in peace, and our families have been protected from the pestilence that walketh in darkness, and the destruction that wasteth at noon-day; the clouds which gathered for a time gloomily over us, have passed away, and we are again restored to individual and national prosperity; we still continue in the full enjoyment of those civil, social and religious rights and privileges which so highly distinguish us as a people."

Such are the reasons which have induced the Governor of this State, in conformity with established and pious usage, to designate this day, "to be observed as a day of public thanksgiving to Almighty God, and to recommend to the good people of this State, to unite, on this occasion, in offering the tribute of grateful hearts to their divine Benefactor, for the numerous blessings, which he has so mercifully vouchsafed to them during the past year."

The monarch of Israel seems to have been impressed with similar sentiments, when he penned the psalm from which we have selected our text, "O, give thanks," says he, "unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever." Then, after stating various special reasons for thanksgiving, he concludes each head with the words which we propose to make the foundation of our present discourse. "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness; and for his wonderful works to the children of men."

We will at this time, as appropriate to the duties which have called us together into the temple of God, consider some of the reasons which the children of men have, to praise the Lord for his goodness; some of those wonderful works which should excite us to exalt and magnify the Lord our God.

1. The first reason of thankfulness which presents itself to our notice; and that which calls upon all men to praise God, is, the gift of existence.

That we exist, and that our existence is the gift of an infinitely wise, powerful and benevolent Being, is in itself an argument, independent of all other considerations, for the devout gratitude of every individual of the human family. It is the motive—the universal motive of thankfulness which has induced the unsophisticated heart of Jew, Christian or Heathen, to bend at one common altar, and in one common prayer to acknowledge, as from one heart, that God is good; to rejoice in the blessings which this truth seals to the children of men. Under the influence of this grateful thought, behold the myriads of worshippers in the temple in Jerusalem, joining with their monarch in pious acknowledgment that "the Lord, he is God; it is he that hath made us, and not we curselves; we are his people and the sheep of his pasture." Led by the same sentiment, behold the myriads of Christian worshippers joining in the prayer, which the Son of God and man, hath taught his brethren in the flesh to use,—"our Father who art in heaven,"—or acknowledging with the apostle Paul, that "we are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus, unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." Nay, the same truth hath induced the Heathen poet to confess, the first and most important article of the universal faith—that we are all the offspring of God.

This acknowledgment of a universal Creator, is one which, in its genuine influences, has in all ages called forth the devoutest gratitude of the heart. If this acknowledgment were as devoutly and sincerely felt in the heart, as it is generally confessed by the lips, it would make all men, faithful, acceptable, and true worshippers of God: of him, who is infinitely wise, powerful and good.—Impress this thought on the mind of universal man—write it on his heart—that he is the offspring of God—and I care not what speculative notions may be ingrafted into his creed, or sounded into his ears—under the influence of this sentiment, he must be holy, he must be happy, he must be grateful. For he who adopts this sentiment, must adopt, at the same moment, the truth, that the gift of existence can never be any thing else than a blessing—demanding the feeling of gratitude in every heart, and the expression of that gratitude from every tongue.

It does seem to me, that the grateful acknowledgement of this truth, which all Christians are in the habit of making in their prayers and thanksgivings to God, is, in fact, a concession—an undesigned concession, perhaps—of the whole question which divides us from many of our Christian brethren. He who says to God, in the language which the Protestant Episcopal Church puts into the mouths of all her worshippers: or in the similar language of worshippers of other name—"we thank thee, O God, for our creation," can not, after this, maintain with consistency, that God will or can make him forever and infinitely miserable; for how can any man thank God for that existence, which possibly may prove a curse to him; which inevitably must prove an endless and an infinite curse to millions and millions of the human family?

We wish no one so far to mistake our meaning, or to misstate our argument, by supposing that we assert that a deserved measure of punishment does not await every individual of the human race, who offends against the laws of God. We know that wickedness, if indulged in by any soul of man, must proportionally to its repetition and its enormity, sink the soul into misery and wretchedness. We know that the present sense of guilt and remorse, must compel the wretched Cain to cry out, "my punishment is greater than I can bear!"—We know that the suffering of such guilt and remorse, may, in the exquisite misery of the present infliction, compel the wretched Judas to despair of the mercy of God—we know that in the comparative suffering arising from such guilt as that incurred by this wretched traitor, the sentiment will be indulged, that it would be better for that man, if he had never been born—yet such expressions of suffering guilt—extorted by the rack of present suffering—such comparative wretchedness, can not destroy the effect of that argument resulting from the antecedent truth, that man is the work of a good, wise, and beneficent Creator, and that existence, though by reason of sin it may involve some men in deserved, in extreme misery; yet it can never be otherwise, than that it should be a blessing to every one that receives it.

This conclusion must be the result—the unavoidable result of the fact, that it is the hand of God that made us, and that we did not form ourselves. If the Manichean heresy of two opposite principles, a good and a bad deity, should be true, and that the latter was the creator of man, then we might adopt the sentiment, that the existence of man, might, nay, that it must prove a curse: but while we reject this heresy, as the foulest and most debasing error, we must at the same time reject the opinion, which only could proceed from it, that the result of that act of God, which gave us being, may be the means of rendering us inevitably and endlessly wretched.

But independently of all considerations of this nature—which we would have gladly omitted, did not the existence of a prevalent error necessarily requires us to make them—the heart of every true worshipper of God, must feel a deep sense of gratitude for the gift of that existence which made him the creature of God, capable of knowing, serving and loving him: and every individual, whose moral sense has not been destroyed by the indulgence of sin, must feel, and must be ready to express the gratitude which fills his heart.

2. The second reason of thankfulness to God, which presents itself to our view, is the providential care and protection, which has preserved us in being, and crowned our lives with many distinguished mercies.

If the gift of being, calls upon every ingenuous mind to praise God for his goodness; that providential care and protection which has secured our continued happiness and well-being, more loudly demands our gratitude and adoration. The constant, uniform goodness of God, which is exercised in behalf of every individual of the human family, should call forth universal gratitude and praise. For what a continued providence is demanded, to preserve the life of every individual, from birth, through all the periods of infancy, childhood, increasing years, and old age, until the period of dissolution? In the first years of human existence, the continuance of life depends, under God, upon the assistance and watchful care of others. No being so weak, so helpless, so entirely dependent upon foreign assistance, as the infant offspring of man. Without the inspiration of parental affection, the child would be exposed to almost immediate destitution and destruction. And when the infant has advanced to the years of childhood, carelessness and perversity still expose the child to dangers, still require a constant watch, and constant exercise of parental care and solicitude. During all these years, and until the period when reason has assumed its reign, it is much more surprising to consider, how many dangers are escaped, than that some prove injurious. Afterwards, in the necessary avocations and duties of life, how many dangers are evidently seen to beset us, and are continually about our path; calling for the continual exercise of watchfulness and caution? How many unseen dangers, from which no prudence can guard, no strength protect, are surrounding us on every side! In the unguarded hours of sleep, an ever watchful eye must be over us, to keep us safe; and in the active duties and pursuits of life, an Almighty arm must protect, and an all-wise providence must guide us safely through the devious paths of our earthly pilgrimage. The history of a single day, must convince us that we have incurred a large debt of gratitude to the divine care and beneficence. If we could see what snares have been set on all sides around us, by which we might have been taken; what destruction would have resulted, had we stepped a little to this side or to that; what calamities on the one hand or on the other, of that path, in which we have been providentially directed, we should be compelled to say, "it is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not. They are new every morning; great, indeed, is his faithfulness."

Yet how infinitely does that goodness appear to abound, when we reflect that the same divine care, and watchfulness, and guidance, and direction, which are manifested in favor of one individual of the human family, are manifested in behalf of every other individual of that family. It is this thought which makes the continual stream of the divine bounty, appear a continual miracle. It is only the fact, that the divine goodness is constant and unceasing, that it passes by us too often unthought of, unheeded, unacknowledged. If that same mercy which distinguishes every day of our life, were only exhibited on one, or two, or three days of our lives; and during all the rest of our lives we were only permitted to receive what was necessary to preserve a miserable existence, the recurrence of the blessings of one, or two, or three days, would be considered miraculous, and we should feel ourselves bound to acknowledge the unfrequent, yet wonderful mercy. And is the divine mercy less worthy of notice, because it is so constant, so unvaried? No! let us reflect with a gratitude as unceasing, as the divine goodness is unfailing; let us acknowledge with a gratitude as profound, as the divine goodness is fathomless, that "the Lord is good to all, and that his tender mercies are over all his works."

3. It is not only our duty to acknowledge the general bounty of that Providence to which we are all so much indebted; but the recurrence of the various seasons of revolving time, presents peculiar subjects for our gratitude. The period has now arrived, when the year has furnished its supplies, and when the barns and granaries of the farmer have been filled with their accustomed plenty. The rains which have descended from heaven, the sun which has poured its beams, the fertile soils which have borne their harvests, are all the gifts of God: but, as we before remarked, because they are furnished with uniform regularity, with a constant and unceasing providence, they are too often unheeded and passed by without the excitement of gratitude to the all wise Disposer of these blessings.

If we could suppose that the beams of the sun could cease to shine for one Summer; that the rain should not descend for the same period; or that our land should be cursed with barrenness and sterility—oh, how soon should we lament and bewail the deprivation! The loss of blessings would then teach us their value; and what a price of gratitude we owe to Him who dispenses them to us from the constant stream of his bountiful providence. But now since all things in nature, proceed as they have done since the flood of waters were removed from the earth; since seed-time and harvest, Summer and Winter, cold and heat, with all their rich and agreeable variety, are statedly returning, in their accustomed course, we are too apt to forget that the all-wise God is the author of our blessings: that he is the director of nature in her silent yet beneficial round; that it is he, who in the plenty of nature, opens his hand, and supplies the necessity of every living thing. Benevolent miracles only can excite our gratitude.—The more benevolent exercise of a constant providence is too often suffered to pass unheeded. Five thousand men, with their women and children, must be famishing with hunger in the wilderness, and they must be fed with five loaves and two small fishes, before they can acknowledge that it is the goodness of God, by which they have been fed. But is not the hand of God as much conspicuous, in feeding by a constant bounty every day, these two hundred thousand times five thousand men with their families, which cover the face of the habitable earth!

The claims of gratitude to God, for the bounties of his providence, seem to have been very prominent in the mind of the Psalmist. "The eyes of all wait upon thee, O God, and thou givest them their meat in due season. Thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing." "Sing unto the Lord with thanksgiving, sing praises upon the harp unto our God, who covereth the heaven with clouds, who prepareth rain for the earth, who maketh the grass to grow upon the mountains; who giveth to the beast his food and to the young ravens which cry, who maketh peace in thy borders, and filleth thee with the finest of wheat."

4. On this occasion we are called upon to praise the Lord for his goodness, as manifested in our civil rights and privileges.

It is by the distinguishing favor of God that we are possessed of so large a share of public liberty. We are protected in all our civil and personal rights, by the impartial hand of a just and mild government. We are governed, not as many nations are, by a despotic and tyrannical sovereign, whose arbitrary will is the law of the land, nor by an hereditary monarch, who may be wise or may be foolish; who may be virtuous or may be wicked: but by those whom we ourselves appoint to administer the government and direct our public affairs, according to the laws which we ourselves have enacted. If there is any mal-administration, it is the fault of the people themselves, who possess the power of appointment to office, and removal from it. But that feature which most of all distinguishes our country, and augurs a long and happy continuance of internal peace and prosperity, is, the peaceful submission of every citizen to the will of all, as expressed by the majority, in the constitutional mode of election. In most other countries, a change of rulers, or a change of administration, is a work of tumult and confusion—and too often a work of anarchy and bloodshed: here, it is the ordinary process of public sentiment, made known in the peaceful method of the ballot; and the unsuccessful candidate retires from the contest without a murmur, and the successful one mounts the chair of state, without exultation, to perform the duties of his appointment.

I consider this principle—I mean the principle of quiet submission by all to the will of the people, as expressed in the settled and lawful manner,—as a distinguishing feature of that government under which we are placed; and a necessary ingredient of that national happiness which we have so long enjoyed. And every lover of his country, will thank God, by whose providence this principle has been so deeply woven into our civil institutions; and so thoroughly engraved in the hearts of our people. And he will pray, that a principle so necessary to the quietness, peace, good order, permanency, and prosperity of our institutions, may always continue to be cherished by all orders of men, as it has been cherished since the first establishment of our government.

It would ill become me, in this place, or from any other, to lay down any maxims of a political character to guide the parties into which our country is divided, in the performance of their duties. I have neither ability nor inclination, proper for the discussion of political matters: but there is one remark I will venture to make to men of all parties, which is, I think, of sufficient importance to claim their attention. Let those men who are selected as candidates for office, be men, not merely of sound political principles, but of correct moral principles; let them be such men as you would be willing to entrust with the dearest interests of your country. I have often heard the maxim, "principles not men:" I would beg to propose a slight alteration—let the maxim be, "principles and men;" let the correctness of the man be as much an object of inquiry, as the correctness of his political creed; and then whatever party succeeds, we need not fear for our country. There is no danger to be apprehended from a good man, whatever may be his political faith. But I should much fear a bad man in office, whatever might be his political principles. He might act well, but he would more probably act ill, if self-interest should present any motive to lead him from the path of duty.

5. We have at this time, abundant reason to praise the Lord for his goodness, in that great degree of public peace with which our nation is blessed. A peaceable individual, who is however ready on any proper occasion to resent an insult, or to resist a hostile attack, generally passes through the world without quarrelling or contests. So with a peaceable nation. And this character of our nation has been so long established and so universally acknowledged, that there seems to be little prospect that our peace will be interfered with by any foreign nation. And it is to be hoped, that this peaceful character which has been acquired by our country in general, will be emulated by our citizens. Let the quarrels of a foreign government with its own citizens be settled by that government with its citizens. If they are aggrieved, our country and other countries are opened to them; but let not our citizens intermeddle with a quarrel where they can effect nothing but mischief. Solomon, nearly three thousand years ago, gave some good advice on this subject—"He that passeth by, and meddleth with strife belonging not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears."

They who have never suffered from war, or experienced its evils, can hardly realize how great a blessing peace is to a country. But we need only to carry our imagination over the borders of our own State, into the neighboring British territory, to discover the awful calamities resulting from war. All the prosperity and happiness of years of peace, are dispersed by a few months anarchy and confusion; by the approach of foreign or domestic war. To us, who see, or sympathise in, these awful calamities, our peace should be doubly valuable: and our gratitude to God on that account, should be doubly enhanced. Our constant prayer to God should be in the language of the Psalmist, "Oh pray for the peace of Jerusalem: pray for the peace of the country in which we dwell; they shall prosper that see thee. Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. For my brethren and companions' sakes, I will now say, peace be within thee."

6. Another reason for praising God, is the evident prosperity and improvement of our country, in all her most important interests.

Long esteemed throughout all the world for her liberty, her laws, her institutions, and the happiness of her inhabitants, our country continues to be the resort of many of the discontented or oppressed citizens of other nations. This adds considerably to our population; but the increase of our population, by the natural increase of our own people, is a much more rapid and a more healthy source by which the number of our people is enlarged with a rapidity never before known in any modern nation. But it is not so much the increase in the number of our citizens, for which we have reason to be thankful, as the general improvement of our country in other respects. Education is now justly considered the foundation and pledge of our national prosperity. The people can not be governed well, where education is neglected or despised. This is becoming the general sentiment. Universal education is becoming the watchword throughout our country. I would be far from proposing that he who can not read his ballot, should not vote; because there are so few in any country who can not read, that they can have little influence to injure the country—but I may boldly say, that he who can not read; and comparatively he who is ignorant of other branches of a good education, can not exercise his right of suffrage understandingly, or for the interest or the honor of his country. Our individual duty is, to provide for those under our care, the means of a good education. We ought to strive, that those who depend on us for learning, should rather be in advance of others, than in the rear. With facilities of education above those of other parts of our country, we should be inexcusable, if we neglected to improve them, for the advantage of our youth. The time will not permit me to notice the evident improvement in commerce, navigation, and the arts; for all which we have great reason to be thankful to the all-wise Disposer of events.

7. The last reason for which we as a people, have reason to be thankful, is, for our religious rights and privileges.

We live, by the blessing of God, in a country, where it is our birthright, that we may worship God according to the pure and unbiased dictates of our consciences; and where the exercise of this right is so far from giving offence to those who think differently from each other—that nothing is more common, than for people of the most dissimilar opinions in religion, to live together in the exercise of all the social, friendly, neighborly, and political relations. Here live together in peace, the Trinitarian and the Unitarian; the Roman Catholic and the Protestant; the Quaker and the Presbyterian; the Baptist and the Universalist; all alike protected and neglected—protected in their civil rights; neglected as to their religious opinions—by the laws:—each respecting the other, and when occasion serves, discussing their religious differences with earnestness and zeal, yet with politeness and candor: the fires of former ages extinguished, and the torture and the rack abandoned as means of conversion. Such religious freedom can not but be propitious to the interests of truth. Many of the dogmas of the dark ages have been openly renounced or tacitly abandoned: and those who still hold the dogmas of superstition or the doctrines of error, are permitted to pride themselves in the narrowness of their creed or the severity of their faith. Here no argument but reason is suffered to convince the human mind of its errors, and no penalty but the penalty of believing uncomfortable and terror-infusing doctrines, is inflicted upon those who hug them to their bosoms.

For us, who have adopted the glorious and comfortable truth written upon all God's works; and in every part of his revealed word, there is great reason to praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men. Our doctrine, which but a few years since was adopted by few, now excites the favorable attention of a great proportion of the Christian community, and not a few have yielded it their ready and hearty assent. In that place where at first a single herald of Gospel truth stood to announce that God is good, and always good to all his creatures; in that place, where he stood almost alone and unsupported, and where he was abused, and villified, and stoned, have been lately collected from our denomination, and that only a delegation from our extensive communion, above a hundred and twenty preachers of the faith delivered to Abraham, by which it was predicted that all the nations and families of the earth should be blessed. The Lord gave the word, great was the company of the preachers; and still the number is increasing.—And when we reflect upon the nature of the doctrines we preach; doctrines which redound only to the glory of God, and the holiness and consequent happiness of his creatures; doctrines which, while they banish terror from the mind, fill it with all joy and peace in believing; doctrines which anticipate the joys of heaven to those who are still on earth, and which, through the influence of holy faith, prepare the devout believer to be partaker with the saints in light; doctrines which consider Jesus as the author and finisher of our faith, the Sun of our spiritual system, diffusing health, life, salvation to all the children of men—which collects in the arms of heavenly Love, all who have partaken of the human nature—which, while they acknowledge that in Adam, or in the earthly nature, all have died: also receive with ineffable joy, that in Christ, or in the spiritual nature, all shall be made alive—when, we say, we consider these glorious truths, can we fail to be animated with the glorious prospect of a continued and everlasting increase to the receiving of them? can we fail to look forward to the time, so frequently revealed in the word of God, that in the fulness of time, he will gather together in one blessed community, all things in Christ; when every intelligent creature in heaven, in earth, and in the regions of the departed, shall bow the knee in humble, holy, happy acknowledgment of Jesus, the king of saints, the conqueror of sin, the achiever of an infinite and eternal glory; and when every tongue throughout all the dominions of God, and during all the ages of eternity, shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father! AMEN.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL:

FOR SUNDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1838.

1 JOHN V: 1–12.

The passage selected for this number of our Weekly Mail, contains the celebrated and much disputed passage of the three heavenly witnesses. It is hardly necessary for us to enter the field as controversialists, were we capable of doing so; for we find the evidence on both sides so fully and ably prepared and arranged to our hands, by Trinitarian divines, that we have only to copy, in order to convince the candid inquirer after truth.—Mr. Horne, in his Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures, vol. 2, pp. 366-376, (large 8vo. Ed., Philadelphia, 1836,) carefully examines all the evidence, direct and collateral, internal and external, for and against the passage. He thus sums up the result of his examination: "Upon a review of all the preceding arguments, the disputed clause (we think) must be abandoned as spurious; nor can any thing else than the positive authority of unsuspected MSS. justify the admission of so important a passage into the sacred canon." Dr. Adam Clarke comes to the same conclusion.—Both these writers contend, however, that the doctrine of the Trinity is so abundantly supported by other passages, that this one, so evidently spurious, can well be spared.

The passage, with the interpolation enclosed in brackets [ ], as it was formerly printed in the English and several other modern versions, runs thus:—"For there are three that bear record [in heaven, the Father, the Word and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth,] the spirit, and the water, and the blood; and these three agree in one."—By omitting the passage in brackets—the spurious passage—we avoid repeating one witness (the Spirit, or the Holy Ghost) to make out the two triune sets, and more closely conform the passage to the apostle's reasoning. For instance, he argues, verse 6, that Jesus was proved to be the Messiah by the testimony of water and blood, which came from his side at the crucifixion (a fact testified to by this apostle in his Gospel)—and that the spirit—the life of Jesus' doctrine—testifies to his being of God, by its agreement with and adaptation to our spiritual life and being. Now, he no where, in the context, names any other witnesses—as the Father and the Word—as testifying to this fact; why, then, enumerate the three witnesses in heaven? The truth is, John did not name them. The disputed passage "is not to be found in a single Greek manuscript written before the sixteenth century;" and it "is not once quoted in the genuine works of any one of the Greek Fathers, or early ecclesiastical writers," although "they have frequently cited the preceding verse, as well as that which immediately follows," in their controversies on the Trinity, etc. It "does not appear in any [Latin] manuscripts written before the tenth century," and was first offered by St. Augustine, in the end of the fourth century, as a gloss on the eighth verse, and began to be noted in the margin, and after the eighth century, to be copied into the text; at first, after the 8th verse, though now placed before it. See Horne's Introduction, as above referred to, and Gerard's Biblical Criticism, Sect. 4, No. 808, where he has given a compendium of the evidence on both sides.

As I have occupied so much space with the examination of this spurious text, I will but briefly notice the instruction contained in the remainder of this passage. Having dwelt on Christian love to God and to man, as the fruits and evidence of believing the true doctrine, the beloved apostle, in this passage, goes forward to show that such love is, in reality, the regenerating power—the new birth, by which man is born into the heavenly kingdom. That the love of God, will, necessarily, lead to the love of Jesus—or, perhaps, by "him that is begotten of God," he may mean every new born believer. He then refers to the testimony that Jesus Christ came in the flesh—that his body was not a phantom, but real flesh and blood, because at the crucifixion, when the spear of the soldier reached his heart, water and blood issued from the wound. This water and blood, and the spirit or doctrine of Jesus, so adapted to our spirit, is the witness of God in favor of Jesus, and should be received more readily than the testimony of man, for it is greater—better—truer. He, therefore, that believeth the Son, has the witness in himself—he has internal evidence, by the love he feels to God and the brethren, and knows that he has eternal life in Christ. He that believeth not, calls God a liar, by denying the record that God has given him eternal life in Christ, and has not, therefore, spiritual life in himself, but is yet dead in unbelief—is unregenerated. P. P.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.—I think it very probable that we will be able to gratify highly our very young readers, (of which class I believe we have not a few,) by getting up such a department at least every other week, during the next volume. It will be filled with interesting moral tales, carefully written, and adapted to their comprehension, by one or more of our correspondents. We have the promise of a ministering brother, that he will do his endeavor to fill his part of it worthily, and from the sample we have seen, we have no doubt of his success. If his fund, and that of others, holds out, we will be able to treat our young friends every week.

I would remark, in passing, that very few persons are qualified to fill such a department. Even Miss Edgarton in writing for larger children than those we shall aim to interest, has crowded in too many unusual and large words, thus perplexing, when she would instruct. Others go to the opposite extreme, and, in endeavoring to be childish, they become silly—as fatal an overreach, as from the sublime to the ridiculous, and as easily made. How those who attempt the arduous and responsible task of writing for our young readers of the next volume, will succeed, remains to be seen—and seen it will be, in the speaking countenances of the juvenile readers. But be the event as it may, the department will be established, and continued as long as we can find suitable communications or selections wherewith to fill it.

A. B. G.

 We have received the first articles of a good series, from the pen of Dr. Chapin, and the promise of articles for another interesting series, when that shall be finished. We have, also, on hand some excellent Essays on the words rendered hell. (Sheol or Hades, Gehenna and Tartarus) in our Common Version, from the pen of Br. Montgomery; and the promise of a most interesting series, from the same pen, to follow soon thereafter. All of which will appear in our next volume.

A. B. G.

P. S. Br. M.—We will copy the extracts for you, or send the books—just as you prefer. A. B. G.

DON'T FORGET To send in the remittances, and the new subscribers' names, as soon as possible—to regulate the lists, and let us know precisely how affairs stand—in short, to attend to the matters pointed out on the backs of the Prospectuses, as soon as you can possibly find time to attend to it. You can hardly imagine how VERY important every item is to us, especially at this time of the year.

ALSO, DISCONTINUERS—We mean those who must discontinue—don't forget to get a good and true man to take the paper in your stead. If this is impossible, (but can it be impossible?—) then, remember the terms of the paper, and notify us of the discontinuance before we commence sending you the new volume. Don't forget, now, for small as the matter may be to you, several hundreds of such small matters, make up a very great matter for us poor publishers. So, do not forget it, Brother. G. and H.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE LESSON OF NATURE.

BY MISS MARY M. HAMILTON.

How simple, yet how sublime, is the lesson that nature teaches to the susceptible mind! The broad expanse of the sky, the beautiful green carpeted earth, the fairy scenes amid the "deep tangled wildwood," the gentle breath of heaven that whispers through the venerable forest, balmy Spring, enchanting Summer, luxurious Autumn, and hoary Winter, all tell to the mind of a thinking being, that there is a Great First Cause from whom all things flow. How absurd, how contrary to reason is the idea, that this vast universe exists as a baseless fabric of nothingness, without creation or end. It is evident from every thing in nature that there is a design; and if there is a design, surely there must be a designer. Else, who keeps in motion this mighty globe, that it performs its wonted rotations without variableness? Who wheels through infinity of space the countless hosts of glittering worlds, which beautify the celestial chambers? Who lets forth upon a trembling world, the raging hurricane, or at his will restraineth its violence? Who speaks with a voice of thunder, or pierces the gloomy darkness of night with the lightning's fiery glare? Who giveth bounds to the mighty deep, or thunders in the rushing cataract, or causes the gentler flowing of the low, wide-spreading rivers? Who bringeth forth vegetable nature at its appointed season, and from the pregnant earth, causeth the lofty tree to flourish? Who reareth the towering mountain, or beautifies the lovely vale? If all these exist for nought—if there is no God, then are we lost in a dark, impenetrable mist; and like the shipwrecked mariner, we famish among the sands of an arid desert, without consolation or hope. We exist like the worm, to sink into oblivion. We live a few bright hours, then sink into the grave,-as the sweet flower that sprang up but yesterday, bends beneath the cold blast of to-day. But on the other hand, if there be a God, if all the amazing world we see, was created by an Omnipotent Power, then it becometh mortal, erring man, to bow down in humility of heart, and with reverential awe adore and love the Being who has proved himself a God of love, a being of infinite perfection.

The infidel "who says in his heart, there is no God," is a stranger to the long taught lesson of nature. He is surrounded by, he knows not what—nor whence it came. This vast earth he views as a baseless fragment of creation, with millions of other spheres wheeling their untiring course through unlimited space, with no hand to support—no power to guide. He listens joyously to the soft tones of the sounding lute—he joins with a happy heart in the mazy dance—he gazes with a pleasurable pride upon the splendid edifice which man has erected; but when he walks abroad amid nature's works, and reads not there "nature's God," though they may fill him with wonder and astonishment, yet that holy aspiration of the soul, that sweet heavenly joy, that soft voice of humility, which whispers peace to the righteous, is all lost to him. His heart disbelieves, and is therefore incapaciated for the purest and holiest joys of life.—He hears the roaring cataract, he sees the snow clad summit of the towering mountain, stands upon the lonely strand, beholds in the far off distance, the placid surface of the unfathomable deep, and the cerulean arch of heaven in sisterhood meet; he walks out beneath the broad, still canopy of the "upper air," where glittering hosts are gemming the celestial chambers; he reclines on mossy banks in moonlit bowers, where the vesper hymn steals softly among the evening shades; or he sees over the towering battlements of the west, the inky clouds rise like mountain above mountain, overspreading nature's fair face with gloomy horror; he hears in the moaning blast the trembling peal, betokening the strife of elements; he sees the lightning's vivid chain streak athwart the air, the demons of the tempest rage with battling fury, and the forest trees uprooted upon the mountain's brow—yet in all these he traces not the hand of the Almighty, and though he may feel for a moment, a glow of enthusiasm, yet where are those holy conceptions of God, which the believer experiences? Though he may wonder, yet he can not adore—though he may admire, yet he can not love.

When the soul is tranquilized by the harmony of nature's voice, when every surrounding object is decked with beauty, "and every grove is melody," how sweet to leave, in mind, the chilling intercourse of this dark-spirited and deceptive world, and mingle in sweet association with the heavenly toned spirit of nature. How soothing to forget, amid such a display of divine perfections, the fraud and chicanery, of covetous, unfeeling man. The mind can not but forget for a while the dark scenes of earth, while listening to the angelic harmony of nature's breathing lyre, and drink in the purest pleasures at the fount of divine love, when celestial voices are thus tuning their Creator's praise. The soul thus absorbed, seems introduced into the blest paradise above, where the ransomed hosts are chanting in angelic strains, the adorable song of the whole earth, "Alleluia, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth," and heaven's golden arches re-echo "Alleluia." O! that erring mortals, not unfrequently might thus forget this transitory earth, and join with the angelic host in praise and adoration to the Great I AM.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LOVE OF TRUTH.

BY REV. W. H. WAGGONER.

At the Conference held in Constantia, during the past Fall, there were present, two ladies, who walked a distance of nine and ten miles. They came to hear of Jesus—they came to hear the Gospel preached in its fulness and joy. When these lovers of truth were pointed out to me—when I learned that they were about the first who entered the church, I was reminded of "the sepulchre" I remembered "Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary." I was satisfied that a love of truth, impelled them to leave their homes, and go up to Jerusalem to worship the God of their salvation.—I was led to think how much more prosperous the cause of truth would be, if its every professor would have walked, and even rode, half, nay, one-quarter of that distance, when ever it was proclaimed by a herald of the cross. I thought much on the coldness and indifference that reigns over the professed friends of free grace, and regretted that a becoming zeal had not been manifested by all—that we had not been more faithful—that we had not more earnestly exhorted men to present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, as their reasonable, but long neglected service.

It is certainly a lamentable fact, that a cold indifference inhabits many parts of our Zion. Men who are surrounded with wealth and every good; who profess to be with us, do not raise one finger—do not even take one number of our periodicals.—Such men should look up. They should "arise, shine." God asks it; Christ pleads for it, and the cause demands it. I would go heart and hand with that brother of ours, who expressed the sentiment, that there was more danger of our freezing, than of our burning to death. We want more zeal, more warmth. Let us have it. Let every cold professor warm his heart, and go to work. Let all indifference be driven back and the pleasure of the Lord will more abundantly prosper in our hands.

We live in an age of great religious excitement. The "signs of the times," call upon us to set our faces Zionward. The combined energies of all Partialist denominations are arrayed against us! Skeptic clubs, and free press associations are circulating their poisonous hand bills through our country. No corner can be found where the enemy is not at work, to fasten the chains of bondage and slavery on the people. Oh! what inducement for greater zeal! May God "teach our hands to war, and our fingers to fight!" If God be for us, who can prevail against us? In vain does Partialism push on her unholy projects, in vain does Catholicism plant churches in our land in vain does infidelity blow its cheerless blas over our mountains; for a greater than man hath said, that "every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up."

Watertown, N. Y.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

HAPPINESS.

Man's object, "end and aim," is happiness.—This is the goal of his ambition, the impulse of his heart. Wherever this polar star directs him, his footsteps tend. To obtain possession of this cynosure, all his exertions aim. We read, hear, and talk, of this oft repeated word, as though it was something that lay in our pathway, and required naught of us, but to stoop and pick it up, and convey it to our bosoms, yet how few find it!

Happiness may be defined to be, those sensations consequent upon the gratification of our desires. Our desires are never fully gratified—we are perpetually harrassed by conflicting propensities, which are not in our power to satiate; consequently we can never, strictly speaking, have true happiness in our present state. We can only approximate towards it, by slow and toilsome progress. It beguiles us along the rugged paths of life, like the fallacious ignis fatuus, and seduces us from the even tenor of our ways, to the abyss of despair. We may realize pleasure and joy, but these are mere constituents of happiness. No man can, therefore, in his present organization, partake of real, substantial enjoyment, neither would it be consistent for him to be thus constituted. To be perfectly happy, we must feel no want, experience no pain, suffer no obstacle to our purposes, nor have our wishes remain ungratified. In as much as our physical and organic laws are such as to prevent perfect felicity, we can, by living in conformity to those laws and regulations, reach that degree of happiness, which our Creator wisely designed for us. With these consoling assurances, then, let us not murmur or complain; but live in the hope, and the gracious promise before us; live as becomes a progressive order of beings; live in the happifying expectation that we shall one day be made alive anew in Christ, and capable of enjoying true, pure, unsullied and solid happiness, and taste of pleasures that never cloy.

South Venice, N. Y. A. T.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ASSUMPTION NOT ARGUMENT.

It is somewhat amusing to witness the various shifts and windings of popular theologians of the present day, to frame objections to doctrines not congenial with their own. Those sects which are the most forward in Sunday school and tract operations, seem to have the most objections to the sentiments of Universalists. And what is truly pitiable is, that the very objections which they urge with so much tenacity, and I may say, with so much scurrility, lie with equal and even greater force against their own theory. I have my eye on a certain tract published by the American Tract Society, and liberally distributed among Sunday school scholars, for their special benefit and instruction. The first page of this tract is headed, in prominent capitals, "Universalism Unscriptural and Absurd."

It is not my intention to enter into an examination of all the groundless assumptions introduced by the writer, but simply to notice a few of his objections to Universalism, and show that they lie with equal weight against his own system. The first sentence I notice, which is introduced in the form of a preamble, is couched in these words:—"Before entering directly upon an examination of the latter sentiment, [meaning Universalism,] it may be useful to state the essential principles of the divine government, as generally understood be evangelical Christians. What is needful to our present purpose, may be embodied in the four following propositions." Before introducing these propositions, we might propose a query or two, concerning these Evangelical Christians. What are we to understand by evangelical Christians? Do we understand that they are four or five different sects, including those whose creeds are so much at variance, that they can not associate together as Christians? Those who, though they expect to commune in heaven, can not do so on earth without censure, and even excommunication? Are these the evangelical Christians? It seems this tract must have been written by one of these evangelical Christians, as there appears quite a disposition in the author for fault-finding and misrepresentation. Our author is probably of the Calvinistic school; whether of the old or new school, is quite immaterial. Suffice it to say, then, as was said by one of its distinguished members, that when this august body of evangelicals meet in session, "the devil always has a jubilee." And judging from the conduct of that body, as given by themselves, the statement is true. But we will let that pass, and notice further the tract. Our author's four propositions are—

"1. God has placed men under a righteous law, (Rom. ii: 12, 15,) whose penalty, according to its just value, the importance of the interests it guards, and the consequences of transgression, is eternal death.—Ezek. xviii: 20; Rom. vi: 23.

2. All men have broken this law, and are therefore righteously condemned.—Rom. iii. 11-19.

3. The Lord Jesus Christ has offered himself a propitiatory sacrifice (Rom. iii: 25) for the sins of men, (Heb. x: 12,) so that whosoever will repent and trust in him for pardon, shall be justified and receive everlasting happiness.—John iii: 15, 16; Rom. iii: 24-26.

4. Those who will not turn from their transgressions, nor comply with the reasonable conditions of the Gospel during the present season of probation, will be driven away in their wickedness to endless suffering and shame.—John iii: 5, 36; 2 Thess. i: 7-9."

The reader will notice the first proposition.—Three passages of Scripture are quoted to prove that a law is given to man, the penalty of which is "eternal death," or "endless suffering and shame." The reader will please turn to those passages, and he will see that there is not a word in them about "eternal death" or "endless suffering and shame." There being no such statement, that the penalty of transgression is "eternal death," as a matter of course, the proposition is false in the outset. And when a false proposition is laid down, how easy to draw false and erroneous inferences. But admitting that the proposition is true, that a law was given to man, the penalty of which was eternal death, what are the consequences? One passage which our author quotes, reads thus: "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Admitting this death to mean eternal death, one of two inferences are unavoidable—either that every son and daughter of Adam will die an eternal death, ("for all have sinned,") or, that the passage quoted is a falsehood; for the language is, "the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him. The soul that sinneth, it shall die." The other passage quoted, is also to the point, but is very unfortunate for our author. It reads thus: "As many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law." Now, if those who sin are to be judged by this law, and the penalty of it is eternal death, who can escape it? Our author seems to anticipate an escape for himself. But in order for the passages to be to his purpose, they should contain a provision like the following: "The soul that sinneth, it shall die an eternal death, unless a substitute dies in his room and stead, and he believes in that substitute, while in this state of existence." The other passage should read thus: "As many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law, unless that law is dispensed with by the interposition of something the very reverse." But, by the by, no such modified passages occur in the Bible.

As our author's first proposition is false, so also is his fourth. His objections to Universalism are futile and without force, and return back "upon his own head." We not only affirm that the proposition which assumes that the penalty of the law is eternal death, is "unscriptural," but, also, that it is inconsistent, absurd, and derogatory to the character of God. We can not believe that a Being possessed of infinite goodness, would create human beings, and endow them with intellectual capacities, and then subject them to a penalty which he must have known would entail on them "endless suffering and shame." We see no necessity for such a penalty, and, as there is no "thus saith the Lord" to support it, we reject the sentiment altogether. A. C.

For the Magazine and Advocate

SOCIETY LIBRARIES.

Messrs. Editors—Why are there not more society or neighborhood libraries among Universalists? They have often been recommended, and their advantages must be apparent to every one that will reflect for one moment on the subject, while the cost to each individual will be but a mere trifle. Let shares of stock, to an unlimited extent, be created in every Universalist Society, or neighborhood, at from three to five dollars per share. Let each member take as many as they can—the poorer members taking one-fifth, or one-third, or one-half a share only. Let each holder of any part of a share, vote according to the stock held, but draw books equal to the holder of the greatest amount; for the money should be expended according to the wishes of the contributors, but the books should be circulated so as to meet the wants of the community. By having the number of shares unlimited, any number of members may be added from time to time, as they offer.

As soon as ten or twenty shares are taken and paid for, call a meeting, elect a treasurer and a librarian, and decide what books shall be bought. The library can be kept in the meeting-house, or in the librarian's residence, if most convenient.—The trouble of keeping, giving out, and receiving the books again, will be a pleasure to any social, warm-hearted Universalist—and the keeping of the account will be a mere trifle. The treasurer can keep on selling stock, and (if stated dues are levied in order to keep up a variety in the library) in collecting the monthly or quarterly dues of the members. In most cases, the treasurer and librarian can be united in the same person.

What neighborhood is there that can not raise from $20 to $50 at once, in this manner? Say $20—that will buy about forty or fifty choice volumes at once. It will take half a year to have them all read by each member, if two are given out at a time, and made returnable once a week. Thus some twenty or twenty-five persons can be supplied with constant and good reading in their leisure moments, for half a year, and all for about $20! By having monthly dues of fifty cents on each share of stock, continual accessions will be made to the library, even if no more shares are sold. When all the books are read by all, put them up to auction among the members, and buy a new lot with the proceeds.

The above hasty sketch is submitted as one plan among a hundred that might be adopted to effect such a desirable object, as giving to every Universalist Society, or neighborhood, a good library on a cheap plan. A Reader.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DEATH.

Death is regarded as "the king of terrors," not only by the heathen, but by the professed, enlightened Christian. We are all tenacious of this animate clay, and cling to life as the great good. This dread may be accounted for in part, by the teachings mankind have received, and the superstition of the multitude. But the terrors of this "grim monster," are greatly magnified. The fear of it, is proportioned to the medium through which it is viewed—if considered as the entrance to a state of immortality and blessedness, it is happifying—if to an abode of endless misery, vice versa.

Asa.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

A. B. Grosh, Editor; A. R. Bartlett, Assistant Editor.
G. W. Montgomery, E. H. Chapin, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1838.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS—NO. XIX.

"For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the spirit: by which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, which sometime were disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing."—1 Peter iii: 18, 19, 20.

I am not unaware, that it has been and is now believed by many, that this language proves that Christ preached to wicked disembodied beings, who were confined in prison beyond the grave; but as I can not receive this as a correct interpretation, "I will also show mine opinion;" and the reader can believe it or not, as it accords with reason, or is against logical conclusions.

The only difficulty in this passage is this, it appears to affirm that the spirits to whom Christ preached, were the spirits of the antediluvians who disobeyed God in the time of Noah. "And preached to the spirits in prison, which sometime were disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah." If by spirits, however, Peter alluded only to the antediluvians, what could have been his object in referring to them?—for, it must be evident, with that view of this matter, that it has no possible connexion with the subject of which he was treating. It strikes me, that the sense of this ambiguous language is this—Peter intended to make a comparison between the disobedient spirits of his own time, and those of the time of Noah. It is well known that God waited one hundred years to give the antediluvians time to repent, while by his spirit, through Noah, the preacher of righteousness, God exhorted them to forsake their sins. So, in the time of Christ, God waited from the death of our Saviour to the year seventy, nearly forty years, for the Jews to repent of their sins, while they were exhorted to go from transgression unto the living God.

No truth can be more evident, than that men who were engaged in the service of iniquity, were represented as being in prison, confined in dungeons and chains. And when we consider the destruction of mind and of happiness, and the fascination which evil habits will fling around many transgressors, every person must admit, that the representation is most excellent. In Isaiah, God speaking of his Son, says: "I, the Lord have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thine hand, and will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant the people, for a light of the Gentiles; to open the eyes of the blind, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house." xlii: 6, 7.—Christ was raised up to save those who were in prisons of sin; to him was given the spirit of Heaven, that he might set free the children of transgression. When Jesus came up from the water in which he had been baptized, it is said of John the Baptist, "he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him; and lo, a voice from heaven, saying, this is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Matt. iii: 16, 17. For the period of his ministry, he showed that he was indeed the Son of God, for his actions declared his heavenly origin, and his end sealed the declaration in the language of virtue's majestic voice. Soon, however, the Jews brought about the tragic drama of the crucifixion, murdered the Prince of truth, while his disciples laid him in a new-made tomb. But death could not hold him—God breathed his spirit upon him, and he came up from the embraces of the tomb, fresh in all the splendors of immortality. It was after this that he went and preached unto the spirits in prison. "Being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the spirit; by which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison."

I have shown, that the prophets represented the sons of sin, as being in prison; consequently, no people could be more in prison than the Jews—hence, Christ s them, "ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free;" free from the prisons of error and sin. The Jews were the spirits in prison referred to. By his apostles, Christ preached to those spirits—"now then," says Paul, "we are ambassadors for Christ; as though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." 2 Cor. v: 20. It may here be objected, that it was by his spirit, not the apostles, that Christ was to preach to the prisoners. Let us attend to this objection. It will be admitted by all, that the apostles, previous to the resurrection of Christ, were not animated by his spirit, for they expected that his kingdom was to be a temporal one, and would afford them earthly offices—hence, when Jesus was murdered, losing all their hopes of power, they fled. But in a few days after the crucifixion, Christ being quickened from the stillness of death, appeared among his disciples a number of times, and just before he ascended to the glory of the heavens, said to them, "tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high." Luke xxiv: 49. This direction they obeyed, and what comes upon them next? In the 2d chap. of Acts, we are informed, that the disciples being assembled together, "there appeared unto them tongues like as of cloven fire, and it sat upon each of them; and they were all filled with the holy spirit, and began to speak with other tongues, as the spirit gave them utterance." Verses 3, 4. Here, then, we find them filled with the spirit of Christ, and they immediately began to preach to the Jewish prisoners who were confined in the prisons of sin; and the consequence was, that three thousand were liberated in one day, that they might enter the liberty of divine truth. In this manner Christ by his spirit, preached to the wicked spirits who were confined in sin.

But it may be said that the passage gives no intimation, that Christ was thus to preach to the spirits spoken of, by his spirit through secondary means; on the contrary, it says that he preached. To this, it is answered, that nothing is more common in the Scriptures, than to put the primary for the secondary cause. It is said that Solomon built a temple; but in fact, Solomon never put his hand to the temple; all that is meant, is, that Solomon was the procuring cause of building the temple.—So it is that Christ is he Saviour of the world; and yet it is also said, "God, who is the Saviour of all men."—It is evident that God is the procuring or primary cause of the salvation of all men; hence it is said, that he is the Saviour of all—but it is also evident, that God effects this salvation through his Son as the means. After this manner, it is perfectly proper for the apostle to say, that Jesus preached to the spirits in prison, when nothing more was intended, than that he, by the influence of his own glorious spirit fitted and prepared the apostles to bid the prisoners of sin and error come forth to the freedom of the truth and the liberty of the Gospel. From these facts, then, it will be discovered that the meaning of the passage is, that Jesus by the manifestation of the spirit of truth through the apostles, preached to those imprisoned spirits, who, like the antediluvians, were disobedient to God.

Jesus, always, and in every age of the world, preaches by his truth to those who are in chains of error and sin. That person whose heart has been drowned in the muddy waters of error, whose peace has been poisoned, and whose soul has been agonized with fear, when he comes to the liberty of Christianity, hears the voice of Christ speaking in all the accents of divine love, bidding him come out from the prison of darkness and of wo, and walk in the freedom of salvation. When an individual approaches the gates of death in dread, and the soul shrinks from the shadow of the tomb, and calls upon Christ, Jesus speaks peace, bids him take courage, liberates him from his dread, takes him from the arms of the monster, and inducts him into the liberties of immortality. And there are multitudes, who now rejoice beneath the banners of the Restitution of all things, who once, while confined in the prisons of ceaseless wo, heard the voice of Christ warning them to leave the dismal mansions of doubt and fear, and wear the spotless white robes of righteousness, amid the light and love of divine and all-gracious truth.

G. W. M.

DR. ALEXANDER VS. DR. ALEXANDER.

"Eight Reasons against Universalism. By A. Alexander, D. D."

EFFECTUALLY REFUTED BY

"Counsels of the Aged to the Young. By A. Alexander, D. D."

A friend, to whose watchful observation of matters and things generally, I have often been much indebted, handed me a Tract, first above named, together with a neat little book, second named above, and requested me to notice how effectually the latter refuted the principal portions of the former. "Alexander, of old," said he, "went forth conquering the world; but this modern Alexander goes forth conquering himself!" Most true, added I, after examining the works—and the ancient Alexander wept that he had no more worlds to conquer; but the modern one need never despair, since he can manufacture his worlds himself, as often as he desires a new conquest. It is really laughable to notice how effectually this great Doctor Alexander smashes his tract to atoms—grinds it to powder—and blows its very dust to the four winds of heaven, with his "words of truth and soberness." No Universalist could more effectually demolish his uncandid and false reasons against Universalism, than he himself overturns and annihilates the strongest and most powerful of them. Another proof is hereby afforded, that when men are not biassed by a creed against the doctrine of the Restitution, but write without special reference to it or their creed, they write common sense, based on facts and experience, and so far confirm the great leading principles of Universalism.—But when party spirit, and sectarian zeal and bigotry, run away with their understandings, they "oppose themselves," "bring upon themselves swift destruction," and depart from the "acknowledging of the truth."—2 Tim. ii: 25, and 2 Pet. ii: 1. But to the two works before us.

The first reason given in the Tract, is, that Universalism perverts the plain and obvious meaning of numerous passages of Scripture, which speak of the future [endless] punishment of impenitent sinners. As the Doctor does not produce such passages, and can not produce any, this reason is mere assertion, and needs not any refutation.

The second reason is as follows, on the left hand side of the dividing line; while the refutation of it, on the right hand side of the line, is taken from his "Counsels to the Young," section 14, pages 47 to 49.

"2. If it be true that sin is not punished in the future world, then it would follow that God exercises no moral government over the world; for in the present life, the wicked often live at ease, and are prosperous, while the virtuous are afflicted. This doctrine goes far to annihilate all difference between virtue and vice; for we must judge of these according to the treatment which they respectively receive from the Supreme Ruler; but if there be no future punishment, there is no strong mark of disapprobation set on vice. A doctrine which involves such a consequence as this, must be false and dangerous."

"Keep a good conscience. If wickedness had no other punishment than the stings of conscience which follow evil actions, it would be reason enough to induce every considerate man to avoid that which is productive of so much pain. No misery of which the human mind is susceptible, is so intolerable and so irremediable as remorse of conscience. And it is liable to be renewed as often as the guilty action is distinctly recollected. It is true, the conscience, by means of error and repeated resistance to its dictates, may become callous—'seared as with a hot iron;' but this apparent death of moral sensibility, is no more than a sleep. At an unexpected time, and in circumstances the most inconvenient, conscience may be aroused, and may exert a more tremendous power than was ever before experienced. The long arrearages of sins committed, while no notice seemed to be taken of them, now demand and enforce consideration. Joseph's brethren seemed to have almost forgotten their unnatural and cruel conduct in selling him as a slave into a foreign country; but when many years had elapsed, and they found themselves environed with difficulties and dangers in that very land, the remembrance of their crime painfully rushed upon their minds, and extorted from them mutual confessions of their guilt. 'God,' said they, 'hath found out the iniquity of thy servants.'—'And they said one to another, we are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us.'"

Third Reason and its Refutation.

"3. If this doctrine should become general, human society could not exist. Like atheism, there are many illustrious examples of merit, honor, and the like, which it is near akin, its strictest probity, in men who have it in their power to defraud their creditors, or to have deeply involved their confiding friends, but who chose rather to look haggard and this world becomes a scene of violence—an acelda-me. All confidence among men would be destroyed; all the bonds of civil society would be severed. Do not say that vice may be coerced by the civil law—a vain hope. Where the whole mass is corrupt, laws are useless. What means of ascertaining the truth in courts of justice will remain, without which justice can not be administered, if no man fears the consequences of perjury? Suppose a man, who has no fear of judgment, to be solemnly called upon to declare the truth in a case where his own honor and interest, and that of some friend, is at stake: what is there to prevent him from perjuring himself? Or, if he can gratify secret malice, by swearing against the life of an enemy, what shall restrain him?" etc.

"EIGHT REASONS," etc.

"4. If there is no future punishment, the wicked who are driven away in their wickedness, are happier than the righteous, who are preserved to suffer. The wicked antediluvians, who perished in the flood, had a better portion and richer reward than Noah; for they all escaped the troubles of life, and went to heaven, while Noah and his family were subjected to innumerable hardships for some hundreds of years. The inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah were better off, though they were destroyed by fire from heaven, than righteous Lot, who escaped; for they were released at once from all pain and sorrow, but his afflictions were many. The wicked Canaanites were too bad to live upon earth, and therefore God enjoined it upon Joshua to exterminate them; but not too bad to be admitted at once to heaven, without any repentance or sanctification. Their lot was, therefore, greatly preferable to that of the Israelites, who endured many toils and sufferings."

"EIGHT REASONS," etc.

"Men often endeavor to escape from the stings of a guilty conscience by a change of place; but the remedy is ineffectual. The transgressor may traverse the widest ocean, and transcend the loftiest mountains, and may bury himself in the dark recesses of the desert, but he can not fly so far, nor conceal himself so effectually, as to escape from his tormentor. In some cases the agonies of remorse have been so intolerable, that the guilty perpetrator of great wickedness has preferred 'strangling and death' to a miserable life, and has rushed uncalled into the presence of his Judge. And in other cases, men guilty of bloody crimes have found the pangs of remorse so intolerable that they have voluntarily given themselves up to justice; and by a voluntary confession, have convicted themselves, when no human witnesses were competent to prove their guilt. But what man is there who has not committed sins, the recollection of which give him sensible pain? And such acts often stand out in strong relief in the retrospect of the past. No effort can obliterate such things from the memory. We may turn away our eyes from the disagreeable object; but the painful idea will return again; and thus men whose consciences are not seared, are haunted by guilt as by a troublesome ghost; and often their sins find them out, and stare them in the face, when danger threatens, or when calamity has overtaken them." * * *

"The exercise of faith, and humble resignation, with patience and fortitude, under the pressure of heavy calamity, is most pleasing to God, and illustrates clearly the excellency of religion, which is able to bear up the mind, and even render it cheerful, in the midst of scenes of trouble."

* * * *

"Faith and prayer are our chief resource under all the various and heavy afflictions of this life. When all other other refuges fail, God will hide his people who seek him, in his secret pavilion, and shelter them under the shadow of his wings. Prayer is essential to the existence and And in the long run this turns out more to the benefit of those persons, than any advantage obtained by a resort to shifts and evasions not entirely consistent with the highest integrity.—He who sacrifices reputation for present comfort, buys it at too dear a rate.. The merchant, who, when he fails, loses his reputation for truth and integrity, will meet with but little favor from the world, and will have very little chance of rising again. But he who has been unfortunate, and yet maintains his integrity, and preserves his character unsullied, is often able to enter again into business under favorable auspices; and is encouraged and aided in his attempts to gain a living, by men of wealth and standing; so that such a man is often successful to such a degree, that he has it in his power to compensate those from whom benefit was derived in the day of his calamity." * * *

"Sincere penitence, humiliation, and confession, are God's prescribed remedy, and where these are wanting the conscience will not be at peace," growth of the spiritual life.—It is the breath of the new man. By this means he obtains quick relief from innumerable evils; and draws down from heaven blessings of the richest and sweetest kind."

"COUNSELS," pp. 22, 23, 58

"COUNSELS," pp. 49–51, 66, 67, 78, and 79.

Fifth Reason and its Refutation.

"5. Upon the supposition that this doctrine is true, repentance is useless; neither is there any need of sanctification; heaven is the sinner's right without any condition or preparation. How the ungodly will be pleased with the place and its exercises, is another question. Whether dying will take away their disrelish for devotional exercises, is not explained. But there is no need of undergoing the sorrows of repentance for sin.—This the Universalists acknowledge. A writer, before referred to, declares, 'that there is not the least occasion for solicitude about salvation, neither is it in our power to promote or hinder it.' We did suppose that the advocates of this doctrine would have pleaded for repentance, which is nothing else but a turning from sin to God, as useful to prevent evil in this life; but we find that in this we mistook their views, for the same writer asserts, concerning the evils which sin produces here—'that these consequences are inevitable, and can not be escaped even by repentance.' What these men can preach, or why they should preach at all, we do not see."

"EIGHT REASONS," etc.

"Until the soul is justified, and sin pardoned, there can be no true peace of conscience." * * * "But if you would preserve your conscience pure and enjoy peace, you must not only obtain forgiveness for the past, but must be very careful to sin no more in future. The law of God is exceeding broad, and if we would preserve peace of conscience, we must conform our actions to its precepts with assiduous and holy diligence." * * * * *

"'Cultivate peace.' Next to the blessing of peace with God and in our own conscience, is that of peace with our fellow-men. 'As much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men.' And again—'Follow peace with all men.' The true source of all the wars, contentions, and disturbances which are in the world, is the pride, the envy, the covetousness, and other evil passions of our nature. Eradicate these, and in their place introduce pure and kind affections, and you will experience a double peace—peace within, and peace without."

"COUNSELS," pp. 54, 55, 59.

Sixth and Seventh Reasons, and their Refutations.

"6. Upon this theory there is no need of religion of any kind: no connection exists between religion and salvation: between the man who loves and serves God, and him who despises his service. Atheism is as good as piety; idolatry and [illegible] as safe a way to heaven as truth and righteousness. The 'one thing needful,' is, to be fully persuaded that nothing is needful. If men are only informed that there will be no future reckoning—no condemnation of the wicked—no future punishment—they need know nothing else; and whether they believe it or not, all are in the safe way to heaven. We presume that the principal preaching of Universalists is on the single point, that the wicked have nothing to fear on account of their sins; for why should they disturb their hearers about believing or doing other things? But the benefits of this system will, in the future world, be as fully enjoyed by those who oppose the doctrine, as by those who believe and preach it."

"7 This doctrine encourages men to continue in sin, by removing all fear of future judgment and punishment. In this respect its tendency is as bad as atheism itself; for the most impious denial of a divine Being can not promise more to its foolish votaries than exemption from judgment and future punishment. This species of Universalism is fraught with the very worst poison of atheism. It tells the sinner, that, let him act as wickedly as he will, or as he can, there is no fear of future misery.—Indeed, it is in some respects worse than atheism; for it not only promises exemption from punishment, but the reward of eternal happiness to the impenitent sinner. It says to the atrocious murderer and cruel assassin, 'You need fear no evil hereafter; though you should die in the commission of the foulest deeds, heaven, with all its glory and happiness, is yours,' etc.

"EIGHT REASONS, etc.

"Let your integrity be unsuspected. Never resort to any mean or underhand measures; but let your conduct and conversation be characterised by frankness and candor, by forbearance, and a spirit of indulgence and forgiveness. In short, 'do unto others as you would have them do unto you.'"

"Live not merely for yourselves, but also for the good of others. Selfishness contracts the soul, and hardens the heart. The man absorbed in selfish pursuits, is incapable of the sweetest, noblest joys of which our nature is susceptible. The Author of our being has ordained laws, according to which the most exquisite pleasure is connected, not with the direct pursuit of our own happiness, but with the exercise of benevolence. On this principle it is, that he who labors wholly for the benefit of others, and as it were, forgets himself, is far happier than the man who makes himself the centre of all his affections, the sole object of all his exertions. On this principle it was, that our Saviour said, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.' Resolve, therefore, to lead lives of usefulness. Be indifferent to nothing which has any relation to the welfare of men. Be not afraid of diminishing your own happiness, by seeking that of others. Devise liberal things, and let not avarice shut up your hand from giving to him that needeth, and to promote the cause of piety and humanity." * * * *

"Cherish and diligently cultivate genuine piety. 'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.'

Early piety is the most beautiful spectacle in the world. Without piety all your morality, however useful to men, is but a shadow. It is a branch without a root. Religion, above every other acquisition, enriches and adorns the mind of man; and it is especially congenial with the natural susceptibilities of the youthful mind. The vivacity and versatility of youth, the tenderness and ardor of the affections in this age, exhibit piety to the best advantage. How delightful is it, to see the bosoms of the young swelling with the lively emotions of pure devotion! How beautiful is the tear of penitence or of holy joy, which glistens in the eye of tender youth!—Think not, dear young people, that true religion will detract from your happiness.—It is a reproach cast upon your Maker, to indulge such a thought. It cannot be. A God of goodness never required anything of his creatures which did not tend to their true felicity. Piety may indeed lead you to exchange the pleasures of the theatre and ball room, for the purer joys of the church and oratory. It may turn your attention from books of mere idle fancy and fiction, to the word of God, which to a regenerated soul, is found to be sweeter than honey, and more excellent than the choicest gold; but this will add to your happiness, rather than diminish it. We would then affectionately and earnestly exhort and entreat you, to 'remember now your Creator in the days of your youth.' This will be your best security against all the dangers and temptations to which you are exposed; this will secure to you 'the favor of God, which is life, and his loving kindness, which is better than life.' Delay not your conversion; every day is lost time, which is not spent in the service of God." * * *

"Foolish, as most unreasonable, the idea that prayer is a dull or melancholy business. Such a sentiment must have been invented by Satan; for it never could have been suggested by reason, or taught by experience. Intercourse with the greatest and best of all Beings, must be a source of exalted pleasure." * * * "It will not spoil your pleasures, but will open for you new sources of enjoyment, far more refined and satisfactory, than any which prayerless persons can possess. Prayer is the only method by which intercourse between heaven and earth can be kept open. Often, too, in the performance of this duty, a taste of heaven is brought down to earth; and the pious worshipper anticipates, in some degree, those joys which are inexhaustible and eternal."

"COUNSELS," pp. 39, 40, 72–76, 80, 81, 82.

The want of room has compelled me to omit a part of some of the above reasons, and the Eighth Reason, as well as some further extracts from his Counsels. I have added no remarks or comments, preferring that the Doctor should be heard on both sides without interruption, even although he does not in his Counsels correct and refute all the misrepresentations of Universalism, which he has manufactured in his Reasons. But I would remark, very briefly, in conclusion, that the principal errors in his reasons are these.

1st Reason.—He takes for granted the very question in dispute—viz., that the Bible teaches the endless misery of some of those who were sinners on earth.

2d Reason.—He fully refutes in his Counsels the false position of this reason—viz. That there is not a God that judgeth in the earth.

3d Reason.—He assumes that men are restrained from sin only by the fear of endless misery—when the fact is, that the common doctrine of forgiveness of punishment, instead of sin, renders that no restraint at all—and the virtue caused by such a motive is no virtue. However, his Counsels show that there are other, and more certain punishments, and therefore more effectual restraints.

4th Reason.—His Counsels fully refute the notion that a life of virtue is one of suffering. It only remains, then, to say that we do not believe that the Sodomites, etc., were better off than Lot, etc., no more than he believes that Paul, the persecutor of Christians, was favored above the beloved John, in being removed from life before John was.

5th Reason.—He misrepresents us in saying that we do not plead the efficacy of repentance, and the pleasure of present salvation, although we do say, that the salvation of the future world is the gift of God, not of man's works; and that God "will by no means clear the guilty," though he will forgive sin—not punishment. The "Counsels" quoted speak our views well, and refute his "Reasons" as well.

6th Reason.—Dr. A. really talks as if there was no pleasure in serving God—that he is religious only to escape the pains of hell in another world! Is it possible that he means what he says? No—his "Counsels," which are like the preaching of Universalists on this subject, show clearly that he did not mean what he said in his "Reasons."

7th and 8th Reasons.—These are entirely misrepresentations of our views, whether intentional or not, and are wholly based on the supposition, that if there was no endless punishment, then it would be far wiser and better for men to be vicious than virtuous—in other words, that the only motive to virtue is a fear of hell—a base slander on the truth, and on all truly virtuous Christians, sufficiently refuted by extracts from the "Counsels."

It is to be hoped that the Dr. will follow his own "Counsels," the next time he sits down to write a tract against Universalism—especially the excellent advice which he gives on pages 45, 46, and 38—

"Beware of evil speaking. A habit of detraction is one of the worst which you can contract, and is always indicative of an envious and malignant heart." "Be conscientiously regardful of truth, even to a tittle, in all that you say. Never speak what will be likely to excite bad feelings, of any kind, in the minds of others." "Let your integrity be unsuspected. Never resort to any mean or underhand measures: but let your conduct and conversation be characterized by frankness and candor, by forbearance, and a spirit of indulgence and forgiveness. In short, 'do unto others as you would have them do unto you.'"

A. B. G.

CONCERT ANTICIPATED.—The celebration of Christmas Eve, in the Universalist church in this city, is changed to a commemoration, on Sunday evening next, instead of Monday evening, as noticed in our last. Reasons sufficient, but no room for them. A. B. G.

N. B. A collection will be taken up for the benfit of the choir.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br. QUEAL, in the school-house in South Bristol, near Allen Brown's.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. SMITH, at Salisbury Centre—Br. HAYWARD, at North Norwich—Br. WOOLLEY, in Madison—Br. FOSTER, in Hannibalville—Br. MARTIN, at Lock No. 1.—Br. DELONG, in New-Berlin.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in January, by Br. J. C. EDDY, at Stockwell Settlement, Sangerfield—Br. FOSTER, in Constantia—Br. MARTIN, in Palermo—Br. M. B. SMITH, at Eatonville, and will consider the consolations of the Gospel, in the afternoon, to the relatives and friends of John Bucklin, who departed this life on the fifth inst., in the eighty-fifth year of his age.

Christmas Eve will be celebrated in the Universalist church in the town of Clarendon, Orleans county.

Also, at the Masonic Hall, in the village of Salina, N. Y. A general attendance is requested.

A Conference will be holden in Lebanon, on the second Wednesday and Thursday in January next.

WM. M. DELONG.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper

R T, Cussewaga, (Pa) for self, P R and O H—Rev E E G, Hacpersfield, for R P, I K and A H—B B, Huffman's Ferry—C H, Hellen, (Pa)—P M, Chestertown, for S H L—P M, Volney, for A C—P M Brookville for A P—P M, Pratt's Hollow for J P—F R T, Woodbury, (Ct)—P M, Jacksonville, for self and I B—P M, Madison, (O) for D B and S S—P M, Moscow, for S R, J B and D P—G W C, Theresa, for self and A W—P, M, Fort Byron, for W O B—P M, Kent, (Ct) for E H F—P M, Perrinton, for S H, B I H—N S, Haysburg—P M, Johnson's Creek, for D A—D S, Ray, (Mich)—P M, Ripley—J B, Sharon Centre, (O) for self, J N E C and I B B,

POETRY

For the Magazine and Advocate

GOD'S GOODNESS EVINCED IN NATURE AND GRACE.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

What wonder fills the opening mind,
What rapture lifts the soul,
When nature's various works combined,
Are seen from pole to pole!

The rolling sun, the moon more pale,
The stars in splendor bright,
The earth whose treasures never fail,
Alternate day and night—

All these declare in union strong,
God's wisdom, power and grace;
And raise the heart in grateful song,
To God's exalted praise.

But when the plan of Gospel grace,
And God's undying love,
We, in religion, fondly trace,
And learn to look above;

Our wonder changes to delight;
Reflection ends in peace;
Waiting our souls, for worlds more bright,
From earth, would ask release.

ARE HOLIDAYS HAPPY DAYS?

Walter and Lawrence had been longing for the Christmas holidays. They began in November to count the weeks; and by thinking so much about the time, they made it appear much longer than it would have been if they had kept to their studies and been patient. For time when it is not noticed, passes very rapidly; but when you think of it, and measure it, and wait for it to pass, by minutes, and hours, and days, it becomes tedious to those who have no other occupation than to observe how slowly it goes. You would hardly believe how long one minute lasts, until you follow the hand of a clock or a watch.

But the twenty-fifth at last drew nigh, and the school was dismissed for a week. And now came the question for the two boys to settle—what shall we do? They lived in the country, and the snow covered the ground, so that it was not pleasant for boys who had been accustomed to pass their days in a warm school house, to be much out of doors. They were so used to sleighing, that it was no fun to them to jog along in the cold, with nothing to be seen but white fields and bare trees.—They found better exercise and amusement in gliding down the hill, back of the house, on their own little sledge; but after an hour's enjoyment of this sport, they found it rather solitary; and at last concluded that the pleasure of the rapid descent was not worth the labor of climbing back again to the top of the hill, dragging their vehicle behind them.

Then they came home and lounged about, not knowing how to employ themselves; till at last they fairly had to confess that they were tired of the holidays, and would be glad to meet with their school-fellows once more.—This took place the very second day of the vacation.

Their father was a sensible farmer. He had noticed the eagerness of the two boys for the holidays, and made up his mind to let them learn a useful lesson, by the disappointment which his own experience led him to anticipate for them. So he said and did nothing to help them out of their difficulty, until he heard them acknowledge, first, that it is folly to be looking forward to new pleasures with such impatience as to make our present occupation tedious; and, secondly, that pleasure does not consist in having nothing to do, but that, on the contrary, nothing is more wearisome than to be in want of occupation.

To have told the boys these things before the holidays, would have had no effect. It would have been impossible to persuade them that they would not be perfectly contented in having no lessons to learn, no school hours to observe, and no teacher's authority to submit to. But now they learned the truth by experience, and were convinced.

It was then that their father led them to the little bookcase, which was the last place in the world to which they had thought of resorting for amusement. He gave to Lawrence a neat volume, called "Customs and Anecdotes of the Bedouin Arabs;" and to Walter he handed another, called the "Memoir of Francke." The boys took the books rather unwillingly, for it never entered their minds to spend a holiday in reading. However, as their father wished it, and they had nothing else to occupy them, they sat down to look at the pictures, and to turn over the leaves. Lawrence soon began to read a little, in order to understand what was represented by the cuts; and he insensibly went on from page to page, without once raising his eyes from the book. He was not disturbed by his brother, for Walter had become so interested in the remarkable history of the Orphan House, and was so anxious to know how Francke got through all his difficulties in establishing it, that he sat without moving; and when they were called to dinner, they could hardly believe that the morning had passed.

"Now," said their father, "you have learned the secret of a useful and pleasant holiday. Your minds must be pleased, if you would have true enjoyment; and as you have spent your morning in useful reading, you will enjoy a little exercise after dinner; after this, whenever you are at a loss for amusement, you will know where to find it; and I hope you will never again have reason to complain of too much leisure."—Youth's Friend.

DEATHS.

In Victor, October 10th, MARY ELLEN, only child of Lester and Lucinda Frost, aged 1 year and 10 1-2 months.

Also, OLIVER ACKLEY, youngest child of Mark and Susan Wilmarth, aged 21 months. These fond parent's buds, removed from earth, now bloom in heaven. Funeral services by T. J. WHITCOMB.

In Canton, November 7th, after an illness of four weeks, Mrs. LUCY RALPH, consort of Mr. Stephen W. Ralph, formerly of Oneida county, aged 29 years. By her death, four children, one of them an infant, have been deprived of the care and early instruction of an affectionate, pious and discreet mother, and her husband of a most amiable companion. Funeral on the 8th, and sermon by F. J. BRIGGS.

UNIVERSALIST UNION.

This publication, as its title imports, is in defence of the final Restitution—in other words, the ultimate holiness and happiness of all men. A portion of it is devoted to miscellany of strict moral tendency. No efforts are spared to make it an instructive and interesting periodical—a welcome visiter in the domestic circle.

The publication of a highly interesting series of original articles, under the title—"JOURNAL OF A PHYSICIAN"—has just been commenced in its columns, and will be continued weekly throughout the present volume, and completed with it. They contain, "Observations on men and things, during several years peregrinations through Poland, Russia, Germany, France," etc., and are from the pen of an eminent European Physician. This work alone, though occupying but about one-eighth of the paper, it is believed, will be deemed worth the entire subscription.

The Union is a large super royal sheet, published weekly, and is now issued in two forms—Quarto and Octavo. Terms, $2 per annum for the Quarto, and $2.50 for the Octavo. The first No. of the 4th Vol. was issued November 10, 1838. The numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Specimen numbers also may be had on application at the Publishing Office, No. 130, Fulton-st., between Broadway and Nassau, New-York, to which place all communications and letters on business should be addressed.

☞ Universalist clergymen are respectfully requested, if agreeable to their feelings, to name the commencement of the Foreign Correspondence to their congregations. There may be those who would like to secure the volume on that account, who would not otherwise obtain information of it.

LIBERAL OFFER.

A VALUABLE LIBRARY, FOR ONLY FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

We have been furnished with a quantity of the old "Gospel Herald," which Br. Henry Fitz, its editor and proprietor, is desirous of having placed in the hands of community as speedily, and at as low rates, as possible, as will be seen by the following card from him. We have undertaken the trouble and expense of arranging and binding them; and in order to place them within the means of every one, and at the same time benefit ourselves a little, we offer them as Premiums for subscribers to the Universalist Union, on the following liberal terms:

One set, comprising 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th volumes, bound in three, in best muslin binding, lettered and volume-stamped, and FIVE copies of the Universalist Union, quarto, for one year, for every $10 enclosed to us free of expense; and five copies of the octavo, for $12 50. The 50 cents on the latter might be retained, and even the $2.50, for future remittance, when coming from known individuals and by mail.

Thus by procuring five new subscribers, and remitting as above, an individual can receive five volumes of the Herald, and so down, one volume of the Herald, as far as they hold out, to every subscriber of the UNION. The Gospel Herald is a valuable work—important for reference, and should be in the hands of every clergyman at least. A brief notice from the desk of our clergymen would insure them the requisite number of names. It will be useful also to laymen. Address "Universalist Union, No. 130, Fulton-street, New-York.

TO THE PUBLIC.

It is known to many persons that the subscriber formerly edited a religious publication in the city of New-York, entitled bearing the Gospel motto, "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." This work was closed with the seventh volume, May 5, 1827. It is eighteen years since the publication of said work was commenced, and 11 years since the last number of the seventh volume appeared. The Gospel Herald entered the field of discussion at a time when few coadjutors entered the combat, and a pretended orthodoxy had many and fierce advocates. The object, end and aim of said publication, as variously expressed in the Prospectus, was, to "demolish the Dagon of popular error—dissipate the delusions of interested partisans and erect the fabric of universal charity on the ruins of infuriate zeal, and pampered ignorance." It is proper to state, that no article, unless by mistake or oversight, ever appeared in that work, which was selected from other publications without a suitable acknowledgment; that every article in every volume, appears in its own proper character—communications from correspondents, as such—selections with the credit due them—and the articles written by the editor, without name or reference.—Intelligent correspondents contributed their aid, and many valuable selections were made from American and European writers of ability and deserved celebrity. The work was exclusively devoted to the discussion of theological subjects; and its columns, without regard to name or sect, were, in reality, open to the world. Extra volumes, to the number of, probably, more than 1000 volumes, have been preserved, of the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th and 7th volumes, the 1st and 2d volumes being, as the phrase is, out of print.

"THE GOSPEL HERALD,"

It is the desire of the subscriber, to send said extra volumes of the old Gospel Herald abroad into the world as missionaries, clothed in neat binding, to aid in furnishing libraries in the interior, in disseminating truth, etc.

The Proprietor of the Universalist Union, as will be seen by the above notice, has undertaken their circulation on terms within the reach of all, however limited their means.

The subscriber, therefore, asks with confidence, believers in "the God of salvation," to aid in the proper direction of these cheap missionaries, that their distribution may be facilitated to an early attainment of the object desired; and these preachers of the truth be at work, when the present generation of living preachers of every sect, shall have descended to "the grave, where there is neither work nor device, wisdom nor knowledge."

New-York, 1838. HENRY FITZ.

"SONGS OF ZION."

Just published and for sale at the "Trumpet" office, No. 40, Cornhill, (Up stairs,) the NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY, entitled, "SONGS OF ZION; OR THE CAMBRIDGE COLLECTION OF SACRED MUSIC; designed for the Church, for the Social Meetings of Christians, and for Family Worship; comprising a rich variety of the most popular tunes, anthems, etc., with many pieces from various authors, never before published, written expressly for this work; arranged with a figured bass for the Organ and Piano Forte. To which is prefixed a Familiar Introduction to the art of Singing, designed for the aid of those who are entirely unacquainted with the science of music; the Instruction being reduced to great plainness and simplicity." By THOMAS WHITTEMORE. Fifth Edition, enlarged and revised, containing eight additional pages of original anthems, for Temperance Celebrations, without any increase of price. Persons acquainted with the science of harmony are requested to call and examine this work.

This book contains upwards of three hundred tunes, of a great variety of metres. In addition to these, there are upwards of 100 pages of Anthems.

It has upwards of 350 pages of the size of the "Boston Academy's Collection;" and will be sold at the same price. The author pledges himself to the public, that neither pains nor expense have been spared to render this work correct, in its scientific, and elegant in its mechanical execution.

This work is very particularly recommended in cases where different denominations of Christians unite in "Union Singing Schools." On the great theme of praise all Christians agree; we can all unite our hearts and voices in celebrating the praises of God and the Redeemer, and the glories of eternity. In a great number of cases, the whole hymn is put upon the same page with the tune, which will be very convenient in singing these tunes as voluntaries. There are many most excellent hymns inserted entire, which appear in no hymn book in common use.

Boston, September 29, 1838.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME IX. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1838. NUMBER 52.

For the Magazine and Advocate

EFFECTS OF TRUE AND FALSE HOPE.

That the children of men are influenced either by true or false hope, is clearly demonstrated by every day's experience and observation; and just in proportion as they enjoy the fruit of a true or false hope, they are happy or miserable. True hope is always productive of peace and happiness, while a false hope is a continued source of misery and unhappiness.

These premises we hold to be incontrovertible. They reach all classes and conditions in life; and not until the stream can rise higher than its fountain, or the cause produce a counter effect, can they be proved false.

In the attainment of any object, hope of success is the grand stimulus, the mainspring of human effort; it matters not whether it be from motives that will propagate virtue and morality, or vice and wickedness. Hence the importance of having our hopes based upon correct principles, and our understandings enlightened, that we may discriminate between right and wrong, good and evil.

> "'Tis education forms the common mind—
> Just as the twig is bent, the tree's inclined."

Go with me, kind reader, to the gloomy walls of yonder prison, and there behold thy brother manacled with iron hand-cuffs and rattling chains; whose hopes and prospects were once fair; who shared the aid of kindred and friends, and the protection of a kind father, an affectionate and fond mother; who was encircled in the society and unsophisticated love of brothers and sisters, and whose heart beat high with honorable, noble, and useful expectations. But, alas! in an unguarded moment, (having been taught the pleasures of sin,) he yielded to the seductive blandishments of the serpent, and became the dupe of a false hope; and with blighted prospects, withered affections, and blasted hopes, is now doomed to dwindle out a life of misery and disgrace, verifying the truth of holy writ, which declares, that "the way of the transgressor is hard, and there is no peace to the wicked."

Go, again, to a lunatic asylum, to a very babel of human misery, and there see the laws of nature changed from their primitive and original beauty. Those voices that were once heard in the temple and the sanctuary, with the gathered host, tuning the sweet melody of thanksgiving and praise to God and the Lamb, and breaking the bread of life to the spiritual and eternal wants of the children of men, are now heard in the ravings of madness, and the incoherent mutterings of blasphemy and imprecations of the Most High. Do you ask why these things are so! Turn to the history of midnight rant, and the teachings of protracted meetings, and there you will learn that they were inducted into the principles of a false hope, and made to believe that God was their incensed enemy; that they must be willing to be damned for the glory of their Creator; and if they sinned away the day of grace, there was no pardon in this world, or that which is to come.

Again, we see the husband and father, whose countenance once beamed with the smile of conjugal and parental affection—whose presence gave joy and gladness to the domestic circle—whose store-house was filled with plenty—whose house was none other than the abode of peace and happiness—whose "meat and drink" was to do the will of his heavenly Parent, in the practical duties of religion, in providing for those of his own household, comforting the sick, the widow, and fatherless, in their afflictions, and in keeping himself unspotted from the contaminating influence of vice and dissipation.

But the scene is soon changed. Flattered by the delusions of a "false hope," he partakes of the intoxicating bowl—glass after glass is quaffed by the unthinking man, little heeding the danger he is subjecting himself to. Days, weeks, months, and years, pass away without apparent injury. But time has moved in its onward course. Nature, true to its laws, has finally confirmed the habit, and stamped the seal of a drunkard in his now bloated countenance, palsied limbs, sunken eyes, and visage pale, and he has at last become the very sot he once so much despised! His house becomes the abode of poverty, wretchedness, and rags; peace and tranquility no longer surround the parental board; his heart becomes callous to the refined and nobler sensibilities of human nature; he listens unmoved to the pitiless cries and sufferings of his now helpless children, and turns a deaf ear to the prudent admonition and kind entreaties of his disconsolate and broken hearted companion, whom he is bound to love, cherish, and protect, and who, bending beneath the bitter weight of grief, watches with patience the midnight taper, in anxious expectation of the return of her abandoned husband, that she may once more enjoy the momentary satisfaction of knowing that, for a few more hours, he is comparatively safe within the protecting walls of his changed and abused home. The first faint glimmerings of day are seen in the East, and now the tottering step of the self-ruined man is heard at the door. No word of reproach escapes her lips—nay, he is greeted with a smile; and, oh! if that heart were not changed to adamant, he would feel that smile. But no, the "Rubicon is passed!"—he has leaned upon a broken staff—a false hope! To return to what he once was, is improbable. The die is cast, and he plunges into the lethean charm of the inebriating cup! A few more days, and he falls the victim of his own folly, and fills a drunkard's grave! Oh! what human power of calculation can compute the consequent evils of a false hope! In its slow but certain effects, it poisons the healthful streams of earthly happiness, paralyzes the mental and moral powers of the mind, degrades and debases the refined and better feelings of man, changes the voice of friendship to "discord wild," and turns the heart of affection to hatred, cruelty, and revenge.

Such are some of the legitimate and inevitable fruits of a false hope. Let us now turn our attention to the true foundation of hope, which God hath laid in Zion. "Behold, I lay Zion for a foundation, a stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation, and he that believeth, shall not be ashamed." Here, then, we find the foundation of true hope. It is based upon the immutable and unalterable promises of Jehovah, and made known to us through the Gospel of Jesus Christ; and "he that hath this hope, purifieth himself," carrying within, a fixed and undeviating principle of virtue. He subdues the baser passions of the human heart, and the power of temptation falls harmless at his feet.

Again: St. Paul says, "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Taking for granted, that the apostle's reasoning is correct, no one is warranted in hoping for the truth of the doctrine of endless misery, even though he hope for it for himself; for such a hope would be in direct opposition to the nature and character of Deity, and at war with the better principles of man's moral nature. And on the other hand, to hope for happiness and eternal life, to the exclusion of others; to be ambitious only of individual advantage, and labor to secure an interest in Heaven, as a refuge from the penalties and threatenings of a supposed angry and vindictive Judge—betrays a sordid selfishness, which is uncongenial with the true spirit and principles of the Gospel, and alike opposed to the revealed will of God.

True hope is like an anchor to the soul, both sure and stedfast. It never makes its possessor sad and melancholy; it pleads no extenuating excuse for the votaries of vice and iniquity; it is no advocate for the pleasures of sin, or for the doctrine that the way of the transgressor is easy. It whispers not that stolen waters are sweet, or that bread eaten in secret is pleasant. It teaches not that our heavenly Parent is a cruel and vindictive Being, who hates the children of his creation with a malicious and infinite hatred, and who will, if they do not repent, obtain a hope, and get religion in this life, doom their precious and immortal souls to ceaseless burnings,

> "Amid distracting tortures, racks, and chains, > Incessant groanings, and eternal pains."

No—these are the fruits of a false hope, and have no claim to a well-grounded hope in God. True hope is founded upon the goodness of God. It is as high as the heavens, deep as the earth, and lasting as eternity. It reaches to earth's remotest bounds, embracing in its fulness every son and daughter of the Adamic family, even the lone wigwam of the > "Poor Indian, whose untutored mind

> Sees God in clouds, and hears him in the wind"—

And who, with a pure heart and sincere devotion, worships the Great Spirit, and hopes for a humble haven of rest, where

> "No fiends torment, no Christians thirst for gold."

The individual whose hopes are thus expanded by the power of universal love and goodness, can look forward to the eternal world with an eye of faith that illuminates the darkness of futurity, and penetrates the clouds which obscure his mental horizon, and, in view of a ransomed universe, freed from the power of sin and death, rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

> "Should seven-fold storms of thunder roll,
> And shake the earth from pole to pole;
> No thunder-bolt shall daunt his face,
> For Jesus is his hiding-place."

In every relation of life, whether in sickness or health, prosperity or adversity, living or dying, hope points to Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith, "lights up a smile in the aspect of wo," and gives its possessor a foretaste of that happy period when this mortal shall put on immortality. Over the bed of pain, disease, and death, it affords a balm for the distressed, a cordial for our fears, and pours the oil and wine of consolation into the afflicted bosom of suffering humanity. Over every evil thought and word, it exercises the most wholesome influence in leading us to do unto others as we would they should do unto us; making love the governing principle of our lives, it causes us to forgive our enemies, to overcome evil with good, and to love God because he first loved us.

A life thus consecrated to the service of the Redeemer, and to studying the purposes of his mission, the virtues of his life, death, and resurrection, the excellency of his Gospel, the grandeur of his moral character, the majesty of his life dedicated to acts of charity, benevolence and love, the sublimity of his precepts and examples—I say, it it is by strict adherence to these things, that we approximate nearer and yet nearer to the practical duties of religion, and become imitators of God as dear children. This is true hope—this is "eternal life."

MARIUS.

Hamilton, N. Y., 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SUNDAY MAIL;
FOR SUNDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1838.

1 JOHN V 13-31.

The abridged limits allowed me, by the concomitants of the closing number of a volume, prevent me from dilating as much on the passage before us as I could wish. We are taught by the apostle, that all the petitions of that believer, whose spirit and desires are brought into complete conformity with the spirit and will of God, will certainly be granted. If disappointments and defeats are to be dreaded and avoided, how carefully and how constantly should we strive after this conformity! Let us ask ourselves, more and more frequently, when we wish, or when we pray, would we so wish, or would we so request, were our hearts perfectly pure and perfectly enlightened?

The sin unto death, is probably a sin, the natural or legal consequences of which were the death of the body. This sin was not to be interfered with. The laws of society and of nature must have their course, whatever we may do to alleviate the miseries of the unhappy criminals.

The strong language of the 18th verse has been very singularly construed, by various denominations. It simply means that he who "dwelleth in love," does not wilfully injure any one, but seeks the good of all. "Love worketh no ill to its neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law," is precisely the same in meaning.

The remainder of the passage scarcely needs any explanation; we therefore pass to our concluding remarks and valedictory.

CONCLUDING ADDRESS TO THE READERS OF "THE SUNDAY MAIL."

FELLOW STUDENTS OF THE SCRIPTURES, FELLOW-DISCIPLES OF JESUS:

A year has now elapsed since we commenced this weekly series of explanatory and practical illustrations of select portions of the New Testament. This series was commenced, and has been prosecuted, in the hope that something might be thereby contributed towards a better, a more definite understanding of the Scriptures, and towards a practical application of the truths therein revealed to the amendment of our conduct and conversation. This was the object. The means adopted have consisted in giving a faithful exposition of the meaning of each paragraph selected, as it was primarily intended to be understood, and with reference to those to whom it was at first addressed, and, next, in making some suitable application of its contents to our own times, circumstances, or cases. These have been the means. Meditation, self-examination, resolution, and persevering effort must have accompanied these means, else of little avail. And, now, at the close of this series, and at the conclusion of a year, what more befitting question can we put to ourselves than this—What use have we made of the means within our reach to improve our religious knowledge and character? How much wiser, how much better are we than we were at the beginning of this year? If we had the time to live over again, would we not make a better use of it? If we are able to answer such questions satisfactorily, there is good reason to hope that at the conclusion of some other opportunity of improvement—at the close of another year, we shall have still more grounds of complacency in our retrospect. If, on the other hand, we have much to regret, and little to be satisfied with, let us trace our faults to their true causes, and by a little more exertion, in what remains to us of life and opportunity, prepare ourselves to give in our account with joy, and not with grief.—Brethren, in the hope of your moral prosperity, and of a blissful recognition, FAREWELL.

PHILO PAIDON.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1838.

CLOSE OF THE VOLUME.

Worn down to a poor state of health on account of the severe labors incidental to closing up the volume, and most of all, by the depression of spirits and carking cares consequent upon the pecuniary difficulties of the year just ending, we still feel strongly to wish to others the happiness, prosperity and peace that is not our lot. May this joyous and cheering season bring on its wings the abundance of God's temporal bounties and blessings to our subscribers and readers, and awaken and increase in their bosoms, gratitude to the Giver, confidence in his never failing goodness and grace, and faith in his all-glorious promises. To the healthful, may he impart grace to visit and support the weak—to the cheerful, inclination and means to revive the desponding—to the wealthy, an efficient impulse to impart to the suffering needy—and to the benevolent and charitable, every means to carry into effect all the kindly desires of their souls. To all may the anniversary of a Saviour's birth, and the close of a year, impart serious reflections on the opportunities neglected, on the means of good poorly employed, on the privileges abused, on the blessings coldly received, and on the means of grace and salvation despised, unheeded, or perverted to a selfish purpose. And oh, may our Father grant to us all, resolutions to avoid these shortcomings and transgressions in the year just opening upon us, that when we review its close, we may avoid the bitterness of present reflections!

The year is departing—almost gone—with its hopes, its joys, its sorrows and distresses. The dearly loved dead, who were rejoicing with us in all the enjoyments of life at its commencement—they are with us no more! We miss them from our sides, in our enjoyments—in our afflictions, their voices are heard not, their countenances beam upon us no longer. But we rejoice in the hope, that when days and years shall cease to be the measuring periods of our existence, we shall meet them again to enjoy them more, to love them better, and to part with them no more forever! Oh, glorious thought! Mourning reader, is it your hope—your faith? Are you properly grateful to God for its revelation? Do you appreciate all its power—its consolation—its importance? If you do, you will exert yourself to impart it to those around you—to spread it abroad among the children of sorrowing and dying humanity—to render it universal in the earth. Have you thus exerted yourself—do you thus endeavor to manifest your sense of the goodness of your faith, and your gratitude to God for its revelation? If you have not—if you do not—alas, I fear, dear reader, that your faith is dead, being alone—that it works not by love in your heart—that it is a mere head religion, never expanding the heart with the delicious fulness of love to God and to all mankind. Oh, may God work powerfully by his spirit of loving kindness in all our hearts, till all we have and all we do shall speak forth the goodness and the glory of the religion we profess—of universal benevolence!

Reader—whether subscriber, or agent, or correspondent, or simply a reader, the best wishes of the season to you—the best blessings of God on you—nor to you only, but to the world at large, we wish the enjoyment of peace and plenty—spiritual and temporal, now and forever. Amen.

A. B. G.

IS IT MURDER?

I noticed in some of the newspapers an account of a recent event in New-York, headed, in some cases "unnatural murder," in others, "murder and suicide," with comments accordingly. The statement, as narrated in all the different papers, embraces the following particulars.

A mother, of a very high spirit, deserted by her husband, (at least so far as provision for the wants of the family was concerned,) was unable to bear the misery and poverty thus imposed on her. She believed she and her child must perish for want of the necessaries of life. Unable to bear the thought—deeming sudden death far preferable to the slow, lingering one of hunger and cold—she destroyed her child, and then attempted to put an end to her own existence. In the latter attempt she was prevented just in time; but too late to save her child. It is added, that a coroner's inquest brought in a verdict in accordance with the foregoing circumstances; but the terms of the verdict are not stated. However, as the editors all agree in calling it "murder," it is presumed that such was their verdict, and that, in all probability, the unhappy woman will be tried for that crime. But, let us solemnly and seriously ask, Is it murder?

1st. What is murder? It is killing with "malice aforethought." There must be malice, either general or personal, in the case, or it is not murder. Nor only so, the malice must be aforethought—felt and entertained before the act of killing, so as to form a motive to its commission, or it is not murder.

2d. Was there such malice in this case?—that is, on the supposition that the statement above given, is true and correct in all its parts. I answer, no. For aught that appears, the woman as tenderly loved her child, up to the very moment of its death, as any mother ever loved her babe. And, aside from her conduct towards her child at all other times, and aside from her general character, the very circumstances of the case, prove, that the deep affection of a mother, and not malice, was the motive that led to the destruction of the child. To save it from a slow, wasting, and most cruel death, (as she believed,) she put an end to its being in as speedy and easy a manner as possible. Resolved on ending her own life, to avoid a still more painful death, she could not endure that her child should be left behind, without a guardian to watch over its helplessness, and provide for its wants—to linger in misery, and die a terrible death of cold and famine, if it did not live a life of neglect and shame—for these reasons, all based in love for her child, she put an end to its mortal existence, previous to terminating her own.

God forbid that I should extenuate deep settled crime, or weaken a single impulse founded on justice, that requires its proper and adequate punishment! But so strongly persuaded am I of the absence of all malice in this case of killing, that I can not call it murder. Nor do I notice this particular case with a design to interfere between any just law and its proper victim, or to bias a single mind wrongly; but because I think it a very suitable case, by which to call public attention—especially the attention of all who make and execute our laws—to the subject in general. Until the human mind shall be more studied and better understood in all its continually changing conditions, and until our sanguinary laws are altered to accord with the genius of humanity and civilization, and the spirit of Christianity, irreparable wrong must often be done to the unfortunate, and their more innocent relatives and friends be cruelly and unjustly involved in bitter grief and burning shame. To all, then—for in this country, every voter in the land has a hand in the making and execution of the laws—to all, then, I say, study the human mind—acquaint yourselves with its multifold operations—accustom yourselves to analyze its motives, and to look upon actions with reference to the condition and motives of the mind that originate and impel to the execution of them. Do this in the spirit of the Gospel, and in that same holy and humane spirit, look at the laws by which those actions are judged, and at the effects which their penalties are calculated to produce, not only on the criminal and such as he, but on the yet unhardened, unvitiated and uncrucified community. And I am persuaded that you will be led to the conviction, that many unjustly suffer severe penalties, who, at most, were obnoxious only to lighter punishments—that many acts punished with a vindictive severity as crime, should rather be commiserated as the effects of an unfortunate aberration of intellect—and that the penalties visited on many offenders by our laws, (especially the punishment of death,) not only render the reformation of the criminal more difficult, but tend to increase in community the feelings which first led the punished man to crime and transgression.

In the case above named, it is very evident from the circumstances narrated, that wounded adhesiveness and probably self-esteem, (caused by the desertion of her husband and the supposed equivocal situation that event was calculated to place her in before the community,) mortified love of approbation, (for she did not suffer a subsistence on public charity, to enter her calculation for obtaining a living,) combined with great cautiousness and destructiveness, led to a resolve to end her life.—These, phrenologically speaking, formed the motives that led to the attempt at suicide. There must have been a deficiency of hope—probably of vitativeness—but these were the active causes. The death of the child was added to her resolve of self-destruction, by highly active philoprogenitiveness, or love of her child, in operation with the other named propensities—all, together, forming strong extenuating motives, and clearly removing the case out of the legitimate definition of murder. Such cases are, alas, very numerous—and, to the reproach of legislators, juries, and judges be it said, have been too frequently pronounced murder, and punished with death.

But let us consider the punishment. What good will it effect? It will kill one who sought to take her own life! All the punishment then, will be, in accusing the mother of hating the child, which her love—her blind but excessive love, alone—led her to destroy. It will add public exposure and disgrace to her self-sought death. It will wound the feelings of her family and friends, by making insanity a black-hearted crime in their relation and friend. These are the evils it will effect; but who is there that believes the hanging of this luckless woman will effect any good? Will it prevent other mothers from becoming insane through the fear of starvation? Will it prevent other mothers from despatching a much loved child, in a paroxysm of maternal anguish, when reason is so unsettled as to fear that that child must otherwise suffer tenfold more from famine and freezing? No—all it will do—all it can do, will be to render them more determined in their measures, and more speedy and more certain in executing them! Is it not high time, then, that civilized, humane and Christian people should attend to their laws on these subjects, and to the proper execution of them?—that capital punishments, in short, should be abolished—at least, in all cases where there is the least probability of mistaking the motives of the criminals, or the evidence by which they may be convicted?

If any would further examine this interesting subject, they will find it ably treated in Gall's works, and in Spurzheim's treatise on Phrenology—but more particularly in his treatise on Insanity, and in his work on Education, pp 268 to 318. The latter, in particular, should be carefully read by every lawmaker, judge, juror and witness in our land. A. B. G.

GENESIS III: 15.

We are anxious, as far as possible, to close every controversy in the same volume in which it commenced. We have endeavored, for a few weeks past, to find room for an article from Br. Van Alstine, in reply to Br. Manley's, published last June; but have not succeeded, on account of its length—it occupying equal to more than 6 pages of letter paper, all on the word IT! Really, I do not think the passage so important as to require so much room; and at this season, we have it not to spare; I have therefore condensed it as follows.

Br. Van Alstine did not notice Br. M.'s remarks sooner, because he laid them aside, and forgot them till now. He thinks that Br. M.'s "habit" of referring the pronoun "it" [Heb he, as the Hebrew has no neuter gender] to the seed of the woman, instead of the enmity, inclines him to his opinion published in June, especially as it "will bear" an application to the enmity. Br. Van Alstine does not suppose that enmity, abstractly considered, will bruise the serpent's head,—any more than wisdom, personified, is to effect any thing abstractly considered. The seed of the woman, he supposes to be all mankind—the serpent, lust—and his seed, sin. The first Gospel promise he thinks was not made to the serpent, but to Abraham; and accordingly Jesus is never spoken of as the "seed of the woman," as if in reference to this declaration in Genesis; but as "the seed of Abraham." His concluding remarks are as follows—which, when read in connection with what has already been published by both parties, in March and June last, will enable every reader to make up his mind for himself on the subject. A. B. G.

But how, you seem to ask, is this enmity to bruise the serpent's head? This query I have answered, in part, in the foregoing; by saying, if this enmity was, as you say, equally "divided between" mankind and the serpent kind, it would beget in each a jealousy that would clash in war. And man, being endowed with a higher order of faculties, both of body and of mind, must and will prevail! And I now conclude by saying—there is a natural aversion to sin existing in the human heart. And the wise, the virtuous, and the good, are not drawn away from the pathway of moral rectitude by the temptations and vain allurements of the arch, subtle, and deceiving devil. No, that enmity which God put between them and sin, (which is the seed of the serpent,) enables them to say, (when they are tempted,) "get thee behind me, satan." And thus they hit the serpent, "a clew on the head."

Believe me, Br, the bad actions of mankind are the bread and life of the devil! Therefore, let us preach to the world is both word and deed, to act right, do good, and be good, and we shall starve him to death—or, in other words, rob him of his power and influence, which will so effectually "bruise his head," as to ensure his death. I am thy brother in "the faith once delivered to the saints." DAVID VAN ALSTINE.

Campbell, November 25, 1838.

FIGURATIVE LANGUAGE OF THE BIBLE.

The attentive reader of the Bible, or one who is acquainted with the modes of speech used by oriental people, fully understands that it was and is a custom among eastern nations to express their ideas in strong figures and to use the most powerful illustrations to exhibit sorrow, gladness, desolation and war. Some very striking examples of this fact, occur even in modern times. In 1830, the king of England sent a present of five horses to Runjeet Sing, the Seik chieftain of Lahore, in India. Runjeet Sing returned a letter of thanks for the present. In that letter, he calls the person (Lieut. Burnes, of the British Army) who brought the present, "the nightingale of the garden of eloquence," the "bird of the winged words of sweet discourse." Of the shoes of the horses, he speaks thus, "on beholding their shoes, the new moon turned pale with envy, and nearly disappeared from the sky." Yet this manner of expression is in perfect good keeping with the custom of all eastern nations.

Instances of this figurative speech occur in almost every part of the Bible. Especially, when great joy was to be exhibited, all inanimate nature was called upon to rejoice. When the "foundations of the earth" were laid, Job says, that "the morning stars sang together." Job xxxviii: 7. To exhibit the success of the Messiah's kingdom, the prophet said, "the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." Isa. xxxv: 1. When Deborah and Barak overcame the Canaanitish host under Sisera, they said in the song of their triumph, that "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera."—Judges v: 20. These few instances from among multitudes, show that broad figures were used in the expression of idea. And if this fact was more fully remembered, and the figurative language of the Bible carefully discriminated, that Bible would be far better understood than it now is. C. W. M.

REMOVAL.—Br. Potter has removed to Cooperstown, and may be found at the residence formerly occupied by him. All letters and papers, intended for him, are requested to be directed to that place.

IMPORTANT BUSINESS ITEMS.

1. AGENTS.—Please regulate your lists as early as possible, and let us know the result. Keep the Prospectus, to get more new subscribers. Be sure to look at the "Direcions for Agents," on the Prospectus, and observe them as nearly as possible. For your past services you have our warm gratitude, and heartfelt blessings.

2. Post riders, Will please attend carefully to the same general directions given to Agents.

3. Delinquents who are owing for several years, are entreated by every consideration of honor, honesty, justice and generosity, not to leave us to suffer any longer by their delay—let them send at least a part of what they owe us. Some of them will be stricken from our list until we hear from them—not in anger, but from dire necessity, and in sorrow.

4. Subscribers to the present volume who have not paid within the year, must expect, as a matter of course, to pay two dollars and fifty cents, according to the terms. We lose even by that, if not in money, in the miseries we have suffered for the want of the pay in advance.

5. Correspondents, we sadly need your aid; and, though already deeply indebted to your kindness—more than words can tell—we hope for more from your generosity. Some few have not sent a line to cheer us for a long time. Have we offended—and wherein? Let us hear from you, if possible, and soon. Remember—articles less than two columns in length are always most read.

6. Discontinuers have so often been notified of our terms, and the loss either they or we must suffer by delay, that we hope there will be no more, unless of those who get some one in their stead.

Lastly—Can not every subscriber find some one among his friends or neighbors, who would be benefited by becoming a subscriber to our paper? And will they not endeavor to procure him or her on our list? We want to do all the good we can, and the more subscribers we have, the greater our circle of usefulness—provided they are paying subscribers; for otherwise they are leeches who drain us of our substance, without benefiting any one.

To one and all, we wish, "A happy New Year."

G. and H.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in January, by Br. J. C. EDDY, at Stockwell Settlement, Sangerfield—Br. FOSTER, in Constantia—Br. MARTIN, in Palermo—Br. M. B. SMITH, at Eatonville, and will tender the consolations of the Gospel, in the afternoon, to the relatives and friends of John Buckin, who departed this life on the fifth inst., in the eighty-fifth year of his age.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in January, by Br. WOOLLEY, at Stockbridge—Br. WHISTON, in Oxford, and Br. J. T. GOODRICH, in Cooperstown—Br. H. B. SOULE, at New-Berlin village,

Br. H. B. SOULE, will preach on the evenings of January 16th, at Preston Corners—17th, at McDonough village.

Br. E. E. GUILD will preach on the evenings of January 17th, at Cohersville—18th, at Portlandville—19th, at the school-house near the Maryland Postoffice—20th, at the Academy in Worcester—21st, at Decator.

Br. J. T. GOODRICH, will preach on the evenings of January 15th, at Clarkville—16th, at Westville.

A conference of the Chenango Association of Universalists, will be held at South Bainbridge, on Wednesday and Thursday, January 9th and 10th. Ministering brethren earnestly invited to attend.

The third Conference of the Otsego Association, will be holden at the village of Laurens, Otsego county, on the 16th and 17th of January,

O. WHISTON, Standing Clerk.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper

P M, Montrose (Pa for E B—P M, Defiance, (O) for L L—P M, Sodus Point, for self, H F, E S, J H, J Y and A McI—P M, Depauville, for self and M G—P M Fairport for C H—P M, Madison (O) for J W and A C C—J R, Union—P M, South Otselic—S W C, Le Roy, for E M—A T, Cuba, (O) for self and T T J—P M, South Chili, for I A and G D—P M, Otto, for S H, W R W, V W B—P M, East Bethany, for M L—P M Ovid, for E D—J B, East Pharsalia—P M, Royal Oak, (Mich)—H S, Pompey—J A, Copley Centre—Z N E, Canton, for self and others—S S, Cold Water, (Mich) for self A T, L E and J H S—P M, Guilford for A S and J K—P M, Brookville, for J M—P M, Brooks Grove, for E S and S A—F R, North Penfield, for J F W and W W—W R F, Factoryville—P M, Cooperstown, for S M, O W and O H—O C W, Caledonia, for self, C W, and L B—L J S, Milpink, for self and C L S—J S, Medina—P M, New-London, (N H for A W K—E D, Mount Hope, for self and D C—P M, Moscow, for A C—H S H, Rushford, for self, J R, J B and S L F—P M, East Sheridan, for self and B F—P M, Oaksetou, for A W D, J R, B R, F B and A McG.

POETRY

[From the Trumpet.]

THE HUMBLE POOR.

When days are short, when cold winds blow,
When nights are dark, when falls the snow,
And blocks the cottage door;
Then let the rich the call obey,
And send relief without delay,
And bless the humble poor.

Hard is their lot, where children cry
For bread; and where the widow's eye
Is dim with tears of grief!
O, charity, go forth with speed,
Stretch out thy hand to those in need,
And kindly grant relief!

You who in wealth abound, and know
No lack of comforts here below,
O listen to the cry
Of those, whose comforts are but few,
Who lack for bread and clothing too,
And quickly send supply.

So in return, on you shall fall
Rich blessings, neither few nor small,
From Him who rules above;
For he such services requires,
Such sacrifices too, desires,
Such offerings will love.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ADDRESS TO THE DEITY.

BY MISS MARY M. HAMILTON.

Time, alas, is ever carrying us swiftly forward, and stops not in its mighty course! Nations rise and fall—kings are born and descend to the grave! One year after another follows in its course—seasons begin and end—bloom and their beauties perish! Night and day successively bring their destined changes; but Thou, O God, art immutable! Thy throne is from eternity to the same "without variableness or shadow of turning!" From everlasting to everlasting is engraved on the blazonry that surrounds the [illegible] countless proofs of thy unchanging Divinity! Thou art "the same yesterday, to-day and forever!"—Every object that is visible in the broad expanse of the heaven, or on this beautiful earth, is full of Thee, and loudly bespeaks thy adorable existence!

ACTS XVII. 31.

The following criticisms on a part of the above text, applicable and applied to a variety of similar passages, is from the pen of Br. Wadsworth, of the Berean and Biblical Interpreter. He gives much in little space, and is as clear as glass in conveying the full meaning of a passage. A. B. G.

CRITICISMS.....NO. V.

"Because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by the man whom he hath ordained." The Greek phrase rendered "in which he will judge," is en he mellei krinein. Krinein is in the infinitive mood, present tense—to judge; and should be so rendered. But to read it, "in which he will to judge," would be incorrect. The question then arises, does the word will belong there? Does mellei signify will? No. The verb thelo is the Greek for will, as in 1 Tim. ii: 4. Mello, the root for mellei, is defined—to be about to do, be on the point of doing. John iv: 47 is in point. The nobleman besought Jesus to go down and heal his son. "for he was at the point of death." That is, he was about to die. I will here quote the criticism of Dr. Parkhurst upon the word mello. He says, mello "with an infinitive following, signifies to be about to do a thing, futurus sum." Dr. Geo. Campbell, on Matt. iii: 7, says, "mellon often means, not only future, but near. There is just such a difference between esiai and mellei esesthai in Greek, as there is between it will be, and it is about to be, in English. This holds particularly in threats and warnings." Reader, keep these criticisms in mind, for they come from believers in endless misery; and therefore we are justified in taking full advantage of them, "particularly in threats and warnings."

Well; in our text mello occurs with an infinitive following, so that it should read, he "hath appointed a day in which he is about to judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained."

The same criticism applies to Matt. xvi: 27.—"The Son of man shall come (mellei erchesthai) is about to come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then shall he reward every man according to his works." This rendering is sustained by the 28th verse—"There be some standing here that shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom." Dr. Campbell renders Matt. iii: 7 and Luke iii: 7, thus—"who hath prompted you to flee from the impending vengeance?"

2 Tim. iv; 1—"I charge thee before God, and and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge (is about to judge) the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom."

1 Pet. iv: 5, is a parallel text, though a different term is used. "Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead." Parkhurst says the word etoimos, here rendered ready, signifies "to be ready, prepared:" All things were in near readiness for the judgment, only awaiting Christ's appearing in his kingdom, which was about to take place.

There are other terms in the text worthy of attention, but we can not attend to every thing at once. N. W.

MARRIAGES.

In Madison, November 8th, by Rev. A. Williams, Mr. RILEY S. EATON, of Eaton, to Miss SARAH M. BARKER, of the former place.

At Earlville, November 21st, by the same, Mr. EDWIN F. SMITH, to Miss HANNAH HOLMES, both of Hamilton.

In Nelson, October 21st, by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. LEANDER EDGARTON, of Hamilton, to Miss ——— McARDELL, of the former place.

In Newport, December 5th, by Rev. D. R. Biddlecom, Mr. DARWIN W. ALLEN, to Miss MARY RIX, both of Newport.

In Royalton, November 29th, by Rev. C. Hammond, Mr. JACOB COONEY, to Miss LOUISA SLAYTON, both of that town.

In Murray, December 9th, by the same, Mr. ELY FARNSWORTH, to Miss ALMEDA LAKE, both of Murray.

DEATHS.

In Madison, November 5th, Miss ALICE CURTIS, aged 20 years. In early life, sister C. fell a victim to the dread destroyer, the consumption. Long enough she lived to insure the regard of friends and associates, by her mildness, and complacency of disposition, and devoted affection and virtue. Religion had taken its abode in her heart—the great truths of the Restitution found in her an humble and warm votary, and with them her life was adorned and supported. In her departure, another refutation is furnished, of the trite assertion, that "Universalism will do to live, but not to die by." She found it good in health, and better when laid low on the couch of sickness. It banished every fear, disarmed death of its terror, and calmed the feelings in quietude and resignation to the will of our heavenly Father. May the hope of the Gospel comfort and console the afflicted. Sermon by the writer. A. WILLIAMS.

In Hamilton, November 29, Mrs. ABIGAIL WATERHOUSE, aged 25 years. Mrs. W. was another victim of the consumption. In society she was respected, in life cheerful and happy, in death resigned to the pleasure of God. A fond husband is left to mourn, but not as those who have no hope; and two children are deprived of a mother's care and indulgence. But what is their loss, is her gain. May the blessings of God descend on, and console the mourners. Sermon by A. W.

In the town of Norway, Herkimer county, December 9th, CHARLES GRAY, aged 2 years and 1 month. While the gem of immortality is enshrined in an earthly casket, the Giver sometimes breaks it, and takes the gem to himself. J. G. McADAM.

In Hounsfield, October 29th, SAMUEL MCWAINE, Esq., aged 55 years. His death was caused by injuries received from lifting, about two years since.

In Brownville, November 10th, JOHN BASCOMB, aged 38 years. The death of this Br. was caused by an eruption of a blood vessel. Like Esq. McWaine, he was respected by every good and wholesome member of community.—"The mourners go about the streets."

In Watertown, November 3d, DAPHNE, wife of Elisha Wakefield, aged 27 years. The cruel disease of consumption cut off this amiable woman in the morning of life, and produced much weeping and sorrow. A very large congregation followed her remains to the church, and from thence "to the house appointed for all the living." W. H. WAGGONER.

In Litchfield, September 18th, Mrs. CAROLINE ELIZABETH, consort of Sardis Brainard, aged 23 years.

Her funeral was attended on the 20th at Cedarville, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to the numerous relatives and friends of the deceased. T. J. SMITH.

In Richfield, September 29th, CZARINA, infant daughter of Col. J. Derthick, aged about 2 years.

Funeral on the 29th, and the blessings of eternal life set before the relatives and many sympathizing friends.

"This earthly house, by death o'er past,
Commingles with its kindred clay,
Our heav'nly one unchanged shall last,
When temporal things shall all decay."

N. B. The above notices were mislaid by the writer which will account for their late appearance. T. J. SMITH.

In Georgetown, November 12th, of apoplexy, Mrs. JOANNA FISHER, consort of Abner Fisher, aged 45 years.

Mrs. Fisher was a firm believer in the doctrine of a world's salvation, and adorned her profession by a consistent and Christian character. She has left a large family of children to mourn her departure. May the comforts and consolations of the Gospel, console the afflicted mourners, and the thought of again meeting the departed in a better world, cure the wound which death has inflicted. Her funeral was attended in the Baptist meeting-house, by a large and attentive congregation, among whom were the Presbyterian and Baptist preachers—the latter of whom assisted in the services. Discourse by the writer. In behalf of the friends of the deceased, we would return our thanks to the Baptist society for their kindness and liberality, in opening their house for the occasion. WM. M. DELONG.

 Will the Trumpet please copy?

In Naples, suddenly, on the 11th of October, Mr. ABEL BROWN, aged 50 years. Br. Brown was a believer in the final reconciliation of all things to God. Peace to his ashes. His spirit has returned to God who gave it. Long will he be remembered by sister Brown and his kind children. May they all be willing to submit to this event of providence, with the spirit and fortitude of Christians, and be enabled to say, in sincerity, not our wills, but thine, O, God, be done. The funeral was attended by a large concourse of people, and addressed by WM. QUEAL.

At Cicero, Onondaga county, N. Y., October 23d, Mrs. ELIZA, wife of Br. William White, in the 29th year of her age. The deceased had for several years been a consistent Christian, and a firm believer in the Gospel of a world's salvation from sin and death. Her life was a practical comment upon that religion which is "pure and undefiled"—that religion which consists in doing good. She resignedly yielded up her spirit to enter upon that inheritance which is incorruptible, undefiled and which fadeth not away. She died universally respected, and deeply regretted by all who knew her sterling worth. Her funeral was attended by the writer at the Disciple's meeting-house at Cicero Corners, on the 25th, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners and a large assembly of sympathizing neighbors and friends, from Rom. v: 20, 21. N. BROWN.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. P. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within three months; $2.00 if not paid within three months; or $2.50, if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper is continued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis, and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their paper by a carrier, $2.50 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00, if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE

AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

DEVOTED TO

THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL RELIGION, FREE INQUIRY, RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, AND INTELLIGENCE.

AARON B. GROSH, EDITOR; ABNER R. BARTLETT, ASSISTANT EDITOR.
G. W. MONTGOMERY AND E. H. CHAPIN, CORRESPONDING EDITORS.

VOLUME X.----NEW SERIES.

UTICA:

A. B. GROSH AND O. HUTCHINSON, PUBLISHERS.

1839.

INDEX TO VOLUME X—NEW SERIES.

DIRECTIONS.—Seek, first, the title—probably under a, an, or the; if not, under the principal noun or adjective—then, the class or subject. For ordinations, etc., see The Record—for comments, etc., on Scripture, see Scriptures explained. A. B. G.

A brief dialogue 125
A chapter for the devotees of soporific Christianity 227
A contrast—prayer, universal and partial 155
A discovery 19
A fact for Universalists 381, 389, 395
A false charge refuted 277, 309
A father's tales about the early Christians 393
A few words of counsel 163
A good answer 221
A hint to young men 291
A leaf from remembrance 100
A necessary distinction 100
"A peep into Auburn State Prison" 55, 86
A reminiscence 244
A short sermon—see Sermons.
A stranger among strangers 360
A supplication to the people of the U. S. 160, 168, 176, 184
A thought 84—and a query 307—a climax and an absurdity 358
A true incident—Dr. Lansing 7
A VOICE TO THE MARRIED—Introduction 105—Estimation of the wife 121—Rights of the husband 153—Treatment of wives 169—Seeking advice of the wife 201—Cherishing love for the wife 225—Duties of husbands 289—Place of abode 313—Domestic duties and pleasures 337—The value of a good reputation 369, 351, 379
A word from an old friend 373, 375
A zealous agent 149
An address—by the Editor 9
An allegory—a category 382
An appeal to the public—W. Queal 76
An enigma 352
An incident 7, 83—in the life of Tim. Tipplesome 232
An inquiry 107
An objection 124—considered 187, 404
An old man's last review of the Scriptures 379
An uncharitable spirit 347
"An undevout astronomer is mad" 396
Affairs in Oxford 148
Agents—list of 80, 88, 96
All going to heaven 276
All shall live again 84
All the world 34
Ancient history of Universalism 174
"And we all fade as a leaf" 101
Anecdotes 7, 125, 140, 189, 285, 341, 347
Answers, selections, etc. 150
Anti-Phrenology 262
ASSOCIATIONS—Ontario 34—Central 197—Mohawk River 203—Niagara 205—Genesee 219—Black River 221—St. Lawrence 229—Allegany 229—Otsego 253—Ontario 309—Chenango 325—Chautauque 332—Cayuga 333—Susquehanna 372—Steuben 373—Hudson River 405—New-York 405—See The Record.
Assumption not argument 20, 75
At home again 310, 318, 327
Autumn 344
Barbarous extravagance 211
"Being justified freely" 171
Be not deceived 287
Be zealous 84
BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS—Sheol 13—Hades 30, 37, Gehenna 62, 70—Shiloh, and his kingdom 117—Dan. xii: 2; 125—Zech. ix: 1 to 9; 142—Heb. ix: 27; 293, 301—Mark xvi: 15, 16; 333, 342—Matt. xxvi: 24; 365, 373
"Bless and curse not" 397
Bigotry—a fact 405
Br. Bushnell's case 321—again 389
Br. Manley's sermon 199
Business items 3, 11, 23, 263, 335, etc.
Caleb Ticknor's opinion 336
Can God save all? 294
Capital punishment 390
Celebrations of Christmas eve 19
Chance 395
Change 305
Charity 52, 54—Religion, wealth, 217—rewarded 296
Choice of instructors 293
CHRISTIAN TRAITS AND DUTIES—The weeping sower, 6, 13—The apostle Paul 29—Moral courage 46—The office of the preacher 133, 141—The real treasure 247, 254, 261
Christ in the garden 402
Christian consecration 214
Christianity 393—necessary to console in affliction 319
Circular to standing clerks 79
Claims of society on young men 18
Clinton Liberal Institute 19, 22, 35—Collections 39. 131, 191—Examination etc. 283
"Come now, and let us reason," etc. 124
Comfort for mourners 195
Comment on Gen. iii: 14, 15 293
Common school library 150, 375—Mass. 115—S. Sch. Union 79, 94, 103
Communion with God 272
CONFERENCES—Denmark 11—Salem Cross Roads 27—Hume 34—Victor, Chili, Columbus, Pa., Randolph 83—Oran 107—Antwerp 123—of Chenango Association 148—Panama 259—Perry 391—Sheridan 339—Vernon 358—Penfield 371—Tylersville 373—Troy, Pa., 379—see The Record.
Conference meetings 349
Conscientiousness 317—its punishments 326—a present punisher 334
Consolation to mourners 388
Consistency (of a Calvinist) 264
Consumption 213
Contemplation 48
CONVENTIONS—New-York 179—Pennsylvania 203—United States 316, 356—see The Record.
Conversions in the ministry 247
Converted souls 398
Correspondents (and ence) 111, 188
Courtesy 187
Cursing 108
Death 155—of Rev. I. Hayward 39—Rev. N. Wadsworth 59—Wm. P. Thompson, Esq., 127—Rev. Daniel Walker 196—Rev. A. L. Balch 391—see last page of each number
Debating societies 112
Deception 48
DEDICATIONS—Cortland 275—Scipio 351—McDonough 371—Prompton, Pa., 372—Potsdam 373—Churchville 396—see The Record.
DIALOGUES—A brief 125—Uncle and neice 245—two neighbors 260—on Phrenology 262—Partialist and Universalist 309—409
Dist. school Libraries—see Common School
Divine prescience 353
Does Christ save us from merited punishment? 131
Dutch Reformed church 223
Earthly and spiritual 253
Education in Germany 163
Effects of prejudice 339
Endless misery 398—in practice 206
Envy 319
Essays on war 178, 185, 193, 204, 285, 339, 346, (Editorial) 351
Eternal life 68—hell, etc. 401
Evil pursueth sinners 60
Examination Clinton Liberal Institute 283
Example, a sketch 194—and precept 96
Excitement at Ford's Bush 92
Exhortation and inference 158
Explanation 132
Expired—a protracted meeting 84
EXTRACTS—instructive 8, 16—from Barray's sermons 193, 306—Leland's sermon 216—E. H. Chapin's sermon 249, 257—S. Goff's sermon 282
Fading Flowers 312
Faith in Christ necessary 319
Faithfulness 93
Falsehood 32
False pride 320
Fame 131
Fanaticism 272
Folly 409
Forgetfulness 17
Forgiveness 123
Formality 24
Fowler's phrenology—errors corrected 303
Friendship 187—by A. W. T. 315
"Give us this bread" 11
Giving thanks 370
"Glory" means favor 205
"God is a tyrant" 365
Grandeur of astronomical discoveries 328
"Great day for which all other days," etc. 380
Grounds of friendship 33
Happiness 211
Have you obtained a hope? 84
Heaven our home 53
Helping the Lord 219
Homage to God 252
Honesty the best policy 63
Honor 4
Honoring the Son 47
Hope 92, 237—and memory 290
How he feels 106
How universal it is 24
Human errors 489
Hypocrites 69
I am a professor 394—not 215
I have no time 37
Illiberality and cowardice 93
Illness of preachers 399
Illustrations of the law of kindness 21, 47, 54, 69, 85, 101, 109, 213, 245
Illustrative anecdotes 125, 140, 189, 285, 341
Importance of cultivation 116—of morality 128
Infallibility 394
Indian cunning 88—commentary 136
Indifference 116
Individual responsibility 357
Influence of adversity on man 378
Ingratitude 345
Interesting facts in the history of Universalism 273, 380
In whom do we trust? 311
Is belief voluntary? 220
Is Christ the cause of salvation? 22, 55
Is God a changeful being? 399
Is it a good reason? 77
Is religion a gloomy system? 230
Is this slander? 103
Is your pastor comfortable? 184
It is a poor rule that will not work, etc. 109
It is a strange thing 18
Itinerary of a 3d journey South 228
James Howard 117
Jesus the light of the world 60—hath done all things well 218, 345, 251, 269, 299, 307, 317, 338
John French, Sen. 78
Judgment 163
Just admission of Dr. A. Clarke 238
Kindness 163
L. C. Todd's defence—S. R. Smith 148
Land of Nod 192
LETTERS—J. M. Day 44, 101, 188—D. Skinner 66, 90, 156, 164, 172, 180, 186, 196—To a sister 92—D. P. to Eds. 106—J. Sherburne to Eld. Bush 116—L. C. Todd to Skinner and Campbell 132, 148—H. L. Hayward to Eds. 141—G. M. Tuthill and J. M. Day 188—A. W. T. to Eds. 219—J. H. Sanford 250—Manley and Hoyt 251, 341, 396—G. F. and D. Skinner 270—A. B. Grosh 310, 318, 327—To a Br. 349—M. A. Church 387
Liberal men 404
Little Jane, or the Lucifer matches 85
Look at this 314
Lost time 64
Love to God and man 252, 281, 300, 345—of approbation 391
Luther Lee 276
Man, study of 108—prone to evil 183
Marriage 214, 221, (L. I. Sadler) 288—285
Memory 28
Mental slavery 402
Messrs. Campbell and Shepard's Convention 277, 309
Misspent time 348
Mode of promoting civilization, etc. 406
Moral agency and its consequences 166
Moral incongruity, Deut. xxii: 11 127
Moral precepts without doctrines 135
Moral test in societies 391
More laborers wanted at the west 155
Money not riches 400
Monument to a mother's grave 152
Morning meditations 204
Mysteries of nature 191
My view of the case 35
Naming churches 127
Necessity and accountability 129
Not very common 195
Old and new modes 111
Old Testament Universalists 97
On temper 93
On the mediatorship of Christ 204
Opposition of common opinions to the Bible 158
Orthodox consistency 253
Our prospectus 375—section 351
Parable of sour grapes 165
Partialism, infidelity and Universalism 4
Partialist vigilance 355
Permanency of early impressions 104
Philosophy in the common use of things 250
Phrenology (Fowler's) 303, 317, 326—and theology 286
Poetry—(from South. Lit. Review 200
Practical religion 182, 190, 198—Partialism 197, 223
Preaching—doctrinal and practical 109
Predestination and foreknowledge 124
Prejudice 220
Presence of mind 175, 207
Pride 401—fashion—folly 223
Profanity 27
Propositions, questions and answers 295
Protracted meetings 134, 398
Publishers, subscribers and postmasters 399
PUBLICATIONS—Religious—The Expositor 3, 86, 159, 231, 211, 367—Universalist Union 40. 187, 304, 367, 383—Review of Royce's sermons. Christmas exercises. Scripture lessons 11—Songs of Zion 40—Hymns of Zion 167, 238, 243—Register and Almanac and Companion 55, 151—Library of Am. S. S. Union 79,

91, 103—Palladium and Amulet 86—Sabbath School Contributor 87, 207—Christian Freeman and Family Visitor 87, 151—Universalist Preacher and Ev. Repository 87, 159—World Reprieved 87—O. A. Skinner's sermons 110—Layman's Legacy 111, 158—Voice to Youth 111—Causes of infidelity Removed 111, 287—Inquiry by A. B. G., Appendix to Univ. Hymn book, Christian Visitant, Kingdom Shut 111—Pro and Con 159—Universalist and Ladies' Repository 159, 215, 311—Essay on Partialism 159—Rayner's Manual 167—Trumpet 215, 367—Rose of Sharon 239, 243, 311, 313—Universalist Watchman 255—Sawyer's letters to Remington 287—Universalism illustrated 311, 343—
Literary—Knickerbocker 3, 27, 79, 110, 215, 403—Lady's Book 27, 87, 403—Waldie's Library 215, 403—Peep into State prison 55, 86—Common School Journal 79—American Phrenological Journal 79—New-Yorker, 87, 163, 403—Lecture on discovery of America 111—Deerbrook 199—Means and ends 263—Objects of instruction 343—Riches without wings 357—
Punishment 208—of death in Austria 24—and forgiveness 129
Pyramid of Cheops 40
Qualifications of school teachers 122
Questions 260, 267—to a Universalist and reply 98—for those who think 109—for Partialists 279
Ramblings in Rome 248
Religion 149, 162, 323—vs. Bigotry 297
Religious freedom 80
Removals 15, 23, 27, 35, 55, 95, 107, 119, 231, 239, 251, 287, 351, 355, 375—See The Record
Repentance 364—vs. just punishment 350
Reports of State Conventions 356
Reply to Br. Whittemore 15, 33—to Br. Grosh 36
Rev. Mr. Murray 167—Albert Barnes 390—John Annear 119
Reverse of fortune 240
Review of old MSS. 291
Revival of Universalism in Henderson 68
Romance and reality 238
"Rufus"—(music from Hymns of Zion) 238
Rules for ladies 224
Sabbath day reflections 350
Sacrificial duties 212
Salvation 17
Scripture thoughts 140—hints 358
Scriptures Explained—Gen. iii: 14, 15; 293—xlix: 10; 117—Deut. xxii: 11; 127—Josh. x: 12-15; 367—Prov. xvii: 14; 349—Dan. xii: 2; 125—Zech. ix: 1-9: 142—Matt. vi: 11, and Luke vii: 28; 275—Matt. xxvi: 24; 365, 373—Mark xvi: 15, 16; 333, 342—Luke x: 53; 259—John viii: 12; 60—Acts ix: 1, 2, 6; 169—Rom. iii: 24; 171—xi: 26; 158—xii: 21; 21, 69, etc.—1 Cor. xv: 29; 149—2 Cor. xii: 2; 140—Phil. ii: 12; 60—Heb. ix: 27; 263—Jude 7; 267—see Biblical.
Sectarian schools 406
Sermons—Matt. i: 21, W. M. Delong 25
Acts x: 29, T. D. Cook 49
Gen. iii: 19, K. Townsend 73
Matt. xii: 31, 32, G. W. Montgomery 113
Matt. x: 28, W. E. Manley 145, 193
2 Cor. iv: 10, 11, I. B. Peirce 177
Eph. v: 1, M. B. Smith 209
2 Peter i: 19, G. W. Gage 241
Ps. cxlvii: 20, E. H. Chapin 249, 257
John v: 39, K. Townsend 265
Matt. xiv: 31, J. Chase 321
Isa. xxi: 11, J. T. Goodrich 329
Josh. xiii: 1, J. Moore 361
Isa xxi: 11, 12, N. Brown 377, 385
(Short) James ii: 19 101
(do) Matt. v: 8 217
(do) by a lay preacher, Matt. xi: 30; 34—Gal. i: 9; 52—2 Cor. xii: 2; 61—Mark xvi: 15, 16; 76—See Scriptures.
Slavish fear 157
Social intercourse 48—meetings 48
Society schools 56
" for widows and orphans, etc. 309
Soul merchants 340
Specimens of religious instruction 140
Spring 100—time 124—beauty of 179
Superstition of the horse shoe 376
Tale from the German 280
Teachings and Tendencies—Introduction 3—Filial trust 12—Faith 282—Filial affection 308—Prayer 315—Gratitude 340
Temptation 208
Thanks—thanks 23
The Apocalypse 116, 300
The art of writing 384
The beauty of Spring 179
The bewildered calmed 140
The Bible 24, 78, 173
The blessedness of the pure in heart 292
The book of Revelation 116
The brethren in Vermont 207
The broken lamp 133
The Causes of Infidelity Removed—Inspired writers 1—41, 57—Social system 81, 88—Consistency of revelation 137—Uselessness of infidelity 161
The Christian Palladium 98, 382
The Clinton Lib. Institute 19, 22, 35, 39, 131, 191, 283
The closing year 410
The confession of faith 45
The converted Universalist 301
The dead sea 136
The departed year 11
The devil 91—his doctrine 383, 398—381
The duty of free inquiry 346
The Episcopal church 273—again 380
The faith of Abraham 220
The Father of all 95
The fear of God 154
The Gospel a perfect law of liberty 389
The grave 188
The habitual liar—his beginning and end 238
The happy family 12, 21, 34, 45, 53
The hard times of publishers—the remedy 231
The Holy Ghost 189
The hope of future life 256
The houseless stranger 332
The ladies' celebration of July 4th 230
The law of kindness—see Illustrations.
The life and labor of Christ 401
The Mormons (S. P. Landers) 130, (J. Shrigley) 182, (Dr. Schetterly) 284, (Ed.) 294, (J. H. Gihon) 364
The mother's lament 260
The mourner 140
The new year 5
The New-York Watchman 83, 119
The New-York Convention 183
The old serpent's doctrine defended 381
The origin of cursing 406
The orphan's consolation 17
The orthodoxy of Universalism 83, 119
The popular theology 348
The Presbyterian law suit 111
The prophets 174
The Pruner—Introductory 275—A chapter on excuses 281—Excuse for not taking a paper 291—Excuse for stopping a paper 317—Profanity 323—Reproof for a neighbor 341.
The Record—39, 43, 59, 107, 131, 139, 206, 255, 262, 327, 391
The regeneration 244
The resurrection 190, 203
The right and the wrong way 130
The scenery of nature incites to benevolence 179
The silk hat 4
The spirit of the storm 140
The study of nature a source of happiness 197, 218
The temporal and the eternal 305, 324
"The third heaven" 61, 130, 140
The trial of Christ 77
The use of wealth 198
The voice to the married 351, 375—See A
The waste places 350
The way to judge 312—of transgressors 203
The wife of a literary man 64
The will of God 388
The worship of God 5
Theological Discussion—Campbell to Skinner 65, 234—Skinner to Campbell 233, 237, 239—Publication of 407
Theological gleanings from various authors, 194, 202, 212, 220, 227, 252, 259, 267, 274, 292, 340, 348, 354, 364, 372, 380, 393
Things that I have never seen 109
Thomas Potter 34
Thomas—(music from "Hymns of Zion") 243
Thoughts 52—for the thinking 218, 242, 260, 284, 308
Too good to be true 139
To the public—a caution 195
To laymen—the press 222—the preacher 326
Tour, and dedication at Prompton, Pa. 372
Transitive matters 347
Treatment of sisters 256
True benevolence and moral courage 359
True happiness 259
Tunkers in Illinois 222
Two inconsistencies 267
Tyranny, bigotry and atheism 123
Unchristian illiberality 20—conduct 170
Union 185
Universal holiness and happiness 151
Universalist Historical society 355—chaplains 127
Universalism—in Henderson 68—west 102—Oxford 148—Mt. Pleasant, Pa. 243—Denmark, etc. 275—Rochester 291
Universalism vs. Judaism 274—licentious 107
Value of character to young men 368
Vice and its remedy 205
Want of order 28
Wednesday and Thursday 295
What is wanting 109—man 132
Why and wherefore 182
Wm. Penn and the smoker 104
Witty definitions of common things 144
Woman 120
Words often mispronounced 288
Works and consequences 271, 279, 286
Work out your own salvation 43
Worship of Christ 18, 38, 110, 143
Youth's Department—The silk hat 4—The happy family 12, 21, 35, 45, 53—Stepmother 29—Little Jane 85—James Howard 117—My sister Mary—The broken lamp 133
Zelotes Fuller 407

POETRY.

A scene 184
A tribute of sympathy 136
Autumn 328
Awake, ye that slumber 72
Beauty 392—and Time 248
Black lace 368
Broken ties 256
Can a mother forget her child 264
Christmas hymn 16
Chronological verse 4
Death's final conquest 24
Doom of Rabylon 344
Dying hymn 264
Fancy and reality 56
Forgive and forget 280
Friendship 296
God in his works 8
Good bye 376
Hope in heaven 144
Hymn—Ps. cxliii: 96—to the setting sun 120—of the Waldenses 344
"I gazed upon the tattered garb" 248
I'll fear not death 360
Lines—Eccl. xii: 1; 112—suggested on reading, etc. 64—on Christianity 136—to a friend 360
Linger not long 352
My mother's grave 88, 288
My sister Mary 133
Ode to peace 168
On an infant 16
Once upon a time 336
Perpetual adoration 128
Prospects of happiness 320
Reflections on a mother's grave 88
Sail on, my barque 40
Sea weeds 352
Shall this spirit pine? 32
Sing the sweet pæan 272
Song of devotion 64
Sonnet 272
"Speak not to him a bitter word" 312
Spirit of beauty, of love, etc. 312
Spring 176
Stanzas 408—death 48—by Mrs. Ellet 320
Sunset 232
Take the ruby wine away 408
The advent and reign of Christ 304
The Bible 240
The boy's first grief 240
The bride's return 120
The church of our fathers 256
The doubting reproved 32
The earth is beautiful 208
The life-boat 304
The lone tree of the prairie 400
"The mother gazed upon the gifts" 224
The mourner 112
The north wind 404
The past 160
The pet lamb 192
The rainbow 260
The reconciliation 48
The Sabbath 152
The Saviour's appearance 168
The scattered household 216
The tear 200
The twilight hour 272
The Universalist 208
The use of flowers 376
The wanderer made happy 296
The wife's prayer 368
The worship of God 280
There's gloom around thy hearth 384
Thoughts on the death of Br. King 328
To death 288
To my Partialist sister 144
To the Saviour 72
Universal providence 80
Unpublished stanzas of Lord Byron 24
What is that, mother? 232
Why should we mourn? 56

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME X. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, JANUARY 4, 1839. NUMBER 1.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER SEVENTEEN.

BY S. R. SMITH.

INSPIRED WRITERS.

It is obvious, that what has been said of the divine character and perfections, as exhibited in the Old Testament, applies equally to the Christian dispensation—the New Testament being, in this respect, a prolongation of that economy commenced in the earliest times of the Hebrews.—Here, the perfections of God are more illustriously displayed, more immediately rendered the subjects of regard, and brought to bear more directly upon our necessities and our hopes. And here, what was promised, is fulfilled; what was liable to misapprehension from the mistakes and infirmities of human judgment, is illustrated; what was reserved under a partial and national dispensation, is published to the whole world, and established upon miracles and the most unequivocal testimony.

There is one fact of a most striking and peculiar character, which attaches to the personal pretensions of the writers of the Bible, and which distinguishes them in a remarkable manner, from all others whom the world calls moralists or philosophers. It is not their undeviating candor in recording both their virtues and vices—their knowledge and ignorance—their just apprehensions, and their follies and mistakes. These things have excited the admiration of all who have attentively read the Scripture history; and while they stand without a parallel, they can not fail to impress the mind in favor of their integrity. Their frankness in these particulars, is eminently calculated to secure our respect for their personal characters, and our confidence in the facts which they relate. It goes far to prove that they were both honest men, and had no disposition to deceive or impose upon others.

And these considerations, when sustained by the further fact, that the writers of both the Old and New Testaments, were singularly free from every thing bearing the common marks of enthusiasm or fanaticism, afford very powerful reasons for thinking that what they relate is true. Giving, therefore, to all these particulars their full weight and importance, still we think, there are other considerations which attach exclusively to their characters, that not only sustain every legitimate inference from the preceding, but constitute a distinct and decisive testimony of their own inspiration, and the truth and authenticity of their writings.—It is the fact, that they never assumed to be the original and unaided authors of the the sentiments which they delivered.

The philosophers and casuists of all other times and nations, were too sensitive in relation to their own interest and reputation, not to maintain them at every hazard, when possible. It certainly never occurred to them, to ascribe any thing either to the gods or to men, to which they themselves could make any plausible pretensions. They never hesitated to represent themselves as the sole and unaided authors of the systems which they taught. In a thousand ways they treat religion as a jest, and the very being of their gods, as a trick of state policy, or the conjecture of superstition. And it is certain, that however exalted some of their views of morality might be, they were culpably indifferent to its practice. Thus, for instance—while they knew that the most degrading excesses and beastly indulgences were practiced in the very rites of their religion, they not only allowed, but encouraged their observance, both by advice to their pupils and friends, and by the weight of their own example. And such base hypocrisy is among the things urged upon the world, as evidence of the all-sufficiency of nature and philosophy!

All this, is the very opposite of the course pursued by the writers of the Bible. They lay their honors at the feet of Supreme intelligence and wisdom; and ascribe their views, their institutions, and all the distinctions and privileges derived from them, to the one and only God whom they adored. They make no pompous parade of new theories and systems—no sneers at the religious institutions under which they lived—no sarcastic insinuations that the Deity was a mere creature of the imagination, or that religion was a matter only of state policy. Far, very far from all this, and from every thing bearing any affinity or resemblance to such a course. Without being ascetic, they were devout; without the semblance of fanaticism, they were religious; without skepticism, they believed in, and free from hypocrisy, they worshipped the living and true God.

Now there is not so great a difference in the constitutional propensities of men, as these facts unquestionably imply—if both are supposed to be influenced by any regard to their individual reputation as moralists or philosophers. There is no reason to question, that the heart of an Israelite, of the Patriarch himself, was not as susceptible of the feelings of pride, or ambition, or praise, as those of Plato, Seneca, or Cicero. And yet, the latter claim, and their admirers make the same claim for them down to this time, all the personal reputation which the nature of the case, and the respective systems will allow. On the contrary, the sacred writers neither demand—nor yet have those who most prize the truths they taught, ever given them—credit for superior mental endowments. Although it can scarcely have escaped the observation of the most careless and indifferent, that if we are to judge of the talents of men by their writings, and were to consider the Bible merely as a human production, the sacred writers will and must stand pre-eminent among mankind.

The philosopher stands forward on the canvass in an attitude to attract every eye to himself; the Patriarch, the Lawgiver, the Prophet, and the Apostle, are always thrown into the shade, and occupy the back-ground. The latter always present some superior personage, or refer you to some all-engrossing topic, as alone worthy your regard; while the writer assumes no more than to be the instrument of soliciting your attention to them alone. He constantly affirms, that he is not the author of the truths, or even the sentiments which he utters; but uniformly ascribes them to a higher power. In one word, it is enough for the sacred penman, that the truth is brought to light—the means of moral knowledge and virtue placed in the hands of mankind, and the Deity alone rendered the object of all the gratitude and praise of their manifestation.

How is all this to be accounted for? Why are not the sacred writers to be brought forward as the wise ones of the earth, as well as the men of Greece, or Rome, or Persia, or Egypt? There can be no reason why it may not be done, aside from that assigned by themselves—that they were the mere instruments of publishing the will and the purpose of God. Their modesty in not assuming the part of absolute authorship of the matter of their writings, is also accounted for on this supposition, and no other; for however amiable and commendable on any other account, it never cast a shadow across the splendor of a single philosophical system since the foundation of the world. But there is something more than mere modesty in the inspired writers, in relation to this matter. They not only affirm that they were not the authors of the doctrines and precepts which they published, but many of them endured nearly every form and variety of suffering in the maintenance of that fact! To such trials and sufferings no man can subject himself, unless conscious that what he affirms, is the truth. If any skeptic is disposed to question this, let him endeavor to ascertain how much and how long a Heathen philosopher would be likely to suffer, rather than own himself the author of his particular system.

It will be in vain to urge, that they were the dupes of a misguided—or rather, misguiding fanaticism, and that, like some half-crazed enthusiasts, they were under the influence of an imposing hallucination. The sobriety of their writings, the soundness of their theology, the dignity and self-possession which they maintained, both in their intercourse with friends and enemies, and, finally, the unexceptionable morality which they taught and exemplified, are all foreign to, and incompatible with the character of fanatics. No class of men were ever further from the extravagances of fanaticism, than were those who were the instruments of composing the books of Scripture. They were strongly impressed with the truth and importance of the subject matter of their respective communications, and appear like men in earnest—but they never descended to extremes not fully warranted by the established customs of their times, and of that part of the world in which they lived. Besides, they have left in their writings, the most unequivocal evidence of their disapprobation of every thing bearing the aspect of phrenzied enthusiasm. And we feel safe in challenging a comparison of their writings as a whole, with any others which the world can boast of, whether the production of enthusiasm, or of cold philosophy, or of modern skepticism, for sound principles, decent expression, or moral purity. In these particulars, they are so immeasurably above any and every other known writings, as to exempt their reputed authors from the slightest imputation of extravagance. And he must be strangely infatuated, or disposed to cavil, who does not, on a slight comparison of the Bible with the offspring of any fanatic's brain, discover at once, that it was produced both by benevolence and a "sound mind." The purity of the moral precepts alone, inculcated by the sacred writers, bears the most unexceptionable testimony to the soundness of their understanding, as it is notorious that fanatics and enthusiasts are miserably deficient in correct principles, and just views of morality. The writers of the Bible are not, therefore, the men to impose on themselves, or to endeavor to impose on others, the belief of their inspiration, without its foundation in fact.

From the foregoing facts and considerations, the following inferences seem naturally and necessarily to follow. We say naturally, because it appears impossible for a reasonable man to fail of drawing them—and necessarily, because they are the only ones that can be drawn, without violence to experience, observation, and sound philosophy.

1. If the sacred writers had not been inspired, there is no obvious reason why they should not have claimed as their own productions, the books of Scripture bearing their respective names. From all that appears of their history, they were not impelled by any sinister motives, to ascribe their communications to the influence of divine inspiration. And it seems next to impossible, to suppose that they could be actuated by such motives. The circumstances under which most of them wrote, plainly and absolutely forbid that supposition. This is alike true and palpable of the writers, both of the Old and New Testaments. For it may be asked, what did they propose to themselves? After what did they aspire, that could not be as well, as easily and as certainly attained without, as with such pretensions? Let any period after the introduction of the Law, be selected, [that will be attended to in its place,] and then let the question be pressed, what could any one of the sacred writers hope to effect, which rendered the pretension to inspiration necessary? Men never act for any length of time, and in a way calculated to bring about important results, without some definite motive. And what could be the motive, which induced the sacred writers to claim inspiration?

By far the greater number of prophets, lived and wrote after the separation of the ten tribes from the kingdom of Judah. Let us, then, take examples from the most illustrious of these instructors of the people; and endeavor to ascertain the motives by which they might possibly be impelled to ascribe their doings, or their writings, to the influence of a divine interposition. And for this purpose, we begin with Elijah, one of the most distinguished, and one of the first in this catalogue of worthies. Was it—could it be for his personal interest or aggrandizement, that he withstood kings, and rebuked tyrants and their minions, both civil and ecclesiastical? Did his acknowledged character of prophet, protect him, in any instance, from public odium, and personal sufferings, and the continued hatred and and cruelty of the rulers, where the reputation of merely being a wise man—or, if you please, a philosopher—would not have answered the same purpose? We venture to say, that no man with any pretensions to candor, can read the books of Kings and Chronicles, with the least reference to this subject, and can believe for a moment, that the assumption of being a prophet of God, screened him in a single instance from any reproach or suffering from which Nestor, Plato, or even Franklin would not have been secure, had they lived at the same time and in the same place. Nay—there is abundant reason to believe, that his prophetic character was more than once made the pretext for severities, which the mere philosopher would never have been called to endure. And with the public reputation of either of the persons, real or supposed, above named, there is not an act ascribed to him, except those which are avowedly miraculous, which they might not have performed with equal impunity. Will the skeptic try to discover some sufficient motive which could induce this extraordinary man to assume a character, which so far from honoring or profiting him, subjected him to a life of privation and oppression, without supposing him actually inspired!

The same remarks in substance, apply to all the rest. Isaiah, from the high place which he is supposed to have held among his people, needed no other sanctions to give weight, and influence, and acceptance to his communications. His position in society appears to have been such, as to place him in the same station, and make him alike the counsellor of kings, whether considered as prince or prophet. Let the skeptic have his way for a moment—let this individual be considered only as one of the princes of Judah, and what then? Why, if he will read that part of the Bible ascribed to this same Isaiah, the son of Amos, he will be astonished to find, that for splendor of imagery, simplicity, and beauty, and sublimity of conception and style, there is nothing in all the Heathen world among poets, casuists, or philosophers, that can compare with that book. And it will no doubt puzzle him not a little, to imagine how a mere semi-barbarous Jew, (as he would courteously call him,) could conceive so nobly, and write so elegantly. He must have been wiser than the wisest, and greater than the greatest of Heathens—or he was inspired. And in either case, the skeptic should do him honor above others, to be consistent with himself. If only as a poet and moralist, he is entitled to more veneration than Plato. But as inspired, he is to be regarded as the messenger and prophet of God. And this is manifestly his true character.

Apply, now, the question in the case of the prophet Jeremiah—what end could he possibly have in view, in assuming the prophetic character, that could not have been quite as well attained without it? He was certainly not in favor with the court—nor did he coincide with its general views. And for aught that appears to the contrary, he did not aspire to any worldly distinction. On the contrary, there is every appearance that he sympathised deeply and cordially in the impending misfortunes and sufferings of his countrymen, and only warned them of the certainty of mischief and calamity, as the issue of the course they were pursuing. These admonitions, it will not be doubted, could have been given without the claim to a divine mission. And had they been so given by a Heathen, and the result had been the same, how carefully would his name have been transmitted to us, and what honors would have been paid to his marvellous discernment. But here, a modest prophet, disclaiming all ability to speak for himself, delivers the most palpable truth, verified by events then in progress, and he is regarded as a simple fanatic, a madman, a bungling impostor! Such, however, is the character and spirit of infidelity, that it is utterly blind to all excellence, unless hung to the skirts of a skeptic or a—Heathen.

But it does not appear that either the king or his counsellors considered this prophet as a fanatic or a madman. For when they saw his predictions fulfilling on themselves, they did not hesitate to seek his advice, and at once changed their course of conduct from severity to kindness. And we may very safely leave this fact for the consideration of unbelievers, subjoining the question—whether they are as likely to know that he was a pretender, as those who tested the correctness of his predictions, and honored him as a prophet? We would also suggest the propriety of their giving some attention to the persecutions and punishments which this good prophet endured, and which, it seems they think, he was foolish enough to bring on himself, merely because he pretended to inspiration. And if he were not inspired, will they assign a respectable and obvious reason why he endured them?

It is not easy to conjecture an important and satisfactory reason, why the prophet Daniel should have declared himself to be inspired, unless he really was so. The relation in which he stood to the Hebrews, and the station that he held in the court of the Babylonian monarch, leave no visible object to be attained by such pretension. His authority with the king, and his obvious right to command the obedience of his own people, were such as to secure any end that appears to have been contemplated. Certainly, it had no effect with the Chaldeans, who evidently considered him merely a wise man, until a train of remarkable events forced from his master the acknowledgment, that none but Jehovah, the God of Daniel, could enable man to do such marvellous things. And yet, it must be plain, that in this case, the prophet sacrificed much of that personal reputation that would otherwise attach to himself, by giving all the praise to God. How much greater than the wise ones of Babylon, must he appear, if not inspired; and how much of that greatness is voluntarily sacrificed by becoming a prophet! If personal honor and fame had been the object, he could not have adopted or permitted the prophetic character—and that he did so, is at least very good evidence of his actual inspiration.

Ezekiel and others of nearly the same period, had no perceptible end in view in their communications, except that of encouraging their captive countrymen with the hope of returning to the land of their fathers. This is their theme, though other and important subjects are occasionally introduced, the development and fulfilment of which, have abundantly verified their pretensions. But all that principally concerned their personal reputation, related to events connected with their own times. And we put the question seriously to the unbeliever, whether there is any visible object involved by the reputation of a prophet, that would not have been equally well attained by the more common process under similar circumstances? Every one knows that nations as well as individuals, may be excited by merely human efforts—by appeals to their patriotism, their interests, and their personal feelings. And there is no apparent reason why this might not have been as successfully done in this instance, as by the intervention of the prophetic character.—Why, then, should it have been assumed? And the only rational answer is, because that character was the true one.

Of the writers of the New Testament, little need be said under this head. It is not contended that they could have effected what they did, in some respects, without the aid of inspiration. Of the amount of that inspiration, we have spoken elsewhere. But supposing all that the skeptic contends for—viz., that they were not inspired—what possible end could they have in view, or did they attain, by the pretence? If the world was but half as skeptical as it now is, they must have known that the pretence to inspiration was decidedly offensive, and calculated to operate to their disadvantage. And if not inspired, its avowal must have been an act of unparalleled imbecility. Will the skeptic, then, find some plausible reason, even on his own views, why they should have openly asserted, and suffered what they did, for asserting that they were divinely inspired?

Men who have special and sinister motives in view—who have none but personal ends and aims to gratify—never throw themselves in the face of power, public favor, and religious prejudice, without calculating the chances of being able, after a few sharp conflicts, to triumph. On the contrary, the wily hypocrite usually takes special care to float on the surface of the current of popular opinion, that he may wind his serpent-coils around the unsuspecting multitude. He is reckless of the opinion which after ages may form of his deserts—for it is not futurity in which he is interested, but the present time. To be the present master, dictator, and leader of his species—to exert a present power over the fortunes, the minds, the actions of men, is his aim. But he has neither the heart to endure, nor the moral courage to tempt a scene of trials and sufferings, such as were borne by the apostles and primitive Christians.

Can these, then, be charged with such motives? Did they court popular favor, or cringe before the frown of power? Did they spare exertion, because privations and death stared them in the face? Did they, with the example of their master fresh upon their minds, seek to attain personal honor, and eminence, and ease, by throwing the gauntlet of defiance in the teeth of authority, and public sentiment, and pride? Daring as skepticism often is, with these considerations in view, it is difficult to suppose that it dare assert what is so manifestly repugnant to all probability. Besides, the apostles were not the men to estimate the chances of a reputation some five hundred years after death.—Nor did they, in any instance, betray any solicitude about the opinions of any age, except their own; and they acted upon their views of duty, irrespective of final consequences.

All that has been urged, therefore, respecting the modesty of the Old Testament writers in rejecting the considerations of self, and ascribing all the merits and importance of their communications to a higher power, attaches with accumulated force to the apostles and evangelists. Had personal honor and reputation been their motive, they would never have pretended to inspiration; since all that they ascribe to superhuman aid, is so much withdrawn from themselves. And it is matter of wonder, that the very sagacious enemies of revelation, should never have perceived that they were paying a tribute of respect to these disciples of Christ, that places them immeasurably above their admired philosophers—and giving them credit for talents that no Christian ever thought they had a right to claim. This is probably one of the instances of remarkable consistency, for which unbelievers claim to be specially distinguished—and it is doubtless a common and faithful specimen. In view of all these considerations and facts, we repeat that the natural and necessary inference is, that the writers of the Bible were divinely inspired.

2. Another obvious and necessary inference is, that human nature being always the same, the same general principles must always be in operation. Hence, if the sacred writers had not been inspired, some one, or more of them, would have claimed the honor of being the unaided author of the doctrines and precepts which he taught—or would have exposed the pretensions of others. But none of them ever did this. No instance occurs, in which the pretensions to inspiration of any individual whose name and writings constitute a part of the Bible, was ever accused by any other writer of the Scriptures, of being an impostor.—And this fact is of great importance, when we recollect that there were many of them, and that they, in several instances, lived and wrote in the same age. This fact is unparalleled in the history of man. And it proves that the individuals not only thought themselves inspired, but that they also thought the same of each other. There is abundant evidence, too, in the fact that they exposed without reserve, their own imperfections, that they would have rebuked with unsparing severity, a crime so offensive to truth in others.

To this, it will no doubt be objected, that they might be mutually influenced by the same hallucination, and fanatically infer the inspiration of others, merely because they were themselves the subjects of self-delusion. Not so. Fanatics and enthusiasts are the last people in the world, to practice even common charity—much less are they disposed to indulge the pretensions of others! And this is daily illustrated, not only by the practices of conflicting sects, but by members of the same creed and profession. We need not even go so far back as the history of the Dominicans and Franciscans, who mutually exposed the chicanery and pious frauds of each other; the evidence is around and among us in the present day and generation. Besides, in the lapse of so many ages, it is not to be imagined that every writer among a whole people, was an enthusiast. The compositions betray a great variety; but this extraordinary character of fanaticism, by no means pervades them. The further conclusion then is, that they had good reason to believe themselves divinely inspired, and that they delivered the unsophisticated oracles of God.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TEACHINGS AND TENDENCIES.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

INTRODUCTION.

Whoever embraces a system of religion from a love of truth and happiness, is desirous that other differing religionists, and those who make no pretensions in favor of any one modification of Christianity, should be made acquainted with his peculiar and distinguishing views, ere they are judged or rejected. The professor feels it to be paying a poor compliment to his candor and discrimination, to have his faith censured and condemned without a knowledge of its principles, or an examination of its claims to the considerate attention of intelligent beings.

The Universalist, however, is often subjected to the unpleasantness of hearing his sentiments reviled, and his moral honesty questioned, by individuals who, by the profoundness of their ignorance respecting the one, and their incapability of judging of the other, are totally unprepared to form even a tolerably correct estimate, either of his professed belief, or of the actual religiousness of his character. Having himself been previously acquainted with other, and, more than likely, having enjoyed or endured a faith in some one of the other popularly prevailing systems of religious doctrine, he knows by a lively realization of the legitimate influences of the respective theories, the pre-eminent and incomparable value of his present over his former belief. But, notwithstanding his superior satisfaction and enjoyment, he can not, inasmuch as his religion is blended with the interests of community around him, be wholly indifferent in regard to the feelings and views of others concerning his own faith. Misrepresentation and abuse would be endured, were the results to rest altogether with one individual. But when they go farther, and assist in fastening upon the minds of others the galling grasps of ignorance, error, and consequent unhappiness, the heart throbs in keener distress in view of the injustice committed.

It is thence discoverable, that a strong desire for the removal of the evils which we suffer, does not spring from entire selfishness, or a repugnance to endure reproach in the cause of Christ. Every thing which retards the progress of the doctrine we love, concerns others with ourselves. While in the embrace of it, we have much to encourage us, derived from the hope and the divine assurance of its ultimate triumphant and universal prevalence; but they who are of a contrary part, have not the consolations of this hope, nor have they an enjoyment of what we conceive to be the truth. We can realize, in a measure, the extent of their moral destitution, and while we are pained with a consciousness of their indifference to, and disregard of, that religion which, only, can make them happy, bitterness is added to this pain, by knowing that they also are sufferers in consequence of their infatuated opposition to liberality of religious faith and social feeling.

But this is not all, nor the most humiliating.—It sometimes happens that Universalists themselves, possess only a vague and indefinite knowledge of the religious system they are understood to have embraced, especially that branch of it which relates to the practical and every-day duties of life. At any rate, the assertion will not admit of a plausible contradiction, that there is a culpable remissness on the part of many professed friends, in suitably manifesting the natural fruits of the religion of universal love. The cause of this failure is not to be sought for now. It answers our present purpose, to know that this is true.

It hence becomes a matter of serious inquiry, how a different and more favorable state of things is to be brought about. It is conceived that the method most certain of success, is an extension of the knowledge of the constituent principles and practical bearings of Universalism. It is thought that the more perfect the acquaintance of our opposers, and of our friends, with our holy doctrine, the more easily will we secure the embrace of the one class, and the obedience of both.

In hope, therefore, of being slightly serviceable in disabusing the minds of some individuals, in regard to the sentiments we cherish, and of showing the error of others in failing to carry out in practice the principles they profess, and particularly of urging the due observance of these principles, and of the necessity of bringing them to bear upon the whole character, the writer proposes publishing in this paper, a series of articles, which will contain an epitome of our doctrine, followed by the legitimate practical inferences.—It is deemed unnecessary to go into a detail of the plan to be pursued. Universalism, its teachings, and tendencies, will be the subject matter of discussion.

The indulgence of the reader is solicited. Infallibility of style, or of argumentative demonstration, is not claimed. The writer aims only at a plain and comprehensive elucidation of some of the fundamentals of our faith, both as regards theory and practice, and it is hoped his attempts will meet with a friendly and charitable consideration.

BUSINESS ITEMS.

"How I hate them," says the reader. So do we, but at the beginning of a volume, we find them absolutely necessary, for the information of new subscribers, and of those old subscribers who are forgetful of such matters. So, if you will read and heed them, we will make them as brief as possible. "Agreed!" Well, then, here goes.

1. We have extended the time for receiving one dollar and fifty cents in payment for this volume, to four months, instead of three months, as formerly. This was done to accommodate subscribers who depend on remitting by merchants, etc., who come by the canal in the Spring. But we hope that all who can, will be as accommodating to our wants, by paying as much earlier as they can.

2. We again give earnest notice that we would much rather receive one dollar and a half in advance, than the prospect of two dollars, or two and a half dollars, at a later period—for it will enable us to carry on our business much easier and better, and to make the paper more interesting and useful, and consequently it would do us more good, and be far better for our subscribers. Strange as this may seem to those unacquainted with the business of newspaper publishing, it is a sober, melancholy truth, that we have learned by sorrowful experience. For our own sakes, then, as well as for the sake of our subscribers, we respectfully invite every subscriber to pay us, or an accredited agent, in advance; and as respectfully assure all who do not, that we must, in common justice, tax them with the enhanced price for delay. Don't depend on "Offers" hereafter—we shall make none if we can help it

3. If there is no agent, or Universalist preacher in good standing, near you; and if the Postmaster will not remit for you, select a responsible and active brother among yourselves, to act for your neighborhood, and we will appoint him our agent.

4. If this number is received by any one who has ordered a discontinuance, it will be by mistake. If he can not get a good person to take it in his stead, let him write the name of his post office, and the State, on the margin, (taking care not to soil or injure it by the writing more than is necessary,) do it up in a good wrapper open at one end, and return it immediately, by mail, directed to "Magazine and Advocate, Utica, N. Y." And so with any subsequent numbers he may receive. ☞Remember—any person taking a paper from the post office, and retaining it, is bound by law to pay for it, the same as if he had subscribed for it.

5. We would be pleased if all who receive this paper, (a fair sample of what are to follow it,) and deem it worthy of an extended circulation and increased support, would use a a little exertion to aid us. We need it. ☞Make returns as early as possible, that we may regulate the edition of the present volume to the demand, with the least delay and loss.

Lastly—If the life and health of ourselves and correspondents are spared, and our subscribers fail not in giving us a reasonable share of pecuniary encouragement, we have no doubt of being able to do all we promised for this volume—to do MORE than we promised, would give us the highest pleasure, and be a source of honest pride and gratulation.—And if each subscriber hates to read calls for pecuniary aid, as badly as we hate to write them, the present volume will be entirely free from those abominable, hateful, misery-inspired, and misery-inspiring articles, called DUNS. Amen—may God grant it!

G. AND H.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

The December number came to hand too late for an extended notice in this number; but as a new volume begins this month, we notice it briefly, for the purpose of advising all who have taste and money enough, (two articles that, unfortunately for publishers of good works, do not always go together,) to subscribe for it immediately. The next volume will, it is believed, excel even its very excellent predecessors—at least, the prospectus and editorial notices respecting it, are full of shadows of the good things to come. The price is but three dollars for six months, or one volume; and five dollars for a year, or two volumes. The Knickerbocker is, certainly, to say the least of it, one of the best monthlies in the United States, if not in the world.—I. Tiffany, Esq., of this city, is an agent.

A. B. G.

 Messrs. Clark and Edson will please forward the numbers for next year, to Rev. A. Williams, Poolville, Madison county, N. Y.—the money therefor, has been paid to Mr. Tiffany.

G. and H.

THE EXPOSITOR AND UNIVERSALIST REVIEW.

Will our able lay and ministering brethren please to remember that this very valuable work begins a new volume this month—an improved volume, mind ye. Many who fail to subscribe now, will probably be glad, a year hence, to get a copy for double the subscription price.

A. B. G.

Br. Rogers—Send Selleck Seymour, Cold Water, Branch county, Michigan, Pro and Con, from commencement. Credit him $3, and charge

G. AND H.

Br. Whittemore—Credit B. S. Keeler, Newport, Herkimer county, N. Y., $5, and Sherebiah Hunt, East Hamilton, Madison county, $4, and charge

G. AND H.

Br. Price—Send Union to Elisha B. Stephens, Hornellsville, Steuben county.

A. UPSON.

NEW AGENT.—C. Hemingway, West Burlington.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

HONOR.

BY J. M. ELWOOD.

A firm and undeviating adherence to the principles of true honor, is the surest guide, not only to happiness and respect, but also to greatness and distinction. Placed as man is upon the theatre of life, every individual has his part to act, and his success depends entirely upon the manner in which he performs it. Various are the circumstances that surround him. New motives and desires are daily presented, and he who would resist the temptations that beset human life, must have some impregnable bulwark to shield him.—Without some principle for his security, he is liable to be deceived—enticed from the path of rectitude and propriety, and set afloat upon the turbid stream that rolls its waters into the gulf of infamy. Without some ruling principle of integrity, the sordid motives of secular policy or interest, may lead him to risk his reputation in the struggle for ephemeral renown—a struggle which, if successful, is often the premonition of infamy and disgrace—because the motives that induce it, take their origin in injustice and depravity. No matter how elevated may be a man's pretensions, or how just his claims—if he by vileness and corruption has forfeited his honor, his claims will be disregarded and himself despised.

In youth, when we are forming habits that are to determine our characters, we should be extremely cautious to imbibe just conceptions of the nature and tendency of those principles which are calculated, in their legitimate operation, to promote and secure our interest and welfare—and, on the other hand, we should trace to their source those results which are fraught with obloquy and shame. Every act, from the opening stage of youth to the closing scene of the dotard, exerts a promotive or detractive influence upon the character—and the importance of adhering with unyielding tenacity to the precepts of honor, will appear obvious and striking, when we place before our eyes the inglorious career of those who have been reckless of its requisitions. Burr, whose deeds are the faithful and unreserved chroniclers of his disgrace and infamy, will forever remain an "imposing monument" to remind the aspirant for greatness, that his hopes are futile, unless based upon integrity and justice—and the traitor who lifted a parricidal hand against his country, to satisfy the malignant cravings of revenge, sleeps beneath the epitaph his deeds have written—and the monument of his shame is the contempt of the virtuous and good.

But if it is important to adhere with inviolable attachment to the dictates of honor, it certainly must be of paramount importance to imbibe correct notions of its nature and character—for if we entertain wrong principles, and act in accordance with them, we shall, as a matter of course, act wrong, although our intentions may be good. A single glance at the diversities of society, must convince us that they are not wholly regulated by correct notions of honor, and deeply as it is to be regretted, it is too glaring to be unobserved—and he who would endeavor to palliate or conceal the fact, is aware that his efforts are as useless as they are [illegible]. These erroneous sentiments of honor are designated by the appellation of false honor. It pervades in a greater or lesser degree, all classes of society. None are exempt from its influence. It is interwoven with the affairs of private as well as public life. The pugilistic combats which spot the character—cause hatred and animosity—beget and foster the malignant passions of the human heart, are the offspring of false honor—the legitimate result of its legitimate operation. And dueling—the offspring of a darker age—the characteristic of the adventurous spirit of knighthood and chivalry—which bears the garb of courage, but unconsciously discloses the form of cowardice beneath it—seeks its retreat behind the parapet which the savage custom of a fiercer age has erected. Is it necessary to refer to instances illustrative of the fatal tendency of spurious honor? Behold our own illustrious statesman—the boast of philantrophy and benevolence—the pride and glory of his country, and the ornament of his race. He died—an idolatrous worshipper at the shrine of misguided honor, and the requiem of Hamilton was mingled with the discordant tones of public condemnation and reproach. By his final act he fixed the gaze of censure, and tarnished the lustre of his nobler deeds. The untimely death of the amiable and lamented Cilley, who has fallen a victim—a self-devoted victim to a creed as cruel as it is dishonorable, will stand, an alarming beacon to conduct the adventurous mariner upon the boisterous elements of political renown, to the haven of his aspirations. Alarming and horrid as are these instances, they are not destitute of instruction. They teach us that even in the zenith of glory, when we are apparently most secure, we are obnoxious to the allurements of misdirected honor—that the noblest powers are often perverted to degrading purposes—that resolution is liable to be shaken by the specious appearance of false honor—and

> "That ne'er for clan or kinsman's cause
> Should we forsake true honor's laws."

Clinton Liberal Institute.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PARTIALISM, INFIDELITY, UNIVERSALISM.

D. J. M. HOWARD, whose obituary will be found in its proper place, will long be remembered by all who knew him, as a kind and affectionate husband, parent, brother, friend and teacher of youth—the obliging neighbor and useful citizen, the faithful public officer and zealous promoter, in word and deed, of Common School, or universal education, and also, as one whose personal religious experience had fully tested the truth or error, and consolation or disconsolation of each of the systems above named. He had believed each system, in turn; and his most excellent heart had writhed in turn under the two former, and bounded in joyous hope, and expanded with all the feelings of gratified benevolence under the cheering and salutary influence of the last named. He embraced religion whilst young, and joined the sect called Christ-ians. He was an Arminian in his views of God's moral government, until, by the reflections of his own mind, he was led to the discovery that there can be no uncertainty in any event known to the Deity; or, to use his own description of his change of views, while absorbed in deep meditation on the subject of his final destiny, the thought came suddenly to his mind—"God knows how this matter will turn; and as he knows, so it will be. If he knows that I shall go to heaven, I can not miss of it; and if he knows I shall go to hell, there is no escape for me." The mists all vanished, and he saw clearly, that all that distinguished his system from the most rigid Calvinism, had its foundation in mere sophistry—that the designs and purposes of God must, of necessity, accord with his knowledge of the future.—He was now shocked at the thought of ascribing to God such merciless cruelty, as that of doom to his unborn creatures to endless woe; but supposing that this must be the sense of the Bible, he cast the whole away, (literally shedding his religion in an instant, as he would lay off a cloak,) and sank down to the cold and dreary regions of infidelity. His God, he said, he would never give up; but his ideas of his character became so vague and confused, that his faith in his being yielded him but little comfort; and it was impossible for [illegible] to describe the mental anguish that he endured, while under the influence of this comfortless [illegible]—regarding the cold, dark night of everlasting non-existence, as his final doom, and that, without the possibility of knowing but that the next day, or even the next moment, might plunge him thither.

Here Partialism is seen driving one of its most intelligent votaries to infidelity—and in another period of his life, Universalism may be seen bringing him back to an unwavering faith in the Divine original of the Scriptures; for it was his happy lot, some three or four years ago, to hear Christianity defended on the principles of universal salvation, by which he was led to a careful examination of the subject. This examination resulted in a settled faith in that doctrine, which alone could satisfy his capacious and benevolent soul. In that faith he ever after lived, by it he was sustained in his last distressing illness, and by it was he consoled in full view of his near approaching death. Ever kind and good, he nevertheless found in Universalism, only, the embodied principles of that goodness in its doctrines, the all-pervading motives to its practice, and in the character it ascribes to God and to Jesus, the only true and perfect examples, the imitation of which will lead man to fulfil the law of love, and to practice all righteousness. J. FRENCH.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SILK HAT.

A TALE OF NEW YEAR'S DAY.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

"Mother," said Emily Bell, the other day, as they were in a milliner's shop, where they had gone to purchase some few articles—"Mother, buy for me this pretty silk hat. See how much better it makes me look than this old thing"—and she stood out with the new one on her head.

Now, Emily's bonnet was, by no means, an old one: but, it was not exactly fashionable; and, beside, she was fond of new things. Her parents being quite wealthy, and herself an only child, she was allowed every thing that would add in the least, to her comfort or convenience. We do not mean by this, that any great degree of extravagance was permitted, but only that she was indulged to a considerable extent in her own particular taste and fancy. She might be said to be very proud, for a young girl of twelve; and, as one would naturally suppose, (looking upon her as an only child, and considering the great riches of her parents,) rather vain. Hence her mind was continually dwelling on articles of dress; and one great object (to her) absorbed the whole of her attention—how she could adorn the outward person to the best possible advantage. And there was another thing about Emily which always takes from the loveliness of youth—she could not bear denial; and she would sit in her chamber, and cry and sob for hours together, if the desire of her heart was not granted. Her parents were not blind to these failings and defects in the disposition and character of their child; but to remedy the difficulty seemed to them a work of no small moment—a mighty task. They had never tried to overcome this spirit of resistance to parental authority, in any great degree, but, generally allowed her, as I have before said, to do about as she wished. But they had now come to the firm and settled resolution, to endeavor to change the bent of her disposition—they had put down their foot, as the homely saying is, and their determination was, to curb the outbreakings of a spirit, which soon would brook no control. That they were in fault, they could not but acknowledge—they were aware that parental indulgence had extended too far, and they thought it well, that they had discovered their mistake thus early. But to return.

"I can not buy this hat for you now," said Mrs. Bell, "beside, your bonnet is not as old as you would have us think; and will last you until next Spring—then, you shall have a new one."

"Well," replied Emily, and there was something like a pout about her cherry lips—"if it is not old, it is so homely and out of fashion, that I will not wear it. Marion Gregory has a new silk hat, and I will have one. Father shall get me this as a New Year's present—he will, I know he will."

"We shall see," returned the mother—and they walked homeward. On arriving at their beautiful and splendid mansion, they found Mr. Bell in the parlor, awaiting their return.

"Father," said Emily, running up to him, and putting her arms about his neck "Father, I want you to buy me a new silk hat—there is one at Mrs. S.'s shop—for a New Year's gift—it is so pretty, and beside, it will suit me better than any thing else. I have 'Keepsakes,' and 'Offerings' enough already. Will you, father?"

"I have purchased something, dear girl, as a present for you, already"—said the father—"something that will be of more benefit to you than all the silk hats in the world."

"I warrant me," returned Emily, the tears starting into her blue eyes, "that you have been buying some book—I don't want any books—I have more than I know what to do with, now. If I can not have the silk hat, I do not want any thing."

"Very well," replied the father—"the books can be given to your cousin Helen—she will not refuse them. I will carry them over to her in the morning, and wish her a 'happy New Year.'"

Now, Helen Moore was a very pretty girl, of about the age of Emily. She was not over and above proud—pride enough about her, however, to be always neat—not haughty, nor vain, nor fond of extravagance. This was probably in part, because her parents were not as rich as those of Emily—and then, she was not indulged in all the fanciful whims of girlhood. She was kind, and obedient, and enjoyed the love and confidence of a vast circle of friends. She was Emily's superior in a great many respects. Not that Emily was the very worst of girls—by no means. With the exception of her vanity, and haughtiness, and that rebellious spirit which showed itself, when crossed in her desires and inclinations, she had none other faults worthy of notice. When not opposed, or thwarted in her wishes, she was kind, and affectionate, and agreeable—would skip about with a step as light as a fairy's, and sing with the sweetness of a nightingale. Emily too had many friends—but she had a great many enemies.

Immediately after the conversation with her father, Emily retired sullenly to her chamber; and there she flung herself down on a sofa, and gave vent to her feelings in a flood of tears. And it was a long while before she became composed.—When, however, her tears had ceased to flow, and her troubled feelings had become calm, she began to reflect upon what had transpired; and at first she determined to remain wilful and stubborn to the last. But she soon thought more seriously of the matter. She could not make herself believe that her father was wrong or unkind—or that she herself, was acting right. And then, too, she thought, her cousins, and many young friends would be there on the morrow, to visit her, bringing with them their New Year's gifts of Annuals, and other fine things; and when she reflected, that, through her own imprudence and wilfulness, she should be without any—then, she wept again. And then her parents had always been kind to her—had always allowed her every thing that heart could wish—and now, perhaps,—nay, she was confident that she had offended them. And tears flowed afresh when she thought that this was so. And she repented of her morning's conduct, and that proud heart of her's was softened and subdued. She wiped away the tears from her eyes, and went down into the parlor, where she found her mother sitting alone.

"Mother," said the penitent girl, "I feel very much ashamed of my conduct this morning—can you forgive me?" And she sobbed aloud on her mother's bosom.

"Certainly, my dear," replied Mrs. Bell, and she parted back the dark tresses, and kissed the pretty white brow of her repentant child.

"And will father forgive me!"—continued the weeping Emily.

"Most assuredly he will"—and the tears of joy fell from the mother's eyes.

"And will he give me the books?" inquired Emily, still farther; "I do not care any thing about the silk hat—if I can only have the books, I shall be contented"—and she looked up into her mother's face, smiling through her tears.

"I presume he will, when he is told of the great change that has come over his daughter. He has gone out of town on some business, and will not return until late in the evening. I will speak to him when he comes, and I trust that the books, which are very pretty, and filled with choice instruction, will be yours. And I trust, likewise, that they will be of more benefit to you, as your father said, than all the silk hats in the world."

* * * * * * * *

Emily arose early the next morning, after a sound and refreshing sleep, and there, on a table in her chamber, in elegant bindings, lay the "Palfrey's," and "A Voice to Youth"—and beside them, THE NEW SILK HAT.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, L. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 4, 1839.

THE NEW YEAR

Reader—may it be to thee a joyous and a useful one! The dark clouds that rested on almost every portion of our land—the embarrassments—the ill-health—the weariness of constantly recurring toil, are behind us, and a new scene seems to be opening with the new year.—God grant that over it no clouds may gather but those of refreshing—no lightnings flash, but those of purifying—no thunders roll, but those that speak of our Father's majesty and greatness. Of toil—ever recurring labors—there is much, for there is much to do. Societies sleeping and dead are to be awaked and raised from the death sleep—the desponding to be encouraged—the weak to be strengthened, and the strong and healthy to be improved in the graces and knowledge of Christianity.

For this purpose, a closer and better organization is needed—efforts should be made by our lay brethren who see the present evils, to secure to our preachers generally a greater compensation for their labors—or, where enough is subscribed and promised, to devise some means by which he may receive it without heart-sickening delay, and suffering. I say lay brethren should attend to this matter, for it is a delicate one for a preacher to meddle with, though nine out of ten of our preachers have suffered severely from insufficient salaries, or sufficient ones, lingeringly paid, if ever! These things, also, are as disgraceful to societies, and as injurious to the cause, as they are grievous to the poor preacher So, in God's name, as well as in the name of humanity, let them be mended by removal before the new year becomes old.—Sunday schools, Bible societies, social meetings, and society libraries must also be increased, encouraged and perfected, if we would have ourselves improved or the cause prospered. Not that all these are needed in every society, but that all are needed in the denomination.—Then there are neighborhood and family duties—the sick, the poor, the common school, the family circle—oh, never fear, reader, that you will not find enough to do in the New Year—all of which will be further treated of in this new volume—so that we will close here by the guid Scot's saying "God speed the wark!"

A. B. G.

THE WORSHIP OF GOD.

In a Psalm of David, recorded in 1 Chronicles, we learn in what consists the worship of the living God. He says, "Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name; bring an offering and come before him; worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness." In this passage, there are three particulars distinctly stated, which are necessary to constitute acceptable and profitable worship.

1. The first is, to "give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name." Before we can truly do this we must become acquainted with his character, as he has been pleased to reveal himself to man. Without this knowledge, we can never appreciate, or even understand what is the glory of his name and nature. In proof of this, we need only refer to the opinions of various sectarians. While they admit, in common terms, that God is infinite in goodness, they hesitate not to ascribe a character to him, which, if true in reference to any being, would sully his name, and taint his glory forever beyond the possibility of recovery. Is this the way to worship God in spirit and in truth? Was this the way the Psalmist worshipped the Lord when he said, "O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee: my soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is; to see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary?" If God had ever manifested his glory in the sanctuary, by revealing the horrid dogma that he would ever cast one soul into endless torment, then David thirsted to witness that glory, in a degree to be compared with the longing of the flesh in a dry and thirsty land where no water is. But there is not a Christian who dares to ascribe such an anti-christian spirit to the sweet singer of Israel, and say that the ascriptions of such a heart are acceptable to God. It follows then, that he who believes in the doctrine of endless misery, if he worships God in view of his own sentiments, must either do it by ascribing to him perfections which he does not believe to be His due, or by imputing to Him things which would destroy the glory of any being that ever existed in heaven or on earth. In either case he possesses not the spirit of Christian devotion.

What, then, is the glory due unto God's name? We have seen what is not to his glory; or rather, we have seen that it is a part of his glory, that he does not possess attributes, for which, it would be impossible that his children should praise him.

We are to worship God, therefore, in consideration of the infinite perfection of his attributes, and the impartial justice of his providence. These it is, which have constituted his glory from all eternity. Our own experience, the history of the world, and the voice of revelation, proclaim that God is good. We are to praise him, therefore, for his goodness, for his wonderful works to the children of men. He is good in bestowing upon us an existence, and he is good in taking away, again, all that is perishable; for he only takes away that which is exclusively adapted to this world. Another existence has been conferred upon us as moral and intellectual beings, which he has given to us for eternity. This he will never take from us, nor can we ever forfeit it, for its resurrection in the eternal world is a free gift. The physical existence he has given us as a medium, through which the spirit is to act, while passing onward through the scenes and events of time. When this state is ended, we shall no longer need the physical. God has therefore been good in constituting it mortal.

He is good in making the happiness of our existence, in part, dependent upon our own exertions; as life, without [illegible] would be fraught with discontentment and misery. He is good in the gift of the Saviour, and in the glorious truths which he has thereby made known to mankind. But we need not multiply these instances. He is infinitely good in all his dealings with the children of men.

Another trait of glory due to the name of him whom we worship, is his impartiality and immutability. If he is unchangeable, we can not worship acceptably by ascribing to him a changing disposition; for in that case we would be withholding from him what was due to his name, and ascribing something to him, which, fortunately for mankind, he does not possess. And if we suppose him to be mutable, or partial, we thereby imagine him to be destitute of the very qualities which render him an object of supreme devotion. But God, by the mouth of the prophet Malachi, says, "I am the Lord, I change not." Now, if we admit that God is an object of worship, in view of what he is now doing to man, we must admit that he will always remain an object of worship, in view of the same disposition toward his children. If we suppose that he is disposed to inflict eternal suffering upon men, we are bound to render ascriptions of praise to him for the possession of that disposition. And we should also feel grieved at every instance of conversion, as being calculated to rob God of the glory due to his name; for, if it ever was for his glory to damn men without any other object than to vindicate his name by making them ceaselessly miserable, it will remain so, in relation to those very individuals, to all eternity. But no one can praise him for this, for the plain reason, that he possesses no such disposition. He is good even to the sinner; and it remains to be shown that he ever punishes him any more than is necessary for his individual good. It is true that divine chastisement is exemplary, as well as remedial. But it ceases to be exemplary, the moment that it loses the power of reforming. God therefore is good to the sinner, and manifests his goodness by holding out to him inducements sufficient to lead him to forsake the error of his ways; and, as he changes not, it follows that he will continue his mercy to him until all shall know him from the least to the greatest.—Here, then, is another glory due to his name, which we are required to keep in view while we worship him.—And with this glorious subject upon our mind, our worship will be, not the ascriptions of a partial spirit, but the warm fervor of that benevolence, which rejoices in the happiness of a world of mankind redeemed from sin and misery. In this way, we can worship him, even in the midst of affliction, for we know that his chastisements are for our profit, that we may be partakers of his holiness.

Another glory due to the name of our heavenly Father is, that all his attributes harmonize together. To suppose him possessing attributes which require the happiness of his dependent children, and others which require their unlimited and unqualified misery, would be to reflect eternal discredit upon his name, and to represent him as a very imperfect being. For attributes like these can never be exercised together. While one class is employed, the other must remain idle and useless.—For instance, God possesses the attributes of mercy and justice. To reconcile the doctrine of a partial salvation, with the attributes of God, he is said to exercise his mercy only, towards those whom he saves, and only his justice towards the damned. This doctrine involves the absurd and ridiculous notion that God can not be justly merciful, or mercifully just. If it be true that his mercy is irreconcilable with his justice, or that his glory in one single instance consists in being just without being merciful, in the same instance and to the same individual, then we are called upon to worship him for being unjustly merciful, and unmercifully just. And as the same general reasons will, undoubtedly, exist, why we should worship him in eternity, we shall there worship him for being unjustly merciful to us, and unmercifully just to our neighbors. This, of course, is only based upon the supposition that the above notion concerning the justice and mercy of God, represents the glory which is due to his name.

But as we can not admit this sentiment, we are compelled to advocate that his mercy and justice are perfectly consistent with each other. Indeed, they are one and the same thing; being only different words, used to express different motives or designs, as they may be apparent to us, in the same treatment towards ourselves. As there can be no mercy without justice, so there can be no justice without mercy. The lack of one will invariably destroy the other. It is not venturing too much to say, that there can not an instance be found where an unmerciful act has been committed, which was at the same time just. It may be said that God is just in punishing the sinner, and we shall not dispute the proposition. But we challenge the world to produce a case wherein the sinner has been punished beyond what was necessary to his complete reformation, and to teach him the certain and unavoidable consequences of sin. This can never be done. Hence God is as merciful to the sinner in punishing him for his transgressions, as he is just to him. For, were he left to continue in sin, impenitent and unconscious of its bitter consequences, he would neither be dealt mercifully nor justly by.

Justice requires that the sinner should be punished.—Mercy requires that that punishment should be for his good. Therefore mercy requires that justice should be done to him.

Mercy requires the reformation of the offender. Justice points us to punishment as one of the most effectual means, in his present state, for the accomplishment of that end. Therefore, justice requires that mercy should be shown him.

We can not therefore worship God acceptably, by ascribing to him the exercise of a portion of his attributes, at the expense of the rest. If we render unto him the glory due unto his name, we must possess a knowledge of his goodness, his immutability, his justice and his mercy, connected with all the other perfections of his nature, which we have not room to mention.

2. The next particular in the acceptable worship of God, is to "bring an offering and come before him."—Some people think that public worship with all its solemnities and interesting exercises, is of but little importance. Or, at least they seem to think so, by the infrequency of their attendance upon the approved ordinances of worship. They seem to think that because mankind can worship the Lord in the social circle or in the private study, by the fireside, or in the field, there is therefore no necessity of building meeting-houses, securing the services of a preacher, or even meeting together in the public congregation. Well, let us see how this will work. Man can live alone in the wilderness; or beneath the brow of the frowning glacier, and worship God as devoutly as in the midst of the congregation.—Perhaps he may find more to excite his wonder and marvellousness, and less to distract his attention from his devotions. Why then seek the society of his kind, and the refinement of civilization? Is it not because "without counsel, purposes are disappointed, but in the multitude of counsellors they are established?" The same reason exists, why we should come publicly before the Lord.

Again, David probably could worship the Lord in private, as well as we can in our own day; and so could his people. And yet he gathered together all Israel, to praise the Lord, and be joyful on the occasion of bringing the ark into the place designed for it.

But we are not only to come before the Lord, but we are also to make an offering. The sacred historian tells us, that David and his people brought the ark of God, and set it in the midst of the tent that David had pitched for it; and they offered burnt sacrifices and peace offerings before God. The object of these sacrifices will teach us the nature of the offering which we are required to make. They were not for the purpose of placating the wrath of an already angry God, or for preventing him from being less kind to them than he always had been, but for the purpose of manifesting and expressing their deep and devotional gratitude to him for his past favors, and their confidence that he would forever continue to be thus kind. Hence, the prominent features of our worship are to be gratitude to God for his abundant mercies towards us. We are not only to feel, but express our gratitude and confidence. This is the offering which we are to make. It is the offering of the heart, of the soul, of the mind. It is to centre and concentrate our affections in God, as the fountain of all our joys.

3. "Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness."—Little need be said upon this topic, but to refer the reader to the remarks already made. That man who fully believes in the truth, that God's glory consists in the perfection of his attributes, the impartiality of his dealings, the universality of his love, and the efficacy of his power in accomplishing whatever his wisdom and love prompts him to do, and who feels that devotion which these truths justly demand will not, can not fail to maintain, in public and in private, that course of conduct which shall be consistent with the beauty of holiness. Still there are many who profess to worship God, who do not believe in the truth above stated; and others, who profess to believe the truth, but do not comply with the requisitions.

One class profess to worship God, and at the same time ascribe to him that which is the most inglorious which it is possible to conceive. Another class profess to believe that God is the Saviour of all men, and to ascribe to his name all the glory which he has declared to be his due, but their hearts are as cold as the ice-bergs of the frigid zone, and their lives as barren as the deserts of Arabia. The first sometimes do good works, when their hearts are better than their heads, their practice better than their faith. The other sometimes takes a glance at the truth, but suffers it not to approach near enough to warm his heart. In this state of mind, each one professes to believe what the other practices. But when the first is under the control of his creed, he points to the other as an evidence of the legitimate effect of the doctrine of Universalism, while the latter contend that even the good works of the former accord with the spirit of Partialism. About a fair offset against each other. So let them remain, until each learns that a faith which can not be practiced without dishonor, and practice which gives the lie to his professions, are not the concomitants of true worship.

A. R. B.

CHRISTIAN TRAITS AND DUTIES—NO. I.

THE WEEPING SOWER.

"He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall, doubtless, come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."—PSALM CXXVI: 6.

All will acknowledge the beauty of the language, and of the allusion in the above verse. The Fall of the year, the season of seed-time, has its periods of loveliness, its days of laughing and yellow sunshine. But, on the whole, it is a time calculated to excite within us, feelings of deep melancholy. The glory of Summer has passed, and these occasional gleamings remind us of its light and joy, and make sadder the contrast. The rainbow beauty of the woods, is fast fading away. The sere and scanty leaves are rustling down from the trees, and the chilling winds are sighing among the branches.—Mist and shadow cover the bright streams, and the hill sides, and the bare or stubble fields, are clad in a sombre or cheerless garb.

The season brings up also, associations of ruin, desolation and decay. We think of the broken lyre, and the withered bridal garland, and the cold, unlighted altar—of beauty in its blight, genius in its wane, and manhood with its pale, death-smitten brow—of glad voices now silent, of crushed hopes, and of "memories that chill the heart." It would be a fitting time for us to go forth among the halls of the departed great, where the ivy banners hang in damp saloons, and the mouldering stones peer out mid the worn gilding of lofty and pompous battlements—to stoop and decipher the inscription upon the grey monument, and to muse over the trunk of the fallen oak. We would think of the grave now, with sadder thoughts, even, than usual; and we would wreathe no laurel there, and plant no crimson roses; for the warm sunbeams can not linger upon them, nor the soft winds breathe music above the dead. Such and similar associations, would the circumstances of the season call up in the mind of the reflecting man.

But even he who looks not beyond the physical signs of the time, might be seriously affected, and it is natural, that with deep solicitude the husbandman commits the "precious seed" to the bosom of the earth. Leaving out of view the increasing inclemency of the season that seed is to lie in the covered furrow through a long bleak Winter. The cold, searching winds, and the fierce gusts, will go over it. The streams will be bound with ice, and mantles of snow, or an iron hardness, will be upon the earth. The storms will sweep abroad on their dark pinions, and the rains will fall with their chilling influences. And even when the spring-time comes, the hills and the valleys will be channelled with water-courses, the spell of the frost will be upon the fields, the trees and herbs will be delayed in their budding; and many months must elapse, ere the sickle shall glitter beneath the plumy grain, or the reaper sing among his wheat-sheaves. And so, I say, that he who labors in the sweat of his brow, and depends upon the yielding of the harvest, will naturally have a feeling of solicitude, as he takes the seed, in the season of sowing, and scatters it into the earth.

Our readers, then, will all acknowledge the beauty of the allusion, in the verse which we have placed at the head of this article, and although it may not be the case, that the husbandman literally "sows in tears," yet the melancholy circumstances of the seed time, to which we have alluded, together with the joy of the harvest, and the original purpose of the Psalm, clearly establish its beauty and propriety.

Cyrus, the king of Persia, had issued a proclamation, that the Jews should go up to Jerusalem from their exile "and build the house of the Lord God of Israel."—[Ezra i: 3.] The one hundred and twenty-sixth Psalm, is one of thanksgiving, and is generally supposed to have been written in relation to this return from the Babylonish captivity. Says Bishop Horne, in commenting upon the verse quoted,—"The fatigue of travelling from Babylon to Judea; the melancholy prospect of a long depopulated country, and ruined city; the toil necessary to be undergone before the former could be again brought into order, and the latter rebuilt; could not but allay the joy of the released captives, and even draw many tears from their eyes. They are therefore comforted with a gracious promise, that God would give a blessing to the labors of their hands, and crown them with success, so that they should once more see Jerusalem in prosperity, and behold in Zion the beauty of holiness. This promise is conveyed under images borrowed from the instructive scenes of agriculture." All will now understand the peculiar appropriateness of the allusion in the original application of the Psalm. The lesson which we may derive from it, is this—that the upright and obedient man who is laboring, although under adverse circumstances, in the course of his duty, may be consoled by the thought, that his labors will not, in the end, be fruitless. "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall, doubtless, come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."

Such consolation is often needed, and may, in many instances, be of soothing and cheering efficacy. It is calculated to encourage the undertaking of, and the continuance in duty, the propagating and the teaching of pure and just principles, the maintenance of right, in perils, persecutions, and in times of ill-omen and of evil. Therefore, we say, it is often needed, for we are glad to know and to believe that there have been and are, many laborers in the great vineyard of the world—husbandmen in the harvest-field of humanity—who are disposed to toil there. We know, also, that troubles often environ such, and that in adversity and in tears, they must sow the precious seed of righteousness and truth. To the good and the great, who have labored in the cause of God and of humanity, their duty has been made clear—that when they have been entrusted with truths, or with capacities for defending those truths, they should go forth and impart them to the world. So, the lone student, feeling this call of duty, day after day, by the stream, or in the forest, or shut from the influence of the balmy air and the sunshine, and night after night preventing sleep, pores over the pages of ancient wisdom, or studies the volume of nature, or the brighter record of revelation, and gathers from knowledge an eloquence and a power. He discovers a true principle of moral action, or the long hidden secret of a mineral or a plant, or the mystery of a star—something calculated to enlighten and improve the race—and he goes forth with the truth fresh in his heart, and, with a kindling eye and a quivering lip, proclaims it to the world. The world scoffs at, and ill-treats him, the multitude comprehends him not, poverty and neglect weigh down his soul—yet he has precious seed, and he goes forth, although with weeping.

This perception of duty—of having a work to perform—has been the cause of deeds that shine gloriously in the annals of the world. Gloomy was the seed-time of many a principle which has become co-extensive with civilization, or has effected a glorious revolution in the affairs of individuals, and of nations. Galileo quailed before the fury of the inquisition, and in terror denied the truth;—now the system which he taught is firmly rooted and wide-spread over the earth. Hervey, upon the first promulgation of his theory of the circulation of the blood, was sneered at and abused;—now it is admitted, like a self-evident proposition. We have seen the recent discoveries of a science, insulted and ridiculed, ill-treated by the great and the learned;—and now we see that science taught in various portions of the civilized world, acknowledged by the gifted and the profound, and fast producing the ripe and glorious harvest.

We stand upon the fields where liberty struggled in the conflict. We witness its "crowning hour" of triumph—we hear the breaking of fetters, the clashing of steel, the shouts of mighty and free men—we see the red blood of noble hearts poured out to seal its charter! But let us go back to the seed-time of that early harvest—that harvest which is now ripening and spreading among men. Gathered around an out-spread scroll, we behold those whose features now glow only upon the canvass, or stand out from the chisel of the sculptor. Who are they? A feeble band of colonists—or, rather, few but not feeble. They have "left the sickle in the unshorn grain"—they have come out from the depths of the wilderness, from the shop of the mechanic, from the various avocations of life. Their hands are hardened by field-toil, and their brows are marked by exposure to the harvest sun. What are they about to do? They are about to rise up and formally contend with a nation, whose fleets bestud the waters of every sea, and whose armies garrison the globe. And for what will they do this? To maintain the rights of man—to sow, even in tears and blood, the precious seed of freedom! So, "with a firm reliance upon the protection of divine Providence," they draw around that table. Not a lip quivers, not a hand shakes, not one soul swerves from its high purpose, as they sign that immortal charter—that charter sealed with blood, on the red field of war! A great principle was in their possession—they saw their duty, and they went forth, as it were, weeping.

Again—we stand upon the shores of the old world, back in the early part of the seventeenth century. A group is about to embark.

> "There is age with hoary hair
> Amid that pilgrim band;
> * * * * *
> * * * * * *
> There is woman's dauntless eye,
> Lit by her deep love's truth;
> There is manhood's brow, serenely high,
> And the fearless heart of youth."

Why, I ask, do they take an exile farewell? Why do they leave the homes of their glad childhood, the bannered halls of their sires, the circumstances of luxury and wealth, their broad fields and goodly heritages, their "tall, ancestral trees," and the places where the moonlight gleams upon the graves of their fathers? Why do they leave all these? They have a duty to perform, which is made clear to them—they have a principle to exhibit to the world—they have precious seed to sow! They would find and preserve

> "Freedom to worship God!"

They tell us, in the language of the author of the New England Chronology, that—"nothing [is] more disagreeable to them, than to be called by the name of any mere man whatsoever, since they [renounce] all attachment to any mere human systems or expositions of Scripture, and [reserve] an entire and perpetual liberty of searching the inspired records, and of forming both their principles and their practice from those discoveries they should make therein, without imposing them on others." "Go on!" says one of their heroic number, "God has more light yet to break forth from his holy word." And on they go! The ocean waves curl darkly around their path, and the icy winds of Winter whistle among the cordage! On they go!—What are the dark waves and the cold winds, in comparison with the sealed lip, and the fettered conscience? "Freedom to worship God," they seek, and they find it far across the cheerless water, where

> "They rear a cross in the rifted snow,
> And kneel on the barren rock below!"

They light their hearth-fires, they erect their sanctuary, they plant their feet there to live and to die, for the sake of duty and of principle. Robinson, Winthrop, Bradford, Higginson—"the Pilgrim Fathers"—it was precious seed which they brought with them across the ocean! They sowed it in tears—behold the harvest!—The truth which they exhibited—the principle of worshipping God according to the dictates of conscience—has gone abroad in our land, and all its churches wherein liberal Christianity is preached, and glad tidings are made known, are the manifestations of that principle which they taught, and for which they left home and kindred, and sought a new world, and laid their bones in the wilderness. The streams of free thought in matters of religion, which flow around us now, rejoicing in their courses, gushed from this fountain in the forest.

Thus, we see the truth of our motto, illustrated by the history of great events. But there is one illustration yet more powerful, which, together with the application of our subject, we will exhibit in our next number.

E. H. C.

A TRUE INCIDENT.

During the time when Dr. Lansing was at the height of his popularity in Auburn, Br. Whitnall proclaimed the word of salvation, for a portion of the year, to the few believers in the Restitution, who were not ashamed of the truth, even in that village. Br. Whitnall was on intimate speaking terms with Dr. Lansing, and not unfrequently, some pleasant wit passed between them.—On one occasion, Dr. L. said, "Mr. Whitnall why do you come here to catch the sheep which stray from my fold, and to lead them away from me?" "Why," says Br. W., "don't you know the reason?—they stray from you because you half starve them. If you wish to keep them at home, you must have better pasture, and then keep your bars up." G. W. M.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br. G. W. Gage, at Babcock Hill, in the town of Bridgewater—Br. J. S. Kibbe, at Oneida Castle—Br. M. B. Smith, in Herkimer, at 6 P. M.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. Woolley, at Stockbridge—Br. Whiston, in Oxford, and Br. J. T. Goodrich, in Cooperstown—Br. H. B. Soule, at New-Berlin village—Br. Biddlecom, at Durham, and at Shaver's school-house (Rome) in the evening—Br. J. C. Eddy, at Clockville—Br. G. W. Gage, at North New-Berlin.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. Guild, at the Inn kept by Mr. Roman, in Maryland, at 11 o'clock, A. M.; (subject Luke xii: 4 5:) and at the Academy in Worcester, in the evening—Br. H. B. Soule, at Smithville Flats, and at Smithville in the evening.

Br. E. E. Guild, will preach on the evening of January 24th, at the school house near the Hartwick Seminary.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P M, Middlebury, (O) for H C, I D, H R and A S—P M, Florida, (Mass)—A C, Edbridge, for S M B, H D, J D, J McG, J U, JR and S C—P M, York North Ridge, for W F—P M, Somersett, for C L—J S A, Throopsville, for self, H S and G T—P M, Hartwick, for H S—I A, Bennington, (Vt) for self and J M—P M, Pen Yan, for W C—P M, Churchville, for A C, A A, D W F and B B—J R, Marietta—O L, Washington, (Mich) for H N—J W, Detroit (Mich)—P M, Clyde, for N B—P M, Oregon, for self and W A S—P M, Taburg, for A W—P M, Monroeton, for Mrs. H T and S and L—S D, Coffee Creek, (Pa) for J M, B B M, E D, E C, S C, D O S, S S R, J T, P D, E C and M J K—B H F, New-Milford, (Pa) for self, A S, D F, B B, W S, O W and E B—P M, Ellsworth, (O) for A F, W B and G F W—J B, Kinderhook, (Ills) for self and B W—P M, Windsor, (O) for M McI and H P—J C H, Lebanon, (O) for W C—P M, Mansfield, (O) for J G—P M, Cherokee, (O) for A R T—P M, Johnstown, (O) for A D and W E—H G, Pittsburg, for self, G W L and J H—P M, Danby, for W P—Rev A U, Hornelsville, for J H, J R and W M—E W, Moravia, for self, G K and T E—P M, Tobyhanna, for C L—M D, Lockport—L C Jr, Kempville, (U C) for self, S G, I B and J B—P M, Summerfield, (Mich)—A D B, Marsailes, (Ills) for self, J B and M H O—M R C, Vermilionville, (Ills) for A H, L B and S N—J B, Western, (Vt)—A R, Maumee, (O) for self and S E.

There are more remittances which should be published this week, but want of time to attend to the letters prevents.

POETRY.

With her characteristic modesty, the writer of the following splendid poetry, (which, by the bye, was received early in November last,) says, in the letter accompanying it—"The lines enclosed have been some time written, and I had never seen the words commented upon until after my comment was finished, when I saw some lines by Mrs. Sigourney on the same subject. Of course, I thought mine a lame attempt, but I venture to send it." I willonly add, that in my humble opinion, she is only excelled by Mrs. S. in the finish of her articles. The following, of course, willlabor under the disadvantage of being the second article to the reader who has read Mrs. Sigourney's. A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

GOD IN HIS WORKS.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

"The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God."

Go where the eternal mountains stand,
In majesty sublime—
Proud masonry of God's own hand—
Scorning the wrecks of time;
Ascend the towering granite steep,
With mist-wreaths turban'd o'er,
And list, far down the fissures deep,
The young volcano's roar.

Go where the thundering cataract pours
His foaming floods along,
While echo from the cavern'd shores
Repeats the undying song;
And from the roaring depths below
The cloudy columns rise,
Where grandeur's pencil paints the bow
That spans the stormy skies:

Or listen to the songs that thrill
Through the deep, ancient woods,
Pealing o'er dale and echoing hill,
Like the rush of angry floods,
When mighty winds are on the wing,
And wild-voic'd tempests rave,
And the thunders dread responses ring,
To swell the loud octave.

Or pause amid the deafening jar,
Of the earthquake's fearful march,
When his tramping steeds, as they speed from far,
Resound through the vaulted arch,
And heed the whispers of thy soul,
That bid thee bow before
Him, at whose frown the thunders roll,
And frighted oceans roar.

Go, gaze upon the jewelled crown
Of undulating light,
The gorgeous chaplet wreathing 'round
The solemn brow of night;
And ask thy soul, could giddy chance
The mystic arch upraise,
Where golden constellations dance
In glory's living blaze?

Is it blind chance that rears on high
The slender, leaf-clad bough?
That proudly seeks the ethereal sky
To bask in the sun-beam's glow;
Teaching the soul with angel wing
To scorn the dull, cold earth,
And read in each revolving spring
The mystery, spirit-birth.

What power attunes the ocean lyre
To hymn its lofty lay?
Though kingdoms, empires, thrones expire,
As ages melt away,
And blank oblivion's waveless sea
Rolls o'er the works of time,
The boundless billows, changeless, free,
Still ring the eternal chime!

What hand has planted in the deep,
The hoary mountain-danes,
'Round which the wild storm-spirits sweep,
And dread commotion reigns?
The same that binds the tempest's brow
With bands of radiant light,
And wreathes kind mercy's signet bow
To glid time's gloomy night.

Dark phantom of unending gloom!
Thorn for the brow of grief!
What hopes can thy sad pow'rs resume,
Cold, cheerless unbelief?
O soon may Zion's sceptre kiss
Rule over land and sea,
And faith to all, the glories bring
Of immortality.

INSTRUCTIVE EXTRACTS.

"On judging justly.—A perfectly just and sound mind, is a rare and invaluable gift. But it is still much more unusual to see such a mind, unbiased in all its actings. God has given this soundness of mind but to few; and a very small number of those few escape the bias of some predilection, perhaps habitually operating; and none are at all times, and perfectly, free. I once saw this subject forcibly illustrated. A watchmaker told me that a gentleman had put an exquisite watch into his hands, that went irregularly. It was as perfect a piece of work as was ever made. He took it to pieces and put it together again twenty times. No manner of defect was to be discovered, and yet the watch went intolerably.—At last it struck him that possibly the balance-wheel might have been near a magnet. On applying a needle to it, he found his suspicions true. Here was all the mischief. The steel-work in the other parts of the watch had a perpetual influence on its motions; and the watch went as well as possible with a new wheel. If the soundest mind be magnetized by any predilection, it must act irregularly."—Penny Mag. Vol. vii. p. 135.

"Fruits intended for Man.—From the conformation of fruits alone, one might be led, even without experience, to suppose that part of this provision was destined for the utilities of animals. As limited to the plant, the provision itself goes beyond its object. The flesh of an apple, the pulp of an orange, the meat of a plum, the fatness of the olive, appear to be more than sufficient for the nourishing of the seed or kernel. The event shows that this redundancy, if it be one, ministers to the support and gratification of animal natures; and when we observe a provision to be more than sufficient for one purpose, yet wanted for another purpose, it is not unfair to conclude that both purposes were contemplated together. It favors this view of the subject to remark, that fruits are not (which they might have been) ready altogether, but that they ripen in succession throughout a great part of the year; some in Summer, some in Autumn; that some require the slow maturation of the Winter, and supply the Spring; also, that the coldest fruits grow in the hottest places. Cucumbers, pine-apples, melons, are the natural produce of warm climates, and contribute greatly, by their coolness, to the refreshment of the inhabitants of those countries."—Notes to Paley's Natural Theology.

"Toleration.—In the year 1791, two Creek (Indian) chiefs accompanied an American to England, where, as usual, they attracted great attention, and many flocked around them, as well to learn their ideas of certain things, as to behold 'the savages.' Being asked their opinion of religion, or of what religion they were, one made answer, that they had no priests in their country, or established religion, for they thought, that, upon a subject where there was no possibility of people's agreeing in opinion, and as it was altogether a matter of mere opinion, 'it was best that every one should paddle his canoe his own way.' Here is a volume of instruction in a short answer of a savage."—Drake's Book of the Indians, pp. 20, 21. Selected by G. W. M.

MARRIAGES.

In Smithville, October 10th, by Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Mr. EDWARD L. WILCOX, to Miss LOUISA KNICKERBOCKER, both of Smithville.

In Oxford, October 19th, by the same, Mr. GEORGE ECCLESTON, of Norwich, to Miss LAURA CARY of the former place.

In same place, October 31st, by the same, Mr. WILLIAM H. RAYNEUARD, of Smithville, to Miss LAURA SOULE, of Oxford.

In Rushford, December 17th, by Ev. J. Lewis, Mr. HOLTON COLBURN, to Miss PHEBE PERCY BENJAMIN, both of Rushford.

DEATHS.

In this city, December 2d, FRIEND AMIGH, son of Caroline and Wm. S. Amigh, aged 2 years, 11 months, and 6 days.

In Richfield, October 6th, after a lingering illness, Mrs. MELINDA, consort of Elias Brewster, aged 27 years. She dropped away in peace, in the full faith of a world's salvation. Her funeral was attended on the 8th by the writer. T. J. S.

In Columbia, November 9th, of consumption, Mr. JAPEZ GALLUP, aged 32 years. Funeral on the 11th—sermon by the writer. T. J. S.

In Cedarville, November 25th, after a severe and protracted disease, Mrs. MARY M., consort of D. S. Hull, aged 27 years. Her funeral was attended on the 28th, and the consolations of Gospel truth tendered to a large concourse of relatives and sympathising friends.

May our Father in heaven bless all that mourn—especially the absent and bereaved husband, with his orphan children. T. J. SMITH.

In Marshall, December 16th, LUCY M. LAPHAM, aged 17 months, and 9 days. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." Funeral sermon by J. G. MCADAM.

In Upper Canada, Mr. ——— BUTTERFIELD, son of Levi Butterfield, of Philadelphia, Jefferson county, aged 23 years. Br. B. was mortally wounded in the engagement at Prescott, and expired in about 48 hours after. May God impart consolation and resignation, to the mourning relatives.

In Columbia, Lorain county, Ohio, October 16th, SARAH VALENCIA, daughter of Isaac and Mary Tenney, aged 1 year and 11 months. Two years previous, the parents were called to part with an only son, LA FRANCIS LAFAYETTE, who departed this life, aged 2 years. Parents and children will meet again in joy.—Com.

In Adams, on the 11th of December, of inflammation of the bowels, Mr. DAVID J. M. HOWARD, Post Master at Appling, aged about 40 years. This may well be reckoned as one of the most trying and inscrutable dispensations of an unerring Providence; for we find it hard to be resigned to the sudden and unexpected removal of our dearest and most highly valued friends. But resigned or not, we must submit; and in the death of Br. H., not only the afflicted widow, three fond children, two nephews who were members of his family, and the other relatives, but likewise the whole circle of his acquaintance feel that they have lost a valued friend. The rising generation, in particular, have sustained a heavy loss, a large school of whom are suddenly deprived of their teacher. He was an able and zealous promoter of common school education—had spent nearly all his winters, from his youth, in teaching, in which difficult employment he excelled. He discharged with honor to himself, and to the satisfaction of the community, the most responsible offices in the gift of his townsmen. His religious experience was such that I have deemed it worthy of a special article, which will be found in its proper place.

Funeral on the 13th, when a numerous congregation devoutly listened to the consolations of the Gospel as presented by Br. Waggoner. J. F.

In South Bristol, on the 27th of November, Mrs. LOUISA P., wife of Allen Brown, aged 34 years, after a distressing illness of nearly one year, which she bore with exemplary patience and resignation.

Her faith was characterized by that liberality, which demonstrated that it partook largely of the spirit and properties of the faith of Abraham. Her life testified that her faith was an operative principle, and that here "she sojourned as in a strange land." She has gone home to her heavenly Father. Sermon on the occasion by the writer W. Q.

In Bristol, September 8th, Mr. ZEBULON PHILIPS, after a long and distressing illness. He was a believer and a supporter of the doctrine which teaches the final destruction of all evil. By his death, a wife and a number of children are left to mourn their loss. May God protect and guide them through this life, and finally crown them with life everlasting in the celestial city of our God. Sermon by the writer. W. Q.

In Bristol, October 28th, very suddenly, SALLY, wife of Elijah Jones, aged 44 years. In the morning, she was in full discharge of her domestic duties, before evening, death entered this family circle, and carried off to his dark dominions, one of its most prominent members. Sermon on the occasion by W. Q.

In Onondaga, August 31st, an infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Johnson. The circumstances connected with the death of this little bud of promise, were painful and afflictive indeed. It was drowned in a tannery vat. But I would say to the afflicted parents, mourn not as those who sorrow without hope. Your child has been transplanted from this vale of tears, to bloom in immortal glory in the paradise of God—where death, or sorrow, or pain, can never come. The funeral was attended September 1st, at the Presbyterian meeting-house at Onondaga Hill, and a discourse delivered by the writer, from 1 Cor. xv: 52. N. B.

In Salina, December 9th, JOHN HENRY, son of William and Emerilla Aldrich, aged 10 months and 9 days. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning relatives and friends on the 10th. To the afflicted parents I would say, weep not—thy child is not dead but sleepeth—the glorious era will arrive when you will again clasp the much loved one in the arms of an eternal and uninterrupted affection—where tears shall be wiped from off all faces, and where the corroding elements of sorrow, pain and death, can never find entrance to mar the peace of the blessed in heaven. N. B.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within four months; $2.00 if not paid within four months; or $2.50 if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis; and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞To City subscribers who receive their papers by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00 if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME X. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1839. NUMBER 2.

AN ADDRESS.

Delivered during the Concert of Sacred Music, given in the Universalist meeting-house, in Utica, on Sunday evening, December 23d, 1838, in commemoration of the birth of Christ.

BY THE EDITOR.

(Published by request.*)

In the dark ages, when might too often constituted right in the eyes of ignorant man, physical power, especially when surrounded by feudal pomp and barbaric splendor, was the principal object of admiration and praise. He who could best curb and guide the powerful and fiery steed—who could sit firmest in the saddle amid the opposing shock of countless spears against his iron-cased breast and sides, or who, with weightiest arm, could wield the glittering falchion, or the heavy battle-axe, was almost certain to rise high in the estimation of his contemporaries, and to be followed with the applauding shouts, and be aided with the sturdy arms of hosts of admiring followers and allies. For him the eye of beauty beamed in brighter radiance, and the harper's song rose in richer melody. To him the vassal's cap was doffed in humbler servility, and around his name the historian's pen poured a brighter flood of glory—glory, not such as Heaven approves, but as this world gives.

Such were the dark ages—and, alas! such are yet the charms that irradiate and dazzle the dark souls of earth, where the clouds of ignorance and error intercept the rays of civilization and Christianity.

But the light of religion kept on penetrating this gloom, and refining the minds of men by its gentle influence, and gradually the power of intellect, and of the domestic affections, rose in the horizon, and engaged the attention of men. The poet, the philosopher, the moralist, the tragedian, the statuary, and the painter, took the place of men of merely muscular power, and won the plaudits of men. And from thence, down to the present hour, a mighty intellect alone can fix the admiration of the leaders of the world—though even yet, that intellect in the field of blood, oft wins a richer meed than in the peaceful duties of life. And what is abated in the love of outward splendor, is made up in reverence for real wealth, whether exhibited or concealed—whether circulating in the rapid currents of trade, or hoarded in the vault and coffer.

But a brighter era is dawning on the human mind. The sun of Christianity is still rising upward, and exerting its powerful influence on the affections of men—its light is still increasing, and directing the sight of man to those hitherto unperceived objects which are most worthy of his admiration and praise. MORAL POWER, hitherto almost unknown and unnamed, and the splendor and glory of benevolence and righteousness, remain to be seen by man, to be felt and appreciated by his affections and understanding, to win from him the highest and purest praise his whole nature ever yet paid to any object around him. In the revelations of this new sense of the great and glorious, Alexander the Great is seen as the butcher of mankind, rather than an object of admiration; and Napoleon's splendid conquests are seen only through the ocean gouts of blood, and the bitter, briny tears, that every where surround them, and mark him as an enemy of our race. On the other hand, a Howard, an Oberlin, and others of humbler name, are rightly viewed as the greatest benefactors of mankind—far more glorious and worthy of the admiration and imitation of mankind, than immolators of whole hecatombs of human victims on the gory altars of ambition and war.

The martyr at the stake, braving the horrid death of burning alive, sooner than renounce one tittle of the truth—the Reformer, braving the scorn and contumely of all around him, for the benevolent purpose of enlightening and benefiting his cruel persecutors—the peaceful Quaker, or Menonite, or Tunker, enduring insult and violence most foul and aggravating, from a weaker foe, and yet refusing to resist, from conscience and on principle—all of these, manifest more courage—courage of a purer, higher and nobler order, than Putnam in the wolf's den—Napoleon on the bridge of Lodi, or even our own gallant heroes who have stormed an enemy's ramparts in the face of bristling bayonets and wide mouthed cannon ready to deal destruction. The one is the courage, the bravery, the chivalry of the soul—of the divinity in man—the other is too often the bravery of the animal in man, only. And as much superior to the physical as is the spiritual, even so much is moral courage, superior to the bravery of the mere warrior and the conqueror.

But there is yet one trait of character which we shall have occasion to notice, that is also beginning to be better appreciated by the increasing development of the moral sense of mankind.

What trait is that in the character of our beloved Washington, which begins more and more to excite the warmest admiration and praise of the Christian world? What events in his very eventful life, most attract towards him the heartfelt applause of the good and truly great of every clime and nation? Not his warlike deeds—for cool and collected as he was in danger, and brave in the field of death, and generous when the victory was won, there are thousands of names on the historic page as famed as he for these endowments and virtues. Not his matchless skill, when outnumbered in men and arms by a powerful and victorious enemy, he conquered even while flying before them, and won by patient perseverance and prudence, more than force and haste had gained from him—for history also presents a few, if but a few, who were nearly if not quite his equals, even in these rare endowments. Nor does his statesmanship, in guiding the untried barque of a new government—framed in part by himself—through the most trying scenes which our singular history presents for the astonishment of future ages—nor does this awaken the greatest praise and reverence for this wonderful man; for others there have been, who, in different circumstances have manifested similar talents, and who, in the same juncture, might have won the same meed of praise. Besides—these events have not manifested the highest moral traits of the great soul of our country's Father, and are not, therefore, the brightest stars in the ever green crown which an admiring world has firmly placed upon his godlike brow.

No—one of the greatest events in the career of Washington, was at the end of a long war, when, armed with the entire military power of a prostrate though redeemed country—with an army attached to their glorious leader, and smarting under unrequited and neglected services, he nevertheless resisted the temptations of ambitious friends, and instead of constituting himself the military ruler of his fellow-citizens, he resigned to their representatives his authority, and retired to private life, with far more joy than when he left it for the field of glory.

The other occasion was, when firmly grasping the helm of state, under a constitution that allowed repeated re-elections, without precedent to induce a vacation of the post of supreme power—with a people ready, and even anxious to continue him their chief ruler—with sufficient excuse in the circumstances of our government to warrant his remaining President, on the plea of his country's welfare—in despite of all these allurements—all these excuses—all these solicitations—he meekly kissed ambition's cup, and put it far from him—(and by the precedent he thus established, far from all thirsting lips that might succeed him) —and retired again to private life, and became the subject with far greater and purer joy than he ever became the ruler of his country. If the first act was insufficient to stamp this moderation and humility as a settled feature of Washington's noble soul, the latter instance confirmed its truth —and henceforward, forever, he will stand forward on the page of history, in striking contrast with the principal rulers of mankind, who, under whatever pretence, have always loved power more than the people's good.

This trait—this moral trait of Washington's resplendent character, has won, already, the highest praises, which men of the most commanding intellect can bestow; and no heart can be found which, whatever may be the language of the lips, does not admire and love the nobility of soul of which it is a characteristic. Even in the powerful and proud nation, whose fortune it was to be defeated by his prowess, the unanimous voice of praise on these actions, has drowned all mortified national pride; and her sages and legislators vie with his own countrymen in applauding his character. Such is the power of moral beauty—such the triumphs of universal benevolence and unwavering righteousness! What will it be, when all hearts are purified by its influence, and when all minds are enlightened to perceive its beauty, and to move only by its energies?

* * * * * *

I am sensible that I may have seemed to forget the subject and the occasion that has called us together this evening—but you will do me the credit to believe, that I have not forgotten my subject, nor wandered from it for one moment, when I call your attention to the fact, that we have assembled here to commemorate the birth of One who is greater, nobler, purer, wiser, more philanthropic, more benevolent, more disinterested far, than all that is presented in the combined characters of Howard, Bacon, Oberlin and Washington—of one whose entire power, though greater than all the powers of countless worlds, is moral power—whose entire services are for the benefit of others—and the benefits of whose labors are unconfined to any country, age or clime.

The ties of country and of home are very strong—so that for one's country many can be found who, Curtius-like, would dare to die. But Jesus of Nazareth saw that his death would not save his country and his home, and yet he offered up his life—for what? For the alien and the stranger—for the Jew-abhorred Gentile—for the idolatrous Greek—for the fierce Roman—for the benighted Barbarian!

Virtue ever commands respect and affection—so that "for a good man some would even dare to die." But Jesus saw that not the good, but the sinful and vile would most benefit by his sacrifice, and he died for us as sinners—as the vile, the depraved, the dead in sin!

* It was hastily prepared, amid many disadvantages, and though no favorite child of the Author, he submits to the wishes of a few friends, who desire to have it presented in this dress.

A. B. G.

The ties of friendship, oh how they cling around the heart, and bind our very being in their embrace! But not to save the lives of his friends—his few and humble friends—did Jesus lay down his life; nay, he saw, that, to consummate his mission, even these, his dear companions, must drink of his cup and be baptized with his baptism—that in their most cruel sufferings and deaths, the measure of his sacrifices would be filled up—and yet, most wonderful to relate! he shrunk not—he yielded not—but, calmly looking forward to it, for years, he nobly devoted himself and his friends—his all and their all, to the persecutor and the executioner—to suffering in life, and ignominy in death—and for what!—for whom? For his and their enemies—for his very persecutors and executioners!

Heard ever the earth such a devotedness of benevolence as this?—saw ever the heavens such an exhibition of universal love, as that on Calvary, when nature put on the sackcloth of darkness, and religion, in the temple of Jehovah, rent her garments before the holiest of holies?

But this is not all. Howard, and Oberlin, and Washington—the truly great, and good, and wise of all ages—hoped to see the reward of their toils, in the earthly completion of their plans—they expected to hear, ere they departed, their fellow-men applaud their self-sacrificing labors, and to rejoice before them in gratulation and praise.—And even during their darkest hours, they felt and saw that thousands, whom they loved, and whose praises were entrancing music to their souls, were with them, cheering them onward, and cordially animated them in all their course with those strengthening confirmations of the voice of conscience, so dear to every good man's heart.

But Jesus—our dear, our noble and godlike Redeemer—had none of these things to animate his exertions. He knew what was in man—he knew what was in all his course before him. He knew that the multitude followed him for the loaves and the fishes—that his own personal followers had a hope of reigning with him on an earthly throne—that when the hour of persecution and death grew darker, and closed more threateningly around him, these parasites would fall from his side and even array themselves against him; and that when the last bitter trial came, even one of his dearest friends would betray, another deny, and all would forsake and flee from him as if contamination were in his presence.—And yet—oh, glorious Saviour of sinners!—he went calmly forward through cruel mockings and persecutions, to utter desertion, to scourgings, to insults, and to death!

And such a death!—Animated by the spirit-stirring strains of martial music, and dazzled by the proud pomp and circumstance of war, methinks we would easily march to meet an enemy we hated, in a cause we loved, and look into the cannon's mouth, or on the bristling bayonet;—or, that accompanied by fellow-sufferers for the same faith, and high in the stern resolve of showing pitying fellow-believers the power of truth, in human endurance, we might march boldly to the faggot-girt stake;—or, that surrounded by weeping and pitying friends, who would smooth our passage to the grave, we might meet the monster death in any common grapple. But such was not the death of Jesus. No multitudes cheered him to its encounter, with the blood bounding proudly through his frame—no fellow-martyrs divided with him his pains, nor brother believers stood at his side to gather confirmation from the trials of his faith—no faithful wife, no pitying friend wiped the death damp from his pale, high brow, or kissed to calmness his lips quivering in the death-agony. But classed with vile malefactors—surrounded with the scowling brows and sneering lips of angry foes—the tenderest and most acutely feeling portions of his frame transfixed with rugged spikes, and bearing the whole weight of his intensely suffering body for hours—for weary, long-drawn, agony-measured, hour after hour—thus Jesus of Nazareth hung; scoffed at, derided, mocked, and even his death-thirst cruelly taunted with the bitter draught of vinegar and myrrh—thus Jesus met death—an ignominious, disgraceful and cruel death—praying for his murderers—"FATHER, FORGIVE THEM; FOR THEY KNOW NOT WHAT THEY DO!" Well might the infidel Rosseau, comparing the calm death scene of Socrates, surrounded by friends, while expiring by the sleepy effects of poison, with this scene of the Saviour's death—well might he exclaim—"Socrates died like a Philosopher, but Jesus Christ like a God!" For an idolatrous and hardened soldier, used to witness death in every form, was compelled to exclaim, on seeing the forgiving death of Jesus—"Truly, this was the Son of God."

Men have died for their families, their friends, their country, their suffering fellow-men—but Jesus of Nazareth sacrificed reputation and life—friends and country—even the hope of speedy triumph, for his enemies—for his murderers—for a sinful world. He did not only go TO death for them; but, god-like to the very last, his love burned brightly into the very depths of dissolution's darkness, and his last, his expiring breath was a prayer for, and even an extenuation of the crime of, his very murderers! No love on earth was ever found like this; and the heavens might well shroud themselves in darkness, as if refusing, for very wonder, to behold the never equalled sight.

Talk not of the courage of conquerors and warriors compared with the high resolve, and patient, mild endurance of Jesus—the one is of the earth, earthly; but the other is from heaven, heavenly. Bring not the power of embattling hosts with weapons of war to enforce their will—talk not of the restraining power of whips, and bolts, and bars—mention not even the fiery racks, and tormenting pains, and the adamantine walls, and the thousand legions of fiends, of a supposedly endless hell, as the very highest power to conquer sin—they may restrain, but they can not conquer, and are more likely to create it—but if you can make a heart, however depraved and wicked, realize the dying scene we have barely named, and to hear truly the dying prayer of our Saviour, you will find in its love an energy before which all the powers of earth, and hell, and sin, and death, are as nothing, and less than nothing—as vanity!

But I must tear myself from this subject, and the many others to which it would lead me. My limits allow me to touch upon but one other trait in the all-wonderful, and glorious character of the Friend of sinners.

Often, during his earthly life, was Jesus tempted, and beset by solicitations, to assume temporal and wide spread dominion, with a strong assurance of success in maintaining and extending it. Nor were motives wanting, which, even in the present day, would be applauded by good and great men. His kindred were in the humbler ranks of life, though of princely descent, and oppressors and aliens filled the high places to which those most dear to his heart, were entitled.—Might he not brush away these intruders, and right his own family? His friends were pining in poverty and obscurity, while the enemies of their common country—the Roman soldiery and exacting tax-gatherers—were rioting in the spoils of conquest. Might he not take the unlawful spoil from the undeserving, and restore it to the robbed and plundered? His country was writhing in the claws of the Roman eagle, and sweating under the degrading yoke of a distant Cæsar. Might he not be a true patriot, and drive off the warlike bird, and break the iron yoke, with a heavenly sceptre? The holy city of his God was profaned by the mailed footsteps of idolators, and the temple of Jehovah surrounded by their glittering arms, and waving ensigns. And might he not, as a prophet, even, of the only true God, vindicate His entire right to all worship in the land of Judea, and banish every rival of the Divine supremacy? To add to all this, the people—the mass of the people so strongly desired his rule, that they would have made him king even by force, had he not withdrawn from them.—Might he not, even under the cloak of republicanism—on the principle of obeying the public voice—and under the plea of seeking the public good, might he not take his rightful seat on the throne of his father David, and thus fulfil the letter of prophecy, as well as obey the claims of his family, his friends, his countrymen, his country, and his religion? When did stronger and more numerous motives unite to induce any one to ascend the throne of state, and assume the reins of government? Never! Yet Jesus resisted all these—bravely, nobly, PIOUSLY resisted them all. And why? Because, in Jesus the moral was superior to every merely intellectual and merely animal sentiment and propensity. And in obedience to the moral sentiments, in preference to every other impulse of his nature, he looked on the universe as his country—on mankind, every where, as his family—his neighbors—his countrymen—and on the dominion and reign of ignorance and sin, as the only true and really oppressive despotism in the world. For, from this, all other tyranny proceeds, and on this, all unrighteousness and oppressive rule is based. And true to his perfect and pure moral nature—faithful to his trust and to his fellow-men—he abjured all earthly rule and power—even all temporal comfort and ease—and preferred suffering, and the world's contempt and hatred, in life—and human insult and cruelty, in death, that thereby he might seal as truth, the Father's revelation of love to the world of sinners, and thus lead them to love God in return—that through death, he might destroy him that hath the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver all those who, through the fear of death, were all their life-time subject to bondage. Where will—where can you find any philanthropy and devotion which is like unto this!

But this exhibition of moral perfection ended not at the Saviour's death. God has given him, and he has received, all moral power in heaven and in earth, "that he may give eternal life to as many as God has given him." He reigns Governor in the moral universe, so that he may "draw all men unto him"—that "all that the Father hath given him may come unto him; and of all that come to him, he will in no wise cast any out." In accordance with this, his purpose, the Roman, the Greek, the Gaul, the German, the Briton, the Dane and many Isles of the sea, have successively received his law, and are gradually yielding to its moral power and dominion. The Sun of Righteousness is rising higher and higher in the horizon, and though some of our Christian brethren may dread burning wrath and destruction from its rays, we can assure them, from the past, as well as from Holy Writ, that there is HEALING, and healing only, in its beams. Enemy after enemy submits to the power of the cross, and falls a willing captive and obedient subject at the feet of the Saviour of the world.

* * * * * *

Soon, the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of God and his Christ—soon, the knowledge of God, which is life eternal, will fill and direct all minds—and soon, the moral power of the spiritual government, will fill every bosom with the reign of truth and love—with "righteousness, joy and peace in the Holy Ghost."—Then, death, and him that has the power of death, that is, the devil, and sin, which is the sting of death, will be destroyed—hell, (or the place of all the dead,) will give up its subjects to his power—all who died in Adam will be made alive in Christ, and all mankind be the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. "For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet"—till all things are subjected, by a moral subjugation, to the moral government his Father hath given him—till every being in the universe, God, only, excepted, is obedient to his requirements of love, and right, and truth. And then will he deliver up his power—his commission of universal dominion—to God, the Father of all, and become himself a subject of that moral government of which he was the Founder and Head—thus planting the last great star of glory and honor, in the everlasting crown of his fame!

I have done.—As well as the brief time allowed me, would permit, I have shown that he whose birth we commemorate, possesses every exalted trait of character that is deserving of love and praise—has them in the highest, purest, greatest degree—and, by the success of his mission, will secure for himself every honor which man can give, short of supreme worship; and which any being can lawfully receive.

To him, then, who hath so fervently loved and freely died for us, our spiritual Master, Teacher and Redeemer—and to his and our Father and God, who gave unto us this great Saviour, let us sing the warmest praises of our lips, yield the best powers of our minds, and give the purest affections of our hearts, now and forever more.—AMEN, and AMEN.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE DEPARTED YEAR.

BY J. S. KIBBE.

Hark! what lonely sound arrests my ear,
Murmuring so mournfully?
'Tis the knell that speaks the parting year,
Gone to past eternity.

Ah! 'tis gone—the year '38 has fled, to return no more! Never more shall it paint sorrow's hue upon the cheek of mortals, or bring joy to the bosom of humanity! Never more shall it witness the unfortunate child of sorrow, tossed upon the restless bed of anguish, or scatter, from its wings, peace and happiness in the pathway of man!—But what progressive changes have been unfolded to the view of mortals, within the short space of one year! And what vicissitudes of fortune have mankind passed through for the last twelve months! What a varied picture has been presented to us on the broad canvass of nature!

Spring, the beautiful artist, first painted her fine touches—then Summer, the master genius, penciled her beautiful shades of perfection. But the beauty of Spring, where is it? And the scenes of promise she presented, where are they? The envied foliage, with which Summer decked, in loveliness, the face of nature, where is it?—And where are her perfections? Ah! they have faded! Both the beauty of Spring, and the perfections of Summer, have been made desolate by the ruthless hand of Autumn. It would seem that Autumn had been sufficiently destructive to the beautiful scenery; but notwithstanding, Winter has spread his gloomy mantle of desolation over the canvass, and bound all nature in his icy chains. And,

"How cheerless the late blooming face of creation;
Weary time seems to rest in his rapid career;
And pausing awhile midst his own desolation,
Looks exultingly back on the grave of the year."

Nor is it only on the face of nature that the bygone year has penciled its colors and changes, but it has also been busy on the page of human existence. The Spring of life, with all its beauty and simplicity has been gradually exchanged for the deeper shades of Summer, and the hue of Summer has faded away before the breath of Autumn, and the Winter of existence. The melancholy task is ours to recount the seasons of affliction that have fallen to our lot; or ours is the delightful theme, to dwell with increasing pleasure on the sunny hours of bliss that have been allotted to us within the past year. 'Tis in the mirror of the departed year that we may behold the chequered scenes of human life. There we may trace the curious thread of affection through its many colors, and number the missing objects of our fondest hopes. We may sum up the resolutions formed, only to be broken, and the hopes we fondly indulged, only to be blighted by disappointment. It is there that we may behold the numberless phantoms of our bright anticipations dissolved; and there we may behold our many departures from the polar-star of duty. The year—the departed year, is full of instructions, and he is wisest who profits most thereby. Here we may see the aspirant for fame, eagerly pursuing after his eluding shadow, and the enthusiast fondly clinging to his golden dream, until overcome by disappointment, they sink, the miserable sport of caprice and misfortune. How many youthful buds of promise have been blasted, and links of life have been severed, and borne away by the fleet pinions of the year! And how many guiding stars have vanished from our earthly horizon, and creatures of our dearest affections have been snatched from our embrace within the brief space of twelve months!

"Ah, many are they who life's journey have ended—
Whom fondly we loved, or in friendship held dear;
Down in death's lonely valley have sweetly descended,
And lie there entombed—'with the grave of the year.'"

Clinton, N. Y., January, 1839.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

"GIVE US THIS BREAD."

There is to be a Universalist Conference or two days meeting held—the where and the when will be duly noticed in this paper, as usual—and it is to be hoped, and indeed is confidently expected, that a goodly number of our ministering brethren will be present. To them in particular, is this article addressed.

Brethren—There are in most places, certain persons claiming to be friendly to our cause, who do not ordinarily attend our meetings. When there is to be a great meeting, or when some new or celebrated preacher is expected, they are pretty sure to be present; but to attend upon the stated ministrations of the word, weekly, two-weekly, or monthly, is by no means their custom. It is thought that there will be a considerable number of this class of community, at the expected meeting, and that they will come really hungry and thirsty, not for the plain, substantial, nutritious, good bread of God, and the pure, clear, wholesome, invigorating water of life; nor, indeed, for that feast of "fat things and wines," the partaking of which to the full, produces neither surfeit nor intoxication—these things they have no desire for—their religious relish is depraved—they want something to gratify a morbid, unhealthy appetite. Some of these persons, for example, in referring to a certain witty, brow-beating, break-down discourse, which was once perpetrated here, on a like occasion, will assure you that they were highly delighted with it, and that the individual who delivered it, is or was the smartest and best preacher they ever heard. And it is easy to discover that a serious, charitable, edifying sermon, calculated to enlighten the understanding, to warm the moral feelings, to elevate the affections, to inspire the soul with devotion, "to call sinners to repentance," "to incite to love and to good works," to affect not merely the head, but the heart, also, and the hands, is, by no means, what they now wish to hear, whatever may be the case hereafter. But, brethren, shall the word be adulterated to suit their relish? No—give us the genuine provision of Zion, prepared as in the primitive times. What though some are unable to relish it as food? This shows that they are morally diseased. Let them partake of it as medicine. The truth of God is not only food to the healthy, but a "matchless sanative" to those that are sick. Hence it is called not merely bread, but "the bread of life." Give us this bread. Prepare for us such fare, and such only, as is calculated to satisfy a healthy appetite.—Thus shall the children receive that nourishment which shall cause them to "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Christ;" thus shall those "of full age" be strengthened and "established in every good word and work." And as for those, if there shall be any present, who are accustomed to different fare, and who "despise the riches of his goodness," we can not but hope that they may be induced to "take a little," and that if they shall but "taste that the Lord is good," his goodness thus received, will prove the means of correcting the perversity of their appetites, will "lead them to repentance," and ultimately bring them into "the love of the truth." And we bid all welcome to the feast thus described; (and surely it is good enough, for it is the best that is or can be;) but if there shall be any of the guests who are not disposed to partake of such as the family eat, why then, let them go without.

Done in behalf of the household of faith, by their brother and servant, PHILIP.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

QUARTERLY CONFERENCE
OF THE BLACK RIVER ASSOCIATION.

This body met according to previous appointment, at Denmark, on the 26th of December. United in prayer by Br. Aspinwall. Organized by choosing Br. R. Murray, Moderator, and J. A. Aspinwall, Clerk. Brs. French, Squire, and Myers, a committee of arrangement—Br. Aspinwall, to prepare an account of the proceedings, accompanied with such remarks as he deems proper, and forward them to the Magazine and Advocate for publication. Sermons were preached by Brs. Whelply, Sias, Aspinwall, and Waggoner.

We were cordially received by the brethren, and welcomely treated with every thing that could make our stay with them comfortable. There appears to be a zeal there, which, if continued can not fail to further the cause of free grace in that region. And we have reason to believe, that this meeting will long be remembered by many, if not all, as a means of enlivening the spirit of love to God and good will to men. After the services of Wednesday evening, a Conference, or Praise meeting, was held, which, from its rare occurrence in that vicinity, and the fervency of soul manifested by those engaged in the exercises, was highly interesting, and I believe, very generally acceptable to the audience. In the afternoon of the last day of the meeting, the solemnly interesting ordinance of the Eucharist was administered, of which many of the congregation partook. The services were concluded with appropriate addresses by Br. Waggoner. Per order.

J. A. ASPINWALL.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"Review of Rev. A. Royce's Sermons against Universalism, by Eli Ballou, Pastor of the Universalist Societies in Stow and Morristown, Vt."—pp. 48, 8vo.—These sermons of Mr. Royce, having been approbated by an association of self-called Orthodox preachers, was deemed worthy of notice solely on that account—and ably is the work done, so far as we have had leisure to peruse the work before us. The author has our thanks for the copy sent us.

"The Christmas Exercises of the Sunday School attached to the Orchard-street church in New-York."—Universalist Union Press—44 pp., 24mo., I presume. It shows that our New-York brethren understand how to make a Sunday school not only a means of improvement to the pupils, but a source of purest joy and delight. Children can not but love the Sunday school in which such exercises have a frequent occurrence.

"Scripture Lessons for Sunday schools," etc. Same press and size, 32 pp. Worthy of general adoption in our Sunday schools, together with the foregoing. May Br. Price find a large, and ready, and increasing demand for such publications!

Some other pamphlets on our table need a notice, but leisure will not now admit of it. A. B. G.

Br. J. S. is informed, that the postage on this paper is one cent and a half, if sent over one hundred miles and out of the State, which is the highest postage that the Law will allow to be charged on it. If any Postmaster exacts more, he violates his oath of office, and at least deserves to be removed.

HERALD SUBSCRIBERS are informed that we know nothing about their accounts with the Herald, previous to its union with the Magazine and Advocate.

Br. Bazin—Send Expositor to Squire Goff, Mendon, Monroe county, N. Y. The money is in our hands. G. AND H.

Br. Tompkins—Send Mrs. Silvia Couch, Hume, Allegheny county, N. Y., current volume Repository, and charge us $2. Also, credit Cyrus Kilburn, Lakeville, $2, for volume six, and charge us. G. AND H.

George Davis, formerly of Seneca Falls, now somewhere in Michigan, owes this office $2,50. Will some of our Michigan agents enquire him out and collect?

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TEACHINGS AND TENDENCIES.....NO. I.

BY REV. T. P. ABELL.

FILIAL TRUST.

Universalism recognizes the existence of God, and the justness of his claim upon the love of his sentient creatures. This is the very foundation of the doctrine. So far, at least, as concerns the being and perfections of the Supreme Ruler, and the bidden duties of his children to him, it bears—notwithstanding many would persuade us otherwise—no affinity to any one of the existing and numerous forms of infidelity. And our sequel will show whether, in its influence upon the heart and character, it has any practical results, other than those which flow directly from uncorrupted Christianity.

Filial trust, is the willing surrender to God, of our sincere and unreserved confidence. It is the unwavering dependence we place upon him for the bestowment of every good requisite to our well-being. It is the persuasive conviction we cherish of the righteousness and benevolence of his government, and of the ultimate entire execution of all his intentions concerning us. It is an inflexible reliance upon the watchfulness of his providence, and the unceasing and effective exercise of his boundless love.

And here we start the question—and the reader will acknowledge its importance—does Universalism, in its descriptions of the nature and character of God, afford any just and substantial grounds for the institution of this trust, or any incentive to superinduce its continued and rational activity? Does this doctrine hold forth any thing which would allure and secure the filial confidence of man, or any thing to support and give a steady and benign energy to its existence? Let us look for an answer.

More effectual inducements for establishing this trust, than those presented by Universalism, can not be brought to bear upon the human mind. They are of the most exalted and influential nature. Its views of God are the most sublime and the most salutary. None can be imagined which are more so. Whatever is lovely, and benevolent, and worthy of imitation, is ascribed to him. And all his attributes, and all his operations, and all his purposes are characterised by unequalled excellence, wisdom, and goodness. Every perfection of his nature, and every measure of his administration, and every revealed or palpable demonstration of each or either, is comprehended by this one familiar word, and resolvable into this one definite but divine principle—LOVE. Love is the essence of his being. And in addition to this, he is eternally unsubjected to the power of imitation. Nothing can change or vary the infinite Intellect, or thwart his wisdom, frustrate his will, or lessen his love. No years nor circumstance can do this. Ages on ages may pass, but God is the same. The burning sun may withhold his fervid heat—the moon sink—the stars fade—the sea dry up, and the earth roll away, but the great God shall remain unchanged, and his love inexhausted forever! What an imperishable basis is this for the confidence of man!

And then this Being, of whom the most glorious of all conceivable views are entertained, is the universal Father, whose paternal care extends over the vast and diversified empire of humanity, knowing no restrictions, no limits. And must not this sentiment give an impetus to, and perpetuate the filial reverence of the trustful disciple? Must it not increase the flame of confidence which has sprung up in his bosom? There is a doctrine—nay, I may not name it now. Even its very mention beglooms the heart; and it needs not the light of argument to discover its want of adaptation to the dependent condition of man, its inconsistency with a cheerful reliance upon God, and an humble trustfulness in his superintendence. But when it is recollected that this sentiment orphanises one-half of our race, and gives no hope of their future establishment in the enjoyment of the divine paternity, then it will be conceived how utterly inefficient is any system, other than that which leaves the grace of God unmanacled and universal, in eliciting and suitably nourishing the confiding affection of man for his "Father in heaven." It is Universalism alone which directs the pilgrim in his dependence and destitution, to God for strength and support. It is this doctrine only which can rightfully and properly call forth his trust, and cause him to rely with unsuspecting satisfaction upon the providence and the promises of the Almighty.

But this matter does not end here. Confidence in God, is not a bare subject of doctrinal discussion, or speculative thought. It is not something which is only connected with, and inseperable from the theory of religion. It is something more than this. It goes farther than the head—it reaches the heart and the habits. It flows from religious theory, and becomes a religious duty. It is cherished by the mind, and developed in the outward character. It chastens and cheers the heart, and adorns the practice. And it bears an imperative authority along with it. The reader of the Bible knows how often the demand is made for the unremitting observance of this duty. And the professed Universalist feels, that without the constant exercise of this trust, he falls far "short of the glory" of his adopted religion.—Throughout the whole life of the glorified Jesus, we find him relying implicitly upon his God. It was even thus, though endued with power without measure. And he was sustained in the hour of his sufferings. He was enabled to quaff the bitterest dregs of anguish. And he breathed a forgiving prayer, and yielded his spirit.

Let man, then, turn to his Maker, and tender to him his soul's truest trust. Is darkness and danger around him? In God there is light and strength. Is he buffeted by temptation? Let him seek succor of him who gives "grace to help in time of need." Has disease marked him for its victim? Let him guard well the moral health of his heart, and be prepared for each allotment of Heaven. Does he mourn for lost kindred? Confidence in Him "who ruleth over all," will afford the requisite comfort.

But this is not a mere duty of time-serving convenience. It is not to be observed by way of penance for sins past, or as a propitiatory sacrifice. It is not to be attended to as a matter of atonement, when, after being pulled by the pleasures of earth, care or sorrow corrodes and wastes the heart. This duty sets up a standing and continued claim. It asks an obedience, not in times of distress merely, but through the ever-varying seasons of life—in grief or joy, gloom or gladness, poverty or plenty—in the enjoyment of health, or on the couch of death. In every stage of being, and every change of condition, and every variation of fortune, should mortals remember their dependence upon God, and heed the exhortation, "Trust in him at all times."

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE HAPPY FAMILY.

A Juvenile Tale.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

CHAPTER I.

Introduction—the Family described—an Evening's Conversation—Something that should be practiced.

To write a tale that will please all little boys and girls, is a hard task. To do this, a writer must be acquainted with their different tastes. He must live among them. He must converse freely with them—attend them in their rambles in the shady groves, and through the green fields, and note every thing, though small, that interests them. Nothing but experience will enable him to please and instruct all his young readers. The present writer does not expect to do this. But if his youthful friends will give him their attention, he will tell them a story in a plain way, and strive to make it interesting and instructive to the most of them.

Mr. and Mrs. Norton were wealthy and pious people, living in the State of New-York. They had sailed from England, across the great ocean of waters, to America. The city of New-York was the place at which they landed from the ship that brought them over. From there they went back into the country, and settled in a very pretty village, on the border of a beautiful lake. They did not wish to live in a city—there was too much bustle—and, besides, they wished for retirement from a busy life. They wished to be away by themselves, as it were, that they might be at peace. And they could not have found a prettier spot than the one of which we have spoken, had they searched the wide world over.—Every thing about it pleased them. And here, as I have said, they settled down, and gave up nearly the whole of their time and attention to the instruction of their children. They had but two—George and Adeline. George was ten, and Adeline was eight years of age.

I said that Mr. and Mrs. Norton were pious people. I mean by this, that they loved God because he first loved us; that they cherished our Saviour's religion in their hearts; were good to the poor and the sick; that they felt pity for the suffering and the afflicted, and were merciful and forgiving to those who would wrong or injure them in any way. And then they were such kind parents—watching so affectionately as they did over their children, and striving so constantly to keep them pure and free from the vice and wickedness that was in the world. Their's was an example for all fathers and mothers to imitate.

George and Adeline loved their parents—and how could they help loving them, when they were so kind, so tender, and so affectionate? And they loved one another. They never quarreled, nor got angry at each other, as many brothers and sisters do. Parents often pointed them out to their children, as patterns for them to copy after. They were so kind, and good-natured, and peaceful, that every body liked them. And they were always striving to learn something that would be useful to them. When their parents were not busy, they would inquire of them concerning those things that were important—and their questions were always kindly answered.

"Father," said George, one Summer's evening, as the family were sitting on the piazza, and looking up into the sky, and talking of the moon and stars that were shining so brightly there—"Father, what did God make the moon of?" Now, George had been taught that God made all things—the blue sky, and the green earth—plants, trees, animals—the silvery moon, and the twinkling stars. And he had learned of what the earth was made; but he had never been told of what the moon was made.

"The moon, son, is made of the same as this earth on which we live; it is a world like our own."

"Why, father!" exclaimed Adeline, "James Graham told George and me, the other day, that the moon was made of brass, and that it was no bigger than a tin pan."

"And many men," replied the father with a smile, "have just such notions. They can not see how the moon should be a world. And it is because they do not try to learn. Men of great learning tell us, that the moon, in many respects, is like this earth; that people live on the moon; that there are mountains there, and lakes, and rivers, and oceans. It is said that a certain man, with an instrument called a telescope, has discovered all these things."

"And why should it not be so?" said Mrs. Norton. "It can not be that God made the moon merely to be looked and wondered at. The very thought would be to doubt his wisdom."

"And the stars, are they worlds too?" asked George.

"Certainly, my son," replied the father, "or suns like that which shines on us every day."

"And are they as large as the world we live on?" inquired Adeline.

"Many of them, and some even an hundred times larger."

"Oh, how great they must be!" exclaimed George and Adeline.

"And yet many can hardly believe this," continued Mr. Norton, "especially many little boys and girls. Their parents have never taught them that it was so. I once knew a little girl, that thought the stars were gimblet holes in the sky, to let the glory of God or heaven shine through. But she probably learned better, as she grew older."

The little party were now told by Mrs. Norton, that the hour for retiring had come. The evening's conversation ceased, and they all entered the house, After uniting in the exercises of family devotion, and George and Adeline had sung an evening hymn, they retired to rest.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. Grosh, Editor; A. R. Bartlett, Assistant Editor.
G. W. Montgomery, E. H. Chapin, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1839.

CHRISTIAN TRAITS AND DUTIES....NO II.

THE WEEPING SOWER.—CONTINUED.

Of all the systems or principles bearing upon the interests and happiness of mankind, the Christian religion is certainly the most powerful and important. But dark was the seed-time of the Gospel! We look back to the little band of apostles as they went out from "the great Teacher," and how affecting, how sublime is the sight! They were not going forth to subdue nations, (at least, with carnal weapons,) to lead forth captives, or to gather trophies from the tomb and the temple. There would have been no originality in such an attempt. Conquerors had been before them, and the earth was scathed with battle. The Lydian and the Mede, the Persian and the Greek, had swept by, each in his day of triumph, and now, the mighty Roman had taken hold of the pillars of the world, and reared his thrones, and set his dominion, in the empires of ages; and there was not a bard in the land of poesy, but could have told them of glittering hosts, and places of blood, and warrior-sepulchres, and given them the dirges of widows and of orphans, for the thousands of the fallen! They were not teachers of some new speculative theory—some philosophy of their own invention—nor were they about to go forth into the porch, or the grove, or behind the veil, and deliver their proud wisdom like the teachings of the oracle.—Zeno, and Epicurus, and Pythagoras, had done this, and that was an age of speculation, when the restless world was continually eager "for some new thing."—No! their's was a mission more glorious than these—a mission to bless the benighted race of man. The world was waiting for that wisdom which they went forth to reveal. Philosophy vainly strove to discover the mystery of death, and feebly grasped at immortality, and poetry, with its yearning thought unsatisfied with the things of earth, stood leaning upon its lyre, and looking abroad into the great illimitable, for truth—while in the material and the outward, the worshipper sought his religion, and the flame of the altar, and the red blood of the sacrifice, were, to him, the manifestations of its power. And to these they come to reveal the light, and life, and spirituality of the Gospel. They come, to open the prison-doors and to break the shackles of the captive. They come, to preach the doctrines of the true God, the future life and the great salvation—to proclaim glad tidings to the people! And there they stand, around the meek and lowly Nazarene! Trials are before them—persecutions, perils, deaths!—and yet they will go forth. They are indeed few, and illy adapted, in point of numbers, to contend with hosts, and achieve triumphs. And yet, their warfare is a sterner one than that of the mailed warrior with his eagles. They are to humble haughty intellect in its robes of learning, and to work a moral revolution in the great mass of corruption and of error. And they will triumph!—And not alone in the halls of palaces, and beneath the lofty domes of temples, will be their victory. Oh no! In the huts of the lowly, and on the sands of the sea-shore, and on the breezy mountain-top, will they convert men to the truth, and in the great harvest-field of the world, they will reap their glory and their joy!

But gloomy and perilous, reader, was the seed-time of our blessed religion. Through many trials did those early sowers pass. The Gentile was their foe, and the Jew was bitter in his enmity. The Epicurean mocked, and the Stoic sneered. The persecutor denounced, and the tyrant slew. The flame wreathed bright above the faggot, and the blood flowed red from the rack. The shrieks of the helpless and the innocent thrilled amid the valleys and rocks, and the columns of the imperial city grew ghastly, in the glare of a horrid and unnatural torch-light.* The edicts of kings were against them. Their homes were the mountain-cave and the desert place, from which the hand of the pursuer dragged them forth to die! The rack tore them with exquisite torture, and the wild beast in the ring was their destroyer. Oh, then, dark was that seed-time! In tears were the precious germs scattered abroad; and forth they went, weeping, and committed them to the soil!

But look now how that little leaven has worked in the great mass! The Briton, the Goth, the Dane, have abolished their idols, and yielded to that blessed power. And climes that were then unknown—where the savage roamed benighted, where the forest brooded with its shadow of ages, where the panther and the wild fox made their lairs, have been cheered with its light and have yielded to its renovating influence. The spires of innumerable temples glitter where the forest stood, and the words of prayer and the strains of praise, go up, where the Indian wandered, and where the wild beast prowled and battened on blood!

And what is the seed yet to produce? Oh! it is to to generate in every heart the fruits of peace and righteousness. It is to send up the blooming and universal harvest—its golden sheaves are to be commensurate with humanity! And who shall say, that the songs of rejoicing which announce that "harvest-home," will not burst from the lips of those who have labored, and wept, and prayed, and suffered, here below, when darkness, and peril, and death, were around them!

Reader, in view of these things, at which we have glanced—in view of how others have acted in the cause of truth, of humanity, of God—what do we learn from the simile of the weeping sower? Is there no truth we would promulgate—no reformation which we would establish—no principle which we would exhibit to the world? If there is, our duty is made clear to us. The truth we would promulgate, of course we are acquainted with, and, therefore, possessed of it, and he who is possessed of truth, is bound by all the means in his power, to publish it abroad. Are there difficulties to contend with? We say, go forth with your "precious seed," even though it may be with weeping. But remember one thing—opposition to a cause, and persecution, are no criteria of the truth of that cause. Let not, then, the only reason why you labor be, because you are persecuted, nor judge of the truth of your system or principle, by that persecution. Neither seek to excite opposition, nor rush into needless peril. These things become not especially the Christian sower. Study to know, and act from a conviction of duty, and then leave consequences to God.

Patriot, Philanthropist, Christian! Speed, then, in thy course. Address thyself manfully to thy work. And amid discouragement, persecution and peril, let this truth cheer thee on—"He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall, doubtless, come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."

E. H. C.

*After the great conflagration of the city of Rome, which took place A. D. 64, Nero, himself suspected of being the incendiary, cruelly put to death a number of Christians as being guilty of the deed.—"To their sufferings, Nero added mockery and derision.—Some were covered with the skins of wild beasts, and left to be devoured by dogs; others were nailed to the cross; numbers were burnt alive, and many, covered over with inflammable matter, were lighted up, when the day declined, to serve as torches during the night."—Murphy's Annals of Tacitus, Book xv, Sect. 44. See, also, Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, chap. xvi.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. I.

SHEOL.

The field of truth which will now be explored, is, the word hell, as it occurs in the Old Testament, that we may arrive at a correct understanding of the different shades of meaning in its various applications. We shall then,

1. Endeavor to ascertain the primitive meaning of the word Sheol, from which the word hell, in the Old Testament is derived.

2. To ascertain its figurative usage, and apply that usage in the interpretation of several portions of the divine word.

1. Let us turn our attention to the word sheol. In striving to point out its original signification, there are some influential authorities to which we shall allude with a great degree of satisfaction, because they are highly valued in the theological world, and were not believers in the "Restitution of all things."

On the word sheol, which is rendered by the English words grave and hell, Prof. Stuart remarks—"there can be no reasonable doubt, that sheol does most generally mean the under world, the grave or sepulchre, the world of the dead, in the Old Testament Scriptures."...."In regard to most of the cases in which they have rendered the word hell, it may be doubted whether they meant thereby the world of future torment." Ex. Essays, p. 93. Mr. Horne, in his Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures, remarks, that sheol signifies the grave or state of the dead. Vol. i. p. 570. Dr. George Campbell, affirms that sheol "signifies the state of the dead in general, without regard to the goodness or badness of the persons, their happiness or misery." 6th Prelim. Diss., p. 181. Whitby says—"Sheol, throughout the Old Testament, and Hades in the Septuagint, answering to it, signify not the place of punishment, or of the souls of bad men only, but the grave only, or the place of death." Thus we have four individuals of eminent talent and ardent research, who declare that this word means the state of the dead in general, without regard to character, and that it ought not to be understood as a place of future punishment. This position is clear; and when we take into consideration the fact, that the word sheol is rendered both grave and hell in the Old Testament, we can refer to passages which undoubtedly substantiate the position.

After the brethren of Joseph had sold him as a slave, they deceived their father, by dipping his coat of many colors in the blood of a kid, and declaring that some wild beast had torn him in pieces. In the extremity of his sorrow, the patriarch exclaimed, "I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning." Gen. xxxvii: 35. In this instance, the word sheol, which is here translated grave, has no reference to a place of future punishment, but is evidently used by an afflicted old man in reference to a death, which sorrow for the loss of a favorite son would bring upon him. After Joseph had been exalted in Egypt, and had sent his brethren back to their country to bring down Benjamin to him, the patriarch refused, saying, "my son shall not go down with you: for his brother is dead, and he is left alone; if mischief befall him by the way in which ye go, then shall ye bring down my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave." Gen. xliii: 38. Here the same idea is again expressed—that if he should lose his darling Benjamin in addition to the supposed death of Joseph, it would bring him to death by extreme sorrow. This idea is again expressed in the 44th chapter of Genesis, where the request to let Benjamin go, was again urged upon the old man. When that extraordinary prophet, Samuel, was born, Hannah, in her song of joy, said, "The Lord killeth and maketh alive; and he bringeth down to the grave and bringeth up."—

1 Sam. ii: 6. That is, God can not only bring persons to the shades of death, but he has also power to restore those thus brought down, to life again. Job in his affliction, said, "As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away; so he that goeth down to the grave, shall come up no more." vii: 9. Again, in the extremity of his distress, he said, "O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave." xiv: 13. "If I wait, the grave is mine house; I have made my bed in darkness; I have said to corruption, thou art my father; to the worm, thou art my mother and sister." xvii: 13, 14. Now, if in these last two quotations, we view the word sheol as meaning a place of future punishment, we must at once see that the pious Job expected to endure it, for he declared that sheol, grave or hell was his house. But when we look upon it as the grave, or the state of the dead, the matter appears consistent; for the distress of Job led him to desire the grave as a place where the weary are at rest.

There is another fact in regard to this subject, which is important—the whole human family must go into sheol. David says, "what man is he that liveth, and shall not see death? shall he deliver his soul (or life) from the hand of the grave?" Ps. xlviii: 89. Solomon says, "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest." Eccl. ix: 10. Isaiah says, "For the grave can not praise thee; death can not celebrate thee; they that go down into the pit can not hope for thy truth." xxxviii: 18.

Now if we summon all these truths together—viz., that Jacob thought that sorrow for his son would bring him to sheol; that man goeth down to sheol like the cloud; that Job declared it was his house and desired to go there; that all men go there with the same degree of certainty that all men die in Adam; it will at once be seen, that sheol literally means the state of the dead in general, without any regard to their character, goodness or badness. This is its literal signification.

But, it must be evident, that sheol is also figuratively used to express the punishment which falls upon wicked men. It is a fact too well known to need the citation of proof, that throughout the Scriptures, death is used to denote the degradation of sinners. Sheol is exhibited in the same manner; and in such cases it is translated hell; not, indeed, in the modern notions of that term, for Campbell and Whitby are express in affirming that sheol can have no such meaning as is generally affixed to the term hell. I know not what better figure could be used to denote the condition of sinners on earth—for, how well their moral state, and the covering up of their happiness in sin, is set forth in the darkness and gloom of sheol.

2. We shall now proceed to prove its figurative application, and show how it can be used in the interpretation of passages. In a song of David, recorded in 2 Sam. xxii: 6, he said, "the sorrows of hell compassed me about; the snares of death prevented me." The same idea is expressed in the 116th Psalm, "the sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell gat hold upon me; I found trouble and sorrow." But David was delivered from this hell, for he says, "great is thy mercy towards me; for thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell. Ps. lxxxvi: 13. The truth thus set forth is clear. David was in deep distress because of transgression—but from this state of sinful degradation, low as it could be, he was delivered on repentance, by the mercy of God. In this case, we discover how sheol, grave or hell, is used to prefigure the pains of transgression. Speaking of the omnipresence of God, David says, "if I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there." Ps. cxxxix: 8. If we suppose the grave is intended in this passage, it is made much more beautiful, than if we affirm he meant a place of future punishment—"if I make my bed in hell," the grave, "where the weary are at rest," even that can not hide me from thee, for thou hast power over the grave, for by the prophet hast thou said, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave: I will redeem them from death; O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, (or hell,) I will be thy destruction; repentance shall be hid from mine eyes." Hos. xiii: 14. After Jonah had been swallowed by the fish, and repented him of his wicked conduct, he said, "Out of the belly of hell cried I, and thou heardest my voice." ii: 2. In this case, the figurative use of sheol is most clearly seen. He was in darkness and distress; in the shadows of destruction. And so convinced were the translators, that the word hell here means grave, or the state of the dead, that they put grave in the margin.—These passages then, show that the word hell, in the Old Testament, at least, denotes temporal calamities as the result of transgression, while we shall find it to be a truth, that in no instance is the figure used to denote endless pain. We now proceed to apply this established fact to certain passages of an interesting character.

1. "For a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains." Deut xxxii: 22. Just before the Israelites entered the promised land, Moses called them together, and again brought before them the whole teaching of the law, in connexion with other instructions, among which is the chapter from which this passage is taken. This chapter contains a wonderful prophecy of the final destruction of the Jewish nation, when, for turning from Jehovah, his anger was to burn unto the lowest hell. By referring to the context, it will be seen that the phrase "lowest hell," means the greatest extreme of punishment. "I will heap mischiefs upon them, and will spend mine arrows upon them. They shall be burnt with hunger, and devoured with burning heat, and with bitter destruction; I will also send the teeth of beasts upon them, with the poison of the serpents of the dust. The sword without, and terror within, shall destroy both the young man and the virgin, the suckling and the man of grey hairs." Verses 23, 24, 25. This destruction was so bitter as to be the lowest hell, or the greatest extent of suffering—a fact in perfect keeping with what our Saviour said of the same event; "for then shall be great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be." Matt. xxiv: 21. From these facts, we think it clear to all, that the phrase "lowest hell" had reference to the calamities which fell upon the Jews at their final overthrow, for Moses was speaking of the descendants of the Jews who stood before him, and none others.

2. "For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine holy one to see corruption."—Ps. xvi: 10. This language is quoted by the apostle Peter, in the second of Acts, and applied to our Saviour. No person can suppose that our Saviour went to a place of future pain, for this would be contrary to every proper sense of truth. But, understand grave, or state of the dead, by the word hell, and the matter is clear. The Father of love, when his Son was crucified and had descended into the shades of sheol, did not leave him there; but in the greatness of his own almighty power, raised him from the dead, brought him up from the grave to erect the banners of immortality upon the imperishable walls of Christianity, as a joy to the soul, and an anchor of hope, which can never be riven from its fastening, except when the mind shall no longer need anticipation, but shall be moored to the throne of God forever, in endless knowledge.

3. There are some other passages, a mere allusion to which, will show their correct meaning. When David was speaking of false friends, he said, "Let death seize upon them, and let them go down quick into hell; for wickedness is in their dwellings and among them."—Ps. lv: 15. If the word hell here means ceaseless pain, David must have had an iron soul, indeed, to pray that the wicked might not only go there, but go there quickly, and at the same time be a man after God's own heart. The translators have expressed their opinion, by putting grave in the margin—"let them go down quick into the grave." This language is not a prayer, but a simple fact stated, that death seizes upon the wicked, and that quickly, suddenly, and prematurely their transgressions bring them to the grave.

Solomon, speaking of a lewd woman, says, "her feet go down to death, her steps take hold on hell."—Prov. v: 5. The word death, in the first part, explains the word hell in the last part—her steps, her conduct lead to an early grave, in all the fulness of ignominy and shame. In another place, he says, "her house is the way to hell," a statement which he explains by the rest part of the verse, "going down to the chambers of death."—vii: 27. "Her guests are in the depths of hell."—ix: 18. Such a course of licentiousness is not only the way to moral death, but to a sinful end and premature destruction in the shades of sheol.

In the 28th of Isaiah, to the sinful city it was said—"Wherefore hear the word of the Lord, ye scornful men, that rule this people which is in Jerusalem; because ye have said, we have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us; for we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves."—xiv: 15. In the time of our Saviour, he threatened Jerusalem with destruction—but its people thought that no scourge would ruin them—they had made an agreement with death and the grave, by the notion that they were the favorite children of God, and nothing could harm them. But God had written—"Your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then shall ye be trodden down by it."—18. When the desolating scourge of the Roman power fell upon Palestine, the covenant of the Jews was annulled, for their safety was gone, and they were swept away like bubbles upon the flood, and scattered over the whole earth.

There are a few other instances in which the word hell occurs in the Old Testament; but it will not be necessary to refer to them, (with the exception of one,) because their application is so clear as to admit of no mistake to the mind that reflects upon what it reads. There is one instance, however, of a different complexion from those already quoted, which presents a new aspect to the whole affair. Even admitting that hell in the Old Testament, means a place of future endless pain, a passage can be produced to prove that God takes people out of hell to punish them, while the common notion is, that they go there to be punished. "Though they dig into hell, thence shall mine hand take them, though they climb up to heaven, thence will I bring them down.... ..thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them."—Amos ix: 2, 3. The fact here exhibited, is contrary to the idea of a place of pain—but take it on the ground that it means the grave, which could not hide the wicked from the power of God, and all is clear to the understanding.

4. We come now to the passage already alluded to as an exception—"the wicked shall be turned into hell, with all the nations that forget God."—Ps. ix: 17. It has been shown, by competent testimony, that sheol means the state of the dead in general, without reference to the goodness or the badness of the persons; in support of which, a number of passages were brought. It has also been shown, that sheol is used figuratively to denote darkness of mind in the graves of sin, and a number of passages brought, in which it is so used. For David said, while alive and in the flesh, that the pains of hell gat hold of him; from which he was delivered even before he died. What possible reason, then, have we for supposing that the word sheol in Ps. ix: 17, has any other reference than to temporal tribulation? Sure am I, that there are abundant illustrations to show that such is its meaning. Take it in both senses, that it means the state of the dead literally, and moral darkness figuratively, and it is perfectly true, that sinful individuals and nations do experience distress, and premature death—for, not only are we informed, that tribulation and anguish cometh upon every one that doeth evil, but that "the years of the wicked are shortened," (Prov. x: 27,) "bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days."—Ps. lv: 23. As illustrations of that punishment of which the gloom of death is a most striking figure, the cases of Cain, of Saul, and of David, are to the point; and of a premature turning into sheol. Haman, Absalom, Judas, Ananias and Sapphira, are full exhibitions.

When David declared that the nations which forgot God should be turned into sheol, he uttered a scriptural and political truth, which history and facts fully sustain. No matter what the nation is, if it forgets the voice of right and of virtue—if it falls into vice, venal corruption and iniquity, its days of glory are numbered—its end is nigh, and it is swept away into the darkness of death—into the tombs of forgotten greatness, with all that made it exalted in the annals of the world. It is an awful truth, that the power of God comes upon that people who are reckless of moral right, and turns or casts them into sheol prematurely, and blots them from remembrance. This is the hell into which nations that forget God are cast, which we shall now proceed to show in a few notable instances.

In ancient times, the Jews, that headstrong and rebellious people, forgot the God of their fathers, turned away from his precepts and commandments, to gratify their sinful hearts in evil-doing. For thus conducting, they were turned into the very hell in which David was cast, when he said, "the pains of hell gat hold of me." Nebuchadnezzar came upon them, destroyed their city, and carried them away to Babylon in seventy years' captivity. While they were in this condition, the prophet Ezekiel represented them as being dead in graves, and their restoration to Palestine at some future period, was prefigured by a resurrection from those graves. Who can say that their darkness of condition, their sorrow while away from home, their servitude to a foreign people, is not well called being turned into hell?—the gloom of a state of the dead itself! They must have themselves thus thought, for they touchingly mourned their condition in a beautiful psalm. "By the rivers of Babylon there we sat down; yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof. For they that carried us away captive, required of us a song; and they that wasted us, required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion. How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land? If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning."—Ps. cxxxvii: 1 to 5. This language shows us their condition, their distress, their mournful state, which taught them, that as a nation forgetting God, they were cast into hell.

In more modern times they again forgot God—they made his law null and void through their own traditions—they approached him with lip-service, when their hearts were far from him—they rejected his Son, entreated him most shamefully, and to crown the whole of their double and treble wickedness, they murdered him. Their ingratitude and its punishment, had long been foretold and treasured up in the archives of prophecy, while their destruction was thus set forth. "A fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell."—Deut. xxxii: 22. This exactly agrees with the declaration, "the nations that forget God" "shall be turned into hell." What this hell is, we are expressly told—it is hunger and burning heat, the sword without and the sword within. This so clearly corresponds with their destruction, that it can not be mistaken. Our Saviour, when weeping over Jerusalem, said, "For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee around, and keep thee in on every side—and they shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee, and they shall not leave thee one stone upon another."—Luke xix: 43, 44. In the power which fell upon them, they found their punishment—hunger and thirst consumed them; while Christ affirms in the 21st chapter of Luke, that "they should fall by the edge of the sword, and should be led away captive into all nations." In their overthrow, the obliteration of their national existence, in the scattering them over the whole earth, in the deep, unceasing persecution which fell upon the Jews, was found the hell into which they were turned. And where is the person who reflects upon the mourning condition of Zion, and the forlornness of her exile sons and daughters, but can see in sheol, grave, or hell, one of the most striking figures of their condition and punishment!

There is another case which clearly illustrates the passage under consideration. Our Saviour said of a city, "and thou Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shalt be thrust down to hell." Luke x: 15. By observation, we shall at once discover the character of this hell. "Which art exalted unto heaven." It can not be supposed that Capernaum was ever in heaven. But it was exalted in pride and prosperity. Of this state, the heavens were a most excellent figure. So sheol, hades, grave or hell, the gloom of the state of the dead, is as equally striking a figure of her debasement—as she had been high in pride, she was to be thrust down to destruction. In the Roman war, she was so thoroughly rooted up and her people scattered, that her place knew her no more.

But in all the world, it is a truth that every nation forsaking the bonds of virtue, are hurried into sheol, or their national lives are cut short at noon. Stand on the spot where Babylon once existed with her hanging gardens, her massy walls, and her millions; with a tide of wealth flowing into her gates, like the waters of the Euphrates which poured through the centre of the city—stand there, and ask, what hasted her ruin and death? And a voice will come from the tombs of nations, declaring that she was weighed in the balance of virtue and found wanting; that for running into excess and indulgence, she was cast into sheol, and utterly swept from existence. Go and stand on the famous land where Greece flourished in all her arts, painting and sculpture—the land of heroes and philosophers—the place where Paul preached the unsearchable riches of Christ—the scene of battles, of councils and feasting; and ask what has swept that land of all her greatness! She turned from virtue, and was hurried into sheol. The Egyptians, who in ancient seasons, were the depositories of all learning; whose kings could erect the lofty pyramids; the ruins of whose cities even now strike the traveller with wonder and amazement; when they became vicious, were driven away to destruction. Go and stand by the banks of the Tiber, and ask what has become of that mighty Rome, once called mistress of the world; whose empire was almost universal, and whose power reached from Britain to the deserts; where is she, with her monuments, her statesmen, her orators, her warriors? Vice crept into her borders; she forgot the hardihood of her fathers, and was driven in sheol; and she lives now but upon the page of the historian.

These facts illustrate the passage before us—they show the destruction which falls upon those who forget God, and set forth the fate of sinful nations. And they stand as warning to nations now in existence, to keep their institutions pure, to purge out all sin, and wear the habiliments of virtue. Let a people become nationally vicious, and you may as certainly prophecy their downfall, as Ezekiel could warn Babylon of her fate. Let America be wise; and let her remember, that the nation which forgets God will be driven to destruction.

Having thus passed over the important passages of the Old Testament, it must be evident, we think, that no proof from the word sheol, or hell, can be urged in favor of endless pain—on the contrary, it relates to facts which come within the observation of man, and transpire on the earth. We rest satisfied that this is the true conclusion of the whole matter—and that the more the Old Testament is examined in reference to this word, the more this position will be sustained and confirmed, to the satisfaction of every individual. G. W. M.

REPLY TO BR. WHITTEMORE.

A reply to Br. Whittemore's remarks on Christ as the cause of salvation, has been unavoidably crowded out this week, but will appear in our next. After that, his long article on the worship of Christ, with a few remarks in reply, will be given.

The discussion of these subjects has called forth several other brethren in the Trumpet, all of whom will, in due time, be attended to. Br. M. H. Smith first came to the aid of Br. Whittemore, but rather lauded Br. W.'s eloquence, than shed any light upon the subject in dispute.—Br. B. Whittemore comes out in the last Trumpet, agreeing with my remarks, and showing, (as is now true,) that there is no difference between Br. Thomas Whittemore and myself in opinion as to the kind of worship offered to Christ—and Br. Balfour is out with an excellent article replying to mine on the phrase "For the sake of Jesus," in connection with a request for my opinions on several other subjects. I suspect our Scotish brother has me "on the hip," but have not yet had leisure to examine, or rather re-examine, the subject fully enough to reply either way. As to his call for my views on the other topics, I will answer them under their respective heads, as soon as leisure will permit.

Amicable and candid discussion of these subjects can do no harm, and may do good; but I deprecate all discussion for the mere sake of victory—to see who can excel the other party in quibbles, evasions, misrepresentations, and ingenuity in making his own side appear best whether right or wrong. If I know myself, and if phrenologists say true, my combativeness is not so excessive as some of my eastern brethren seem to imagine, so that I think I can discuss these questions with a full purpose to be as generous, candid and frank as any of them.—But we will see. A. B. G.

CHANGE—REMOVAL.

Br. T. D. Cook assumed the pastoral charge of the society in this city last Sunday, and commenced a course of evening lectures on special subjects, on which we especially invite the attendance of all inquirers after Scriptural knowledge and truth—particularly among the opposers of Universalism. The subject for next Sunday evening is, the phrases "kingdom of heaven," and the "kingdom of God." Our friends seem much pleased and animated with the prospects before them, and it is hoped and believed that the connexion thus formed will be lasting, honorable and highly useful to pastor and people. God grant it!

By the bye—Why do not our publishers and others address all letters and papers intended for Br. Cook, to this city, instead of Gaines?

Br. M. B. Smith removes to Salisbury Centre, Herkimer county, next week, and wishes all letters and papers to be addressed accordingly. May he bless and be blessed by and in his highly useful labors. A. B. G.

Union please copy.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. M. B. Smith, at Madison, and at Oriskany Falls in the evening.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. Guild, at the Inn kept by Mr. Roman, in Maryland, at 11 o'clock, A. M.; (subject Luke xii: 4 5:) and at the Academy in Worcester, in the evening—Br. H. B. Soule, at Smithville Flats, and at Smithville in the evening—Br. T. J. Smith, in Oxford, and Br. J. T. Goodrich, in East Richfield—Br. M. B. Smith, at Middleville.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. Guild, in the school-house near Peter Hanson's, in Meredith, at 10 o'clock, A. M., and in the Cade school-house, in Davenporte, at 2 o'clock—Br. M. B. Smith, at Salisbury Corners—Br. Delong, at Howlet Hill.

Br. J. T. Goodrich, will preach in New-Berlin village, on Tuesday evening, January 22d.

Br. E. E. Guild, will preach at Richmondville, on the evenings of Monday and Tuesday, February 11th and 12th.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

H B, McLean, for self, H R, J S and P S—J S, Dayton, (Ills) for self, J B J and C J—A B, Norwalk, (O) for self, W D, S P, J C and S B—P M, Ann Arbor, (Mich) for self and B H D—[illegible], Newburg, (Ills) for self, C P D and J D—P M, Birmingham, (O) for J McH, S B and F P—A W B, Medina, (O) for self, A P, J [illegible] H S M, A O, I V D, W K, R H, I R H, T S and I B—A M, Mislev[illegible] for self, C M, B M, W D and A H L—P M, Geneva, (O) [illegible] E F, Olean, for self, W F, and F A P—J S, Summerl[illegible] J G, Canandaigua, for self, A B and J B N—P M, Grif[illegible] O T and D S—P M, Clarendon, for O B and E L—C L, F[illegible]ville, (Pa) for L H and B S—C G Howard, for A J B—H C, West Edmeston—A K, Knoxville, (Pa) for J W—Rev J W, Akron, (O) for R R F—J L, Eagle village, (In) for self, J L, M L and D M L—P M, Kendall, for self and T A—P M, Pembroke, for J L B—H H, South Onondaga, for E C, Z T, G A P, J F C and J H—A C, Preble, for R M B, I S, A G A, O C and R T—P M, Otego, for W T—P M, Depauville, for self and I S—Rev M L W, Bath, for H H and Z B—R B, Alden, for self, E P and P A—P M, Centre Cataioharie, for S C and B G—P M, Ames, for A H, L K, S H P, M P, A M and R M—J B, W Harpersfield, for self, P M, A B W and H G—D S, Hobart, for self, J J and D O—P M, Phenix, for H M—J P Jr. Wheely, for self, A L, J M L and N B—L A, Marcellus—E M [illegible]penhagen, for J R, P R, J H and A T—S B W, Cobleskill, f[illegible] H S, J S and A W—Rev M R, Lansingburg, for W [illegible] D—B H, Adams Centre—J F, West Henrietta, for se[illegible]—P M, Fultonham—Rev J K, Clinton for A P—P M, Adrian, (M[illegible] for H C—A R S, Utica, (Mich) for A G D, H O and P [illegible] Salem—Rev I B S, Hume, for self, S C and C K—Rev J L, Bo[illegible] for W H, J M, W E, I E, C N, G B, A L C, A S and P L—[illegible] Manchester—T B, Clayton—A S, Brownville, for Rev J [illegible] M and H D—P M, Caledonia, for I B and H H—M W D, B[illegible] P M, Truxton, for E R—P M, Nichols, for G W S, D P, M M S B and S S—A A, Oswego, for self and S I—P M, Pultneyville, for A W—P M, Jamesville, for G W—J R B, China—Rev T C E, Macedonia—B K, Tipton, (Mich) for G B, D W M, E K, J A L, G W A, and O B—P S S, Allensville, (In) for J H, E B and C H—P M, Hartford, (Pa) for F S, T T, E T, S M, J B S and G M S—P M, Madison, (O) for self and D S—H C, Kingston, (U C) for self and R H—L I, Guilford—J B, Corthandville, for self and H H—D N B, De Ruyter, for self, G K and J B—Rev W S, Proctorville, (Vt) for R McC and W W—P M, Albrights, (N C)—P M, Salem, (O) for W W, E W and J W. [Remainder next week.]

POETRY.

The following hymn, adapted to the tune named "Palestine," was sung at Clinton, on Christmas Eve, after a discourse by the Rev. Dr. Clowes, from the text, Luke ii: 15. "Let us now go even unto Bethlehem."

For the Magazine and Advcoate.

CHRISTMAS HYMN.

BY MISS LOUISA M. BARKER.

O! green be the wreath, for the altar, to night,
And rich be the offering we bring:
And pure be our hearts, in the song to unite,
Which the angels have taught us to sing.

For we hallow the hour, when the seraphs proclaimed,
The long promised Saviour below,
And the shepherds of Judah in wonder exclaimed,
"Let us even to Bethlehem go."

And though we may not kneel, on the land of his birth,
With the sky of the angels above;
We know, the fair hills, and green valleys of earth,
Have been trod by the Saviour we love.

We know, that for us, who the promise believe,
Is the gift that he came to bestow;
And in faith, the pure water of life to receive,*
"We will even to Bethlehem go."

* "And David longed and said, oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate." 2 Sam. xxiii: 15.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ON AN INFANT.

BY MISS MARY M. HAMILTON.

saw a beauteous infant flower,
Blooming upon its parent stem;
A holy radiance seemed to pour
Its light upon this brilliant gem.

I saw a parent, tender, dear,
Around its pillow watchful move,
While in her eye there beam'd a tear—
A tear of deep, unearthly love.

I smiled when I the cherub view'd,
And thought its soul would never die,
But, should it live, would be imbued
With heavenly wisdom from on high.

Or should it die, the soul enshrined,
Would find a happier home than now;
Would seek above a purer clime
Than this dark, dreary world below.

Again I saw that tearful eye,
'Twas downward cast, towards the earth,—
For 'neath the sod that form did lie,
That once to fondest hopes gave birth.

And can it be that we must part
With such dear objects of our love?
Oh Heaven! inspire the weeping heart
With patient meekness from above.

Georgetown, Madison county.

INSTRUCTIVE EXTRACTS.

Sin.—"The punishment of Cain, given up to the tortures of a guilty mind, was greater than he could bear, and the spectre of John the Baptist, haunted the bed chamber of Herod, long after the tomb had become to that martyr a bed of repose. Who was it, think you, that anticipated the prophet in interpreting the hand writing of Belshazzar, and smote the sacrilegious wretch with trembling? Why did Galerius relent on his death bed? And what made Caligula afraid when it thundered? It was conscience, who, startled by danger from her slumbers, then shook her terrific sceptre and uttered her monitory voice."—Nott's Addresses, pp. 34, 35.

Virtue.—"However the multitude might live, for my single self I would act uprighily; I would frown on vice; I would favor virtue—favor whatever would elevate, would exalt, would adorn the character, and alleviate the miseries of my species, or contribute to render the world I inhabited, like the heavens to which I looked, a place of innocence and felicity. Though all mankind were profligate, I would, by a uniform course of probity and integrity, show in what school I had been nurtured, and to what faith I belonged. And I would do this, because I would rather stand alone, or be pointed at, among only those ten righteous men who would have saved Sodom, than swell the number of my companions by all the vagabond profligates that could be raked from the sewers of earth, or collected from the caverns of hell. Even though there were no God; no immortality; no accountability, I would do this. Vice in itself is mean, degrading, detestable. Virtue commendable, exalting, ennobling. Though I were to exist no longer than those ephemera that sport in the beams of the Summer's morn—during that short hour, I would rather soar with the eagle and leave the record of my flight, and of my fall, among the stars, than to creep the gutter with the reptile, and bed my memory and body together in the dunghill. However short my part, I would act it well, that I might surrender my existence without disgrace, and without compunction."—Nott's Addresses, pp. 123, 124. Selected by G. W. M.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 3d inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. DELOS SMITH, to Mrs. RHODA PEASE, both of Floyd.

In Lee, on the 18th of December, by Rev. D. Biddlecom, Mr. NELSON WENTWORTH, to Miss CATHARINE BARBER.

In Barre, October 18th, 1838, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. SAMUEL D. SMITH, of Iona, Mich., to Miss OLIVE SMITH, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Rochester, on the 7th of November, of consumption, Mrs. SUSANNAH P., wife of Schuyler Moses, in the 26th year of her age.

Mrs. Moses was truly an amiable woman, possessing the confidence and esteem of all who knew her. She was not a Universalist. She died, however, in the full assurance that a happy immortality awaited her. The funeral was attended in the Universalist church, and a sermon delivered by the writer, from Psalm xc: 16. T. P. AEELL.

In Salina, October 6th, an infant child of Mr. and Mrs. Goodrich. The funeral was attended on the Sunday following, at the Masonic Hall, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning friends, by N. B.

At Lairdsville, December 29th, Miss ESTHER J. MARKHAM, aged 36 years. For twenty years past, the life of this sister has been one of suffering. Yet she endured patiently, as seeing Him who is invisible; and confident that this light affliction was working out for her a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. After divine services and a sermon at Lairdsville, by the writer of this communication, her remains were deposited in the burial ground at Clinton, on the 31st ult. T. CLOWES,

In Hastings, September 9th, 1838, Mrs. RHODA ANN DEVENDORF, in the 34th year of her age. Funeral services by Rev. C. B. Brown.

At Preble, of consumption, December 7th, OSMOND D. CROFOOT, aged 24 years. Br. Crofoot died in the triumph of the same faith (viz. of Universalism) which had sustained him through the long and gradually wasting disease which terminated his earthly career. In his death, the denomination to which he belonged, have lost a valuable member, and his wife and two little ones have been bereaved of an affectionate and provident husband and father. May God bless and comfort them. The funeral was attended on the 8th, at the Methodist church, Preble Corners, and a discourse delivered to a large and attentive congregation of various denominations, by the writer. W. BULLARD.

In Sherburne, Chenango county, on December 25th, Mrs. ANN SICKLES, wife of Daniel Sickles, Senior, aged 59 years. Sister Sickles was remarkable for her ever active benevolence, which, like the impartial grace of God in which she believed and hoped for salvation, diffused itself, not for the worthiness but the wants of its objects. The poor, the sick, and the suffering, of all classes and denominations, have lost, by her departure, a ready helper and a sympathising comforter and consoler—several orphans whom she had adopted and reared as her children, mourn the loss of a mother indeed, and her bereaved partner is deprived of a most faithful and affectionate wife. A. B. G.

"SONGS OF ZION."

Just published and for sale at the "Trumpet" office, No. 40, Cornhill, (Up stairs) the NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY, entitled, "SONGS OF ZION; OR THE CAMBRIDGE COLLECTION OF SACRED MUSIC; designed for the Church, for the Social Meetings of Christians, and for Family Worship; comprising a rich variety of the most popular tunes, anthems, etc., with many pieces from various authors, never before published, written expressly for this work; arranged with a figured bass for the Organ and Piano Forte. To which is prefixed a Familiar Introduction to the art of Singing, designed for the aid of those who are entirely unacquainted with the science of music; the instruction being reduced to great plainness and simplicity." By THOMAS WHITTEMORE. Fifth Edition, enlarged and revised, containing eight additional pages of original anthems, for Temperance Celebrations, without any increase of price. Persons acquainted with the science of harmony are requested to call and examine this work.

This book contains upwards of three hundred tunes, of a great variety of metres. In addition to these, there are upwards of 100 pages of Anthems.

It has upwards of 350 pages of the size of the "Boston Academy's Collection;" and will be sold at the same price. The author pledges himself to the public, that neither pains nor expense have been spared to render this work correct, in its scientific and elegant in its mechanical execution.

This work is very particularly recommended in cases where different denominations of Christians unite in "Union Singing Schools." On the great theme of praise all Christians agree; we can all unite our hearts and voices in celebrating the praises of God and the Redeemer, and the glories of eternity. In a great number of cases, the whole hymn is put upon the same page with the tune, which will be very convenient in singing these tunes as voluntaries. There are many most excellent hymns inserted entire, which appear in no hymn book in common use.

Boston, September 29, 1838.

The author esteems it unnecessary to publish all the recommendations of this work, which he has received from eminent Singing Masters and Clergymen in various parts of the U. S. He has testimony from individuals in Maine, New-Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New-York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Ohio. A leader of a choir in Massachusetts, on being requested to point out what he regarded as the principal tunes, has sent us the following recommendations:

Mr WHITTEMORE—Will you permit me to call the attention of the public to the following tunes in the "Songs of Zion." We have used them repeatedly in our choir, and we consider them very choice tunes.—They are recommended to the attention of those choirs who use this book. Wentworth, page 32; West Rumney, 34; Abington, 37; Sawyer, 39; Augusta, 44; Epping, 49; Gurley, 56; Jewell, 57; Roxbury, 59; Bowdoinham, 63; Lebanon, 76; Saturday Night, 80; Adams, 81; Haverhill, 82; Christian Warrior, 90; Morris, 91; Richards, 92; Watertown, 98; Samaria, 103; Pembroke, 115; Hyannis, 122; Douglas, 140; Thornton, 145; Epsom, 146; Chelsea, 148; Warren, 149; Contest, 155; Lowell, 156; Danville, 161; Atonement, 168; Reliance, 171; Spaulding, 172; Cincinnati, 173; Bradley, 174; Spring Street, 179; Lancaster, 181; Sherburne, 183; Trenton, 184; Montgomery, 190; Felicity, 191; Atkinson, 194; Beneficence, 195; Greenwood, 199; East Kingston, 200; Streeter, 201; Eternity, 202; Harvard, 209; Anastasis, 216; Utica, 223; Morning Praise, 224; Richmond Street, 226; Kenrick, 240.

Of the Anthems, we are particularly fond of "Hail to the Saviour," sung with great spirit. "Upton" is one of the sweetest pieces ever written. The "Gospel Banner" is a great favorite. We sing also "Chesnut," and "Hark the herald angels sing." There are several Anthems which we have not yet attempted, but we shall [illegible] this Winter.

Mr. Editor—In justice to my own feelings, to the public generally, and to yourself, I feel called upon to offer the following remarks, in reference to that very valuable work, the "Songs of Zion." You will not discredit what I say, when I sincerely assure you, that I have anxiously watched the progress your book has made in commending itself to the attention of the musical public since its appearance. I candidly think, and this belief, I find, prevails generally, wherever it is known, that the "Songs of Zion" harmonize better with pure Christian worship, and Evangelical devotion, than any other singing book extant. There is a charm, a holy melody in its tunes, which inspires and warms the heart of the sincere worshipper. When our choir first purchased, and for several weeks, I was really fearful that we should have to retake the old books. Our choir now tell me they like it "better and better;" the more they study its pages, the more they desire to study them, on account of the superior beauty and richness of its tunes. I am happy to know that it is taking a high stand in this vicinity, among all sects of professing Christians. In Reading, four different denominations use it, viz., The Congregationalists, Baptists, Unitarians, and Universalists, and I have been correctly informed, each sect admires both its letter and spirit. With great respect, yours fraternally, HENRY JEWELL.

South Reading, October 1, 1838.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within four months; $2.00 if not paid within four months; or $2.50 if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis; and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their papers by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00 if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 11 Genesee street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME X. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, JANUARY 18, 1839. NUMBER 3.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SALVATION.

BY REV. L. C. MARVIN.

People often render a plain matter very intricate, and a straight matter very crooked, through needless and almost endless speculations. Thus, to hear many of Zion's watchmen go over the ground which a man must travel to salvation, we hear more terms, and phrases, and strange speeches, than one could well remember. We first hear of being anxious, then convicted, then converted, then brought out, and so on and so forth, through a long series of terms too numerous to mention.

To simplify the intricate, to straighten the crooked, and to unravel the mysterious, let it always be known, that for a sinner to become righteous, is salvation. This comprises the whole subject, and covers the whole ground. When Saul left the pathway of blood and slaughter, when in heart and life he became the servant of Christ, when the weapons of his rebellion fell, and in lieu thereof he put on the armor of God—the sword, the helmet, the sandals, and the shield, and fought the good fight of faith unto victory, then Saul was saved.

Rightly to effect this salvation in man, means must be had to "draw the willing soul along," to captivate it into virtue, not coerce it. No cords can bind with half the strength of those of love, and none are so soon and so easily broken as those of fear; and poor indeed is that man's virtue guarded, which has no sentinel but the latter.—Of what avail would it be to drive the world to Paradise? If man can be got to heaven only by driving him there, it will need a fence to keep him there. And have not Heaven, and holiness, and happiness, sufficient attractions to cause the mind often to ponder on its portion there? Many would fain have us believe, that a horrible hell was needed to frighten the world to glory, and keep it frightened after it gets there, lest it escape again. Horribly preposterous, and impiously absurd! No salvation is or can be of God through Christ, which does not centre in his love. Can the exhibitions of cruelty make men merciful and kind? Can hatred create in him the fruits of love? or the contemplation of racks and tortures induce the spirit of devotion and praise? When these things shall happen, then heaven may be peopled by other means than God's forgiving grace, and salvation be found in another name than that of Jesus Christ.

Some centuries back, a certain king sat up an image on the plains of Dura, and commanded his subjects to fall down and worship, on pain of being cast headlong into a fiery furnace. Rather than be cast into the furnace, the people generally obeyed, and fell down. But did the reader ever suppose that the fiery furnace caused any of those subjects to worship the idol? If so, the reader must have erred. But, perchance, he may say, that he never thought that they worshipped the idol? True: but why not? Answer. They did not worship because there was a fiery furnace attached to the matter. Ay! that was a sufficient reason. But that Christians should ever have made that idol the fac simile of Deity, and that king the type of the Redeemer, is a wonder indeed. Was there any similarity between that tyrant king, and him who was meek and lowly in heart? And does their history furnish any examples of approximation of feeling and principle between them? Assuredly not. Then how preposterous is it, to suppose that the Messiah has ordained the same means to save mankind, that tyrants have ordained to perpetuate idolatry, and enslave the human mind. And how strange, too, that old Nebuchadnezzar—tyrant as he was—should have practiced the Gospel so long before if was preached.

Let us then bear constantly in mind the great truth, that "he that loveth is born of God," and he only. Love worketh no ill—it casts out fear—it is stronger than death—it saves our race. Inspiration hath spoken it, that a little leaven, leaveneth the whole lump; but here we have an ocean, shoreless, bottomless and eternal. And if a little leaven can leaven the whole lump, what can an ocean do? Can it do less, dear reader? Here then, and here only, in this power, is salvation; and before it all rebellion and disloyalty must one day fall, all iniquity be purged out, and all suffering and sorrow end. Then the proud will learn humility, the broken-hearted find consolation, and the poor of our race have all their wants supplied.

Braman's Corners, N. Y.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE ORPHAN'S CONSOLATION.

BY MISS ANN BARTLETT.

Whilst permitted to enjoy the sweets of home, and feast on the smiles of fond and indulgent parents, surrounded by all that can give a zest to life, how uncommon a thing, however firm and unshaken may be our confidence in the final salvation of the whole human family, to sit down in calm contemplation, and picture to ourselves the blissful scene of meeting those loved friends, whose society we still enjoy, in a fairer and happier clime. And why is it so? It is because we have never ceased to enjoy their smiles and favors. The cords of affection which so closely entwine our hearts, have never, perhaps, been severed, and we are still permitted to gaze upon their smiling features, and hear the soft accents as they distil from their lips. We may have felt our hearts dilate with joy, whilst congratulating that lone orphan, who is weeping over the sundered ties of fond parents, and is left to wander like some lone star in the firmament, on the happy period when it shall be freed from its house of clay, and be borne on seraphic wings to that celestial haven where "tears are wiped from all faces," and separation is unknown. But however great may be the satisfaction we experience in assuaging the sorrows of others, by pointing out to them the bright star of immortality, which shall guide them to that sunny clime where all is calm serenity, still the picture is but faintly delineated in our own bosoms. But when we are called to take the last earthly look of that kind and indulgent father who has ever provided for all our wants, whose counsel has been our guide through all the vicissitudes of life; and that fond, affectionate mother, who ever lent a listening ear to all our complaints and cries, and who watched over us in sickness and in health, with more than mortal fondness; when we are called to say, in the anguish of our hearts, farewell, fond parents, and consign them to their kindred dust, it is then we fly, like the swift shooting meteor, to that mansion of bliss whither our earthly hopes are flown. We can penetrate the vail that envelopes that delectable land, and in a transport of joy join the blood-washed throng in chanting the praises of "our Father and our God." These are high zested enjoyments, that can never be fully participated by those who have not been called to partake of the bitter waters of death, and can not fail to inspire us with confidence in that Being who ever "tempers the wind to the shorn lamb." Although we may have seasons of sorrow, and feel that the love of God is utterly withdrawn, and the night of affliction closed in upon us, and we left to wander through the dark valley of disappointment and woe, yet that Being who careth for all, unwilling that any should perish or distrust his goodness, soon, very soon dispels the sable clouds, and pours in a flood of light more brilliant than the noon-day sun. "Although He cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment, but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer." In vain should we search to find an instance, either in the creation or government of Him who is naught but wisdom, that is not calculated to produce the best possible good. How transporting the thought that we, finite, erring mortals, stand in the relation of children to that Being who ereated and sustains worlds and systems of worlds, by the word of his power. Yes, notwithstanding our earthly parents may he torn from our embrace, yet we can hold communion with the all-wise and beneficent Creator, from day to day, and call him by the near and dear appellation of "our Father and our Friend." May all who are wandering in the cold and inhospitable regions of sin and sorrow, famishing for the bread of life, proclaim with united voices, that they "will arise and go to their Father's house, where there is enough and to spare," with the full assurance that although they have utterly forgotten him, and strayed far, far from the path of rectitude, he still careth for them, and will receive them joyfully.

Salisbury, January, 1839.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

FORGETFULNESS.

"It is a strange truth! We do forget. The Summer passes over the furrow, and the corn springs up; the battle-field forgets the blood that has been spilled upon its turf; the sky forgets the storm, and the water, the noon-day sun that slept upon its bosom. All nature preaches forgetfulness. Its very order is the progress of oblivion." BULWER.

I can not subscribe to the above sentiments. If they are true, it must, indeed, be a strange truth. Although I have heard it proclaimed from the pulpit, that the happiness of man depends upon his ability to forget, I still must differ from the wise and good. In my mind, the conclusion is irresistible, that man never does, and never can forget. He may smother, for a time, the recollection of the past, or slight the remembrance of fearful crimes, but, ever and anon, it will rush across his memory in the vividness and freshness of the reality. He can not stay its progress. It will revolve and re-revolve, in endless progression.

Gentle reader, suppose you plunge a dagger into the bosom of your nearest and dearest friend; suppose then, you escape the punishment due to you by the laws of God and man—do you think you could forget it?—that you would cease to remember the time, the place, and the occasion of that fatal deed—that dark, direful, deadly scene? Never—no, never!

If such was the case, much anguish and bitterness of mind might be averted. Many sighs, much sorrow, and numerous unavailing regrets, might be dissipated and dispelled. But it is not so. As long as man remains the same; as long as he possesses the faculties with which he is at present endowed, he never can forget.

If no bad effects resulted from the indulgence of such views, it might be pardonable to gratify them; but serious and alarming tendencies attend them. It needs no argument to enforce the truth of the above declaration. It must be obvious to every candid and rational mind, that it would foster vice, engender crime, and encourage iniquity. It would hold out to the sinner the most flattering inducements to continue on in sin and wickedness. If he can cease to think of these things afterwards, no remorse will necessarily follow.

Happily for mankind, it is otherwise. They remember—they recollect. The waters of oblivion roll not over his memory, and the stores of many years can here be deposited secure from all surrounding convulsions and dangers. They can be examined and inspected as often as occasion demands. Flatter not yourselves, then, ye workers of iniquity, on your forgetfulness! It will prove illusive. Though you may be assured you can and do forget, if you commit a horrid crime, your conscience will tell you better. Memory will stand at the helm, and guide you far from the gulf of oblivion.

O wondrous memory! happy should we be,
Could we control thy satellites and thee!

South Venice, December, 1838. ASA.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

IT IS A STRANGE THING.

BY REV. S. MILES.

It is strange, very strange indeed, that there should be so many who profess to believe that God is a God of truth, and that he will positively and certainly do as he says he will, and yet believe that he will exonerate them from the punishment which his word declares he will inflict. It would seem that a man of common sense, would not advocate such conflicting sentiments and call them the word of truth. If it be true, that God will positively and certainly render to every man according to his deeds, then it is passing strange that the advocates of truth should be so short sighted, as to teach a contrary doctrine; a practice which goes to show that they do not believe what they profess. When a man professes to believe one thing, and advocates another, his arguments go to show that he is a skeptic in disguise. Such men should never complain of those who wholly deny the truth of divine revelation.

God does not, can not, require us to hold to two systems of faith which are at war with each other; both can not exist in the mind of man at one and the same time. "No man can serve two masters;" those who are for the truth will not strive against it. "Every word of God is pure: add thou not unto his words, lest he reprove thee, and thou be found a liar."—Prov. xxx: 5, 6.—"All liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death."—Rev. xxi: 8. Now, if all liars do not have their part in the lake of fire, then the testimony of the witness is not true. If one liar should escape, then the word of God must fall to the ground, and our faith is left without a foundation in the Bible, which we now believe to be true. If professors of religion believe that God will do as he says he will, it is strange that they should use their influence to take off the edge of the sword of the spirit, which God has put into their hands. If they believe that God "will render to every man according to his deeds," why not take their stand upon this strong foundation, and hold to it, instead of abandoning it at the very first step? "For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, if any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book."—Rev. xxii: 18. Christians of every name, do you hear this; and do you believe it, and advocate it, in faithfulness and truth; or do you take off the edge of your sword, and thereby bring a curse upon yourselves, and those that hear and believe you?

We should be careful lest we hold the truth in unrighteousness, and thereby bring upon ourselves the "wrath of God, revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness; because that which may be known of God is manifest in them: for God hath showed it unto them." Rom. i: 18, 19. Yes, God has showed you that he "will render to every man according to his deeds." Do you believe it; or are you halting between two opinions? Do you unhesitatingly believe that God "will render to every man according to his deeds"? Why, then, ask him to exonerate you from the just demerit of your crimes? And why do you ask him to tell a lie for you? Do you not know, that he is as faithful, as truth is unalterable! and that, "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons." "See that ye refuse not him that speaketh: for if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven."—Heb. xii: 5–10, 25.

The forgiveness of sin should not be understood to exonerate the sinner from the punishment which God's word declares he will inflict on those who disobey his commands; because, in so doing, we doubt the veracity of him who has said, "See now that I, even I, am he, and there is no God with me: I kill, and I make alive; I wound, and I heal: neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand. For I lift up my hand to heaven, and say, I live forever. If I whet my glittering sword, and my hand take hold on judgment, I will render vengeance to mine enemies, and will reward them that hate me." "For my sword shall be bathed in heaven: behold, it shall come down upon Idumea, and upon the people of my curse, to judgment."—Isa. xxxiv: 5, 6.—This sword is the word of God, which is sharper than any two edged sword in the hands of kings or potentates of the earth. And if the inhabitants of Idumea escaped not, what reason have we to expect, that we shall escape a just retribution for all our sins? The truth declares that sin shall be punished, that the wicked shall not escape; and justice stands by the side of truth to execute the reward, according to the testimony of the unalterable and undying word of God. See Isa. xiii: 11. These are solemn truths that should induce us to follow the example of the Psalmist David, who says—"Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee."—Ps. cxix: 11. "And this is the word which by the Gospel was preached unto you."—1 Peter i: 25.

Now, if the word of God is a sword, and the heart of the Christian is its sheath, in which it is hid, may God grant that it may be drawn forth and wielded more faithfully and manfully than ever, that the Christian "faith may not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God."—Let the professed Universalist remember, that we believe that we shall be rewarded for our sins of omission, as well as our sins of commission. If we omit to look to God in humble prayer, we can not claim the promise, "And thy Father which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly." And not only so, but if we omit to have prayer meetings, and conferences in heavenly places in Christ, then our reward will be according to our works. But if we fear to sin against a faithful God, we shall meet, and speak often one to another, in spiritual songs, and pray with, and for each other, that God may smile on and bless us in the pathway of life, and keep us from sin, darkness, and death.—See Mal. iii: 16. Those who forsake the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some is, are doing more to strengthen the skeptic in his doubts and unbelief, than all that he can do in himself, to put down the truth of the Bible. It is strange, very strange indeed, that such should be the practice of a people who profess to believe that God will positively and certainly do as he says he will. That he "will render to every man according to his works."—Such coldness, and backwardness, would better become those who say that God will do as he says he will; and yet believe that they can escape the punishment for the very sins for which they admit he will punish them, if he does as he says he will. Brethren, think of these things, and may the Lord awaken you to every good word and work.

Union please copy.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CLAIMS OF SOCIETY ON YOUNG MEN.

BY REV. J. W. BAILEY.

The welfare of any country or republic, is consequent on the cultivation of the mind and intellect of that people. The haughty and supercilious spirit is susceptible of being eradicated by cultivation. One generation comes upon the stage of active life, flourishes for a while and then vanishes away. Another generation follows in turn, and in the sunny paths of health and fortune, exults and triumphs; but soon the chill night of death overtakes and overwhelms it, and its exit is made—forever made.

The peace and prosperity of the succeeding generation, depend, in a great degree, on the young men of the present. They are capable of exerting an influence in society, which will be transmitted down the lapse of ages, to generations yet unborn. How all-important, then, that their lives be characterized by the principles of philanthropy, patriotism, and virtue—that they lead the van of the good and just, and prove themselves bright and shining constellations in the political and religious firmaments. Under the reflection of having thus lived, how glorious will be the thought, how tranquil the mind, how happy the soul, as the last death-quiver departs from the agonizing frame, and the front of that sable curtain is rolled up which intervenes between time and eternity.

But they, alone, are not to participate in the blessings derived by eradicating from their hearts, every species of vice and immorality. Society will reap an incalculable benefit from their noble and enterprising deeds. The succeeding generation will rise up and call them blessed. Society, then, calls loudly for untiring zeal and efforts of you, young men, of the present generation, to wipe from its borders the many foul stains which intercept its prosperity and glory. The chain which now binds society together, is soon to be disposed of as you shall direct. It is soon to fall into your hands. And will you suffer this golden chain to be severed? Will you ever permit a single link to be sundered? Will you remain dormant and inactive, till it becomes corroded by tyranny and oppression? Let not such be the case! Before you, men have rallied around the standard of liberty, and pledged their lives, their liberties, and sacred honors, to maintain the equal rights and suffrage of the people. The character of these illustrious men, so far as they comport with the exigencies of the times, should be your guide. Like the brave and noble son of Ireland, let your motto be, "where virtue dwells, there will I hold, and the last intrenchment of liberty shall be my grave."

You have only to act, and success will crown your labors. Let not, then, I beseech you, the traducing and calumniating spirit corrode your breasts. Let your whole characters be as stainless and spotless as the sun at noon-day. Let your lives be knit together by the cords of love: then will the conscience be satisfied, and the claims of society be entirely liquidated. Then will the bright orb of freedom and independence long perform its revolutions around the standard of liberty, in the orbits of innocence and virtue.

Hinsdale, N. H.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

WORSHIP OF CHRIST.

The discussion of this subject, has already attracted considerable interest, and enlisted the feelings, usual in all matters of controversy. This is apparent from the occasional volunteers, who have already come forward like Elihu, to show their opinion. It is, however, matter of regret that the principals in this discussion, should not be left to fight out the battle in their own way.—They have both seen enough of this kind of service, to be quite familiar with controversial tact, are acknowledgedly competent masters of their subject, and pre-eminent adepts in driving home an argument, and enforcing an inference. Is it feared that either or both of these men may need assistance, that we are thus early favored with the views of others? Or is it intended to aid one, and overawe the other? Or, to settle the question at issue by majority, and declare him victor who can array the greatest number of volunteers? Or——but we suppress some dozen remaining queries, with the hope that they will finally be able to understand one another, whether we who read understand them or not.

Now, if we are not greatly mistaken, the discussion of this subject respecting the worship of Christ, is a kind of heir-loom in the Universalist family. It was bequeathed to us some years since, when certain leading Unitarian clergymen took occasion to assure the public, that they were not Universalists. We then looked diligently—but looked in vain—to our journals, for the corresponding assurance that Universalists were not Unitarians. But it seems that the discovery has since been made—and that, henceforth, there is to be precisely the same difference between a Universalist and Unitarian, as between a Unitarian and Universalist! Of the immense value of this discovery, those who live beyond the boundaries where the two denominations ever came, or are likely to come in contact and collision with each other, will probably never entertain an adequate conception.

Unfortunately there seems to exist a kind of necessity for controversy among us. At least, we are seldom without it, whether necessary or not. For no sooner has one crotchet been disposed of, than the harness and the weapons are resumed for new conflicts.—And inasmuch as enemies can not always be found—why, we must, if possible, carry on the war with each other. Just as the renowned Captain Rock describes his countrymen, who, when they could neither fight for honor nor their country, fought for fun.

And now, Messrs. Editors, since you have happily removed all doubts and uncertainty respecting the propriety or impropriety of reading sermons, or speaking without notes—since you have succeeded in removing all scruples about the apostolical authority, and expediency of praise meetings—and as we are in a fair way, by your kind and timely exertions, to understand whether we should, or should not pay divine honors to Christ—we pray you to further oblige us, and enlighten the world, by devoting some portion of your precious time, and much honored talents, to the consideration of the problem—how long it will probably take for an Editorial war, to secure most effectually and permanently, the peace of the denomination? S. R. Smith.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CELEBRATION OF CHRISTMAS EVE.

The Universalist Society in the town of Marshall, attended to this religious celebration, with great warmth and devotion, on the evening commonly adopted for that purpose. The arrangements and decorations were superintended by a committee of young men of the society, aided by those auxiliaries to every good work—the ladies. The arrangements were very superior, and the decorations tasteful in the highest degree;—wreaths and festoons of evergreen, displayed their living verdure in every direction, and the desk was beautifully protected by young cedars, giving the speakers the appearance of speaking from a natural bower in some forest hall: the lights, also, throwing their tints upon the green chandelier, added to the delicacy, not to say brilliancy, of the scene. But all this was art, and merely gratified the eye—merely pleased the taste; the living mass of Adam's race, who came there to mingle their glad voices in the jubilee of earth's freed ones—who came there to echo back a response to the angels' song, that for earth a Saviour was born—was more than art—was the gathering of God's own children, coming to give a new attestation to the amplitude of their Father's love; and as they gathered there, with happy heart and beaming eye, it looked as if a host had come to welcome the message of their God. Every seat was filled, and every passage, yet the benevolent desire was, that there might be more room; for the feast was free as the salvation of the living God.

Mr. Osburn, who conducted the singing, and who is the chorister of the society, did himself great honor in the selection and execution of the pieces. When the choir rose on the right and the left, sustained by the mellow music of the organ, and blended their voices in "Watchman, what of the night?" a solemn stillness reigned, that nothing might disturb the glorious song of Zion. The same silence was given to all their pieces, and the same joy was experienced by the people. Br. Gage, of Clinton, delivered an oration, at once appropriate, eloquent, and instructive, and he was followed by the writer with a short sermon intended to please. When the soft music died upon the ear, and the benediction told its parting notes, all felt as if the only mar to the fulness of the enjoyment, was the brevity of the happy time. May such glad meetings be made frequent among the children of salvation; because they seem to be the dawnings of that endless felicity, destined by the Father of the universe to all the kindreds, and families, and nations of his intelligent offspring.

J. G. McAdam.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CHRISTMAS EVE.

Br. Grosh—I am more and more in favor of the becoming celebration of the anniversary of our Saviour's advent. And I am happy to see such a good degree of attention paid to it in western New-York. It secures a hearing from thousands who would otherwise, perhaps, never hear a Universalist sermon. And not only so, but it serves to kindle up in the hearts of our brethren and sisters, a zeal and engagedness, which are agreeable with knowledge, and which fill the soul with love to God and benevolence to man. The last anniversary of our Lord's birth, was joyfully celebrated in the Universalist churches in Bristol, Victor, Conesus, Lakeville, Chili, Perry and North Bloomfield. And I venture nothing, I presume, in saying, that each of the above churches was filled to overflowing, with attentive and interested hearers. In the church in this place, there were at least 800 persons assembled—some good judges in such cases, say 1000—and many came and went away without being able to gain admittance. The above anniversary has been appropriately commemorated in this place for four or five years in succession. But we have never enjoyed so happy and profitable a time as the last. Our music on that evening—which was led by Mr. Howze, teacher of Sacred music—can hardly "be beat." J. Chase.

North Bloomfield, January 2, 1839.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

TO UNIVERSALIST MINISTERS.

This Institution, which has been in successful operation for more than six years, was projected by Universalists—it was organized by them—its officers, its teachers and its patrons, are principally of that denomination. The funds contributed for the erection of suitable buildings (and they are of the best and most convenient kind) have been almost exclusively given by Universalists; and the entire superintendance of the Institution has always appertained to them. More than one thousand youth of both sexes, have been respectably educated under these auspices; which, but for the existence of this Institution, must have been done, if done at all, by those of opposing faith. It is therefore no longer a question whether the Liberal Institute will be beneficial—it has already done much good, and rescued a large number of youth from the control of the opposers of our faith.

But it should not be forgotten, that all this has been effected principally by the money advanced by one man. For this, he has never had any security—nor even asked the interest of some thousands of dollars. It is reasonable and right, that this money should, if possible, be refunded; and it is believed to be in the power, and perhaps at the will of Universalist ministers to accomplish that desirable end. And with a view to its attainment, and with the sincere hope that it may be attained, the respective ministers of Universalist congregations in the State of New-York, are affectionately requested to take up collections in their several meetings on the third Sunday in February next, and transmit the sums so collected at their earliest convenience, to Rev. A. B. Grosh, Utica, who will pay it over to the Treasurer of said Institute, for the liquidation of said honest debt.

January 9, 1839. S. R. Smith, Agent.

N. B. Those societies which have not public services on the third Sunday in February, are affectionately solicited to take up the collection on the earliest Sunday on which they have such services. S. R. S.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A DISCOVERY.

Mr. Solomon Slow, of Slowville, one of the subscribers to this paper, who has taken it for a number of years, and always paid, sooner or later, has lately made what he deems an important discovery; and is desirous of having the same published pro bono publico. He has found out, or at least is convinced to his entire satisfaction, that to pay for the paper in advance, price $1.50, is cheaper, and of course more economical, than to pay $2.50 at the year's end, or even $2.00 before the year expires. "Whoso readeth," etc.

Philip.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Still holding back! What is the reason? We want brief, pithy articles very badly.

E. M. R will receive our thanks for the poetic articles sent us. An accident befel them, which, at this busy season, has delayed their appearance, and also a private letter to her, stating the cause.

Br. Chase—The sermon will be very acceptable.—We will publish it as soon as we can find room, or wait until just before the season comes round again—just as you please. A. B. G.

Accounts from the South, the West, and the Southwest, which, in the present state of affairs, we do not feel at liberty to publish, inform us of much good that is being effected by the discussion between Br. Skinner and Mr. Campbell. In these regions, Mr. Campbell's paper is pretty widely circulated, and by publishing both sides, it becomes a "harbinger" of God's impartial grace to hundreds, who, otherwise, had never heard the doctrine explained, save by its opposers. The consequence is, the removal of much ignorance and unfounded prejudice, and the reception of the truth. The end of the discussion is nigh at hand—but its effects will not end with it. A. B. G.

No letter has yet been received from Mr. Campbell. Nor have we received any news from Mr. Skinner, since he sailed from New-York for Santa Cruz. This in reply to inquiries on the subject.

The first number of the new volume of the Expositor has been received. Brs. Bazin and Tompkins, Proprietors; Br. H. Ballou, 2d, Editor. The work is established—its character improving, and our indifferent friends who put off subscribing for it, will soon wish they had been more awake to its importance and their own benefit. That's all. A. B. G.

Bringing up.—The matters that have engaged all our time at the close and commencement of the volumes, have prevented us from attending to some regular items of news. We will bring them up soon, and endeavor to keep even pace with the times hereafter. A. B. G.

Can any one inform us where G. W. Eldredge, formerly of Ohio city and Milwaukie, now resides. He is owing this office $7.50.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ASSUMPTION NOT ARGUMENT.

In number 51, of the last volume of the Magazine and Advocate, under the above caption, I endeavored to furnish an expose of a tract published by the American Tract Society, entitled "Universalism Unscriptural and Absurd." As a specimen of our author's ingenuity, he further proceeds as follows—"Universalists generally allow that all men are subject to the moral law, and are sinners; but they maintain that the salvation which is through Christ, is not only sufficient for all, and within reach of all, and freely offered to all, but that it will be absolutely secured to all." This is all very true, but the absurdity of the proposition, in the view of our author, seems to be in the last clause of the sentence: viz., that it will be absolutely secured to all! Now, that the salvation which is through Christ is sufficient for all, and within reach of all, and freely offered to all, is both Scriptural and Orthodox; but that it will be absolutely secured to all—that is the absurdity! That Christ "shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied."—Isa. liii: 11. What a monstrous absurdity! That he will "reconcile all things unto himself."—Col. i: 20. How "unscriptural!" That "the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world."—1 John iv: 14; and that his object will be accomplished—how unlike the mission of the Saviour! But we will vary the phraseology of the passage, that it may appear less objectionable to our author. "The salvation which is through Christ is sufficient for all, and within reach of all, and freely offered to all, but will only be secured to some." Does that sound better? That the All-Wise Deity should commence the work of "reconciling the world unto himself," and be finally thwarted in that work, appears to be the popular theology of the day. This sentiment is worthy of all acceptation, and should be circulated through the medium of tracts for the special benefit of the rising generation. But the error of Universalists in supposing that salvation will be secured to all, says our author, "appears to originate, mainly, in very low views of the nature and value of God's commandments, and in practically regarding sin as a small matter. Hence, they suppose the penalty of the Divine law to be a mere trifle in comparison with what has been stated above." That the penalty of the Divine law, or the consequences of transgression, is a mere trifle, we are not willing to admit; but that it is a trifle in comparison to "endless suffering and shame," we shall not dispute. But we shall dispute that the Deity ever gave man a law that would subject him to the the necessity of inflicting sufferings so awful upon his dependent offspring. We think he would not do a thing so contrary to his nature, which is "Love." We think the "nature and value of God's commandments," are of that character which are best calculated to secure an adequate and just punishment for sin, and also to "win to loyalty and love, the heart that had remained impenitent amid rich and varied exhibitions of paternal chastisement, forbearance and mercy." We would not say that "mere suffering or punishment" would do this; but the light, love and power of God, manifested through Christ, can do all things.

But our author says, "the inconsistency and folly of the Restoration scheme may be thus evinced:—1. There are no passages of Scriptures which show how, and when, and where the sinner is delivered from hell, if once he falls into it."—Reply. David says: "The sorrows of hell compassed me about; the snares of death prevented me. In my distress I called upon the Lord and cried unto my God: he heard my voice."—Ps. xviii: 5, 6. "For great is thy mercy toward me, and thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell."—lxxxvi: 13. "The sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell gat hold upon me: I found trouble and sorrow."—cxvi: 3, 4. Here, then, are three passages of Scripture, "which show how, and when, and where the sinner is delivered from hell, if once he falls into it." It will be readily conceded that David was once a sinner, and that he fell into hell, or as it is written, "the sorrows of hell compassed me about." If hell compassed him about, he must have been in it. If the pains of hell gat hold upon him, he suffered them; and if, as David says, the Lord had delivered his soul from the lowest hell, our author's assertion is not true, that "there are no passages of Scripture which show how, and when, and where the sinner is delivered from hell, if he once falls into it." Furthermore, we have to inform him, that whether the hell he speaks of be on the earth, under the earth, or in the sea, we are assured by the apostle John, that he heard every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, say, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.—Rev. v: 13. If our author knows of a hell as a place or lake of fire and brimstone, located in some other place not mentioned in the above passages, his knowledge is derived from another source than the Bible; and if there is such a place, it remains for him to show that the inhabitants of the earth have any thing to do with it. We are willing to abide by the law and the testimony on this point.

Passing over some other objections to Universalism, which our author might have removed himself, (had he written some "Counsels to the Young,") as easily and as effectually as did Dr. Alexander refute his "Eight Reasons Against Universalism," by Dr. Alexander's "Counsels to the Young," I next notice what he says about salvation by grace, punishment, etc. "The scheme of restoration (says our author) destroys the whole doctrine of salvation by grace. The Bible declares that there is no other name through which we can be saved, except that of Christ, (Acts iv: 12,) and that we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins.—Ephs. i: 7. But if the wicked suffer the just punishment of their sins in hell, and are there purified, they can be just as well saved without Christ as with him. Indeed, they neither want a Saviour nor can they have any." I know of no Universalist or Restorationist who expects to be saved without Christ. Therefore, because Universalists believe that the world will be saved through Christ, there is no need of Christ! If the world will be saved through a Saviour, then there is no need of a Saviour. "Indeed, they neither want a Saviour, nor can they have any." Sound logic! But I suppose our author means, if Universalists believe that God will do by the world—the wicked—as he says he will—Isa. xiii: 11, 12—"And I will punish the world for their evil, and the wicked for their iniquity, and I will cause the arrogancy of the proud to cease, and will lay low the haughtiness of the terrible. I will make a man more precious than fine gold: even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir"—that therefore, there is no need that God should be in Christ "reconciling the world unto himself." If our author is opposed to the punishment and salvation of the world, he must settle the controversy, not with Universalists, but with the Bible, for there these sentiments are effectually maintained.

A. C.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

UNCHRISTIAN ILLIBERALITY.

"Man's inhumanity to man,
Makes countless millions mourn."

When humanity is outraged, it is a crime to be silent. Yea, when the bleeding wounds of bereaved friends are newly lacerated by deeds of cruel, persecuting, ungrateful illiberality, the tongue and pen are guilty of criminal silence, in not defending against the wrong. Hence I speak, and only regret that I can not occupy more space of paper in disclosing this subject, in discharge of my duty, than I am sensible I can be allowed.

On the morning of the 31st December last, a young lady of this village died, and it became necessary to obtain a place to hold the funeral services in. Application was made on the behalf of the friends of the deceased, to the authorities of the Reformed Dutch church, for the privilege of their house. But against every moral, every generous, every liberal, every neighborly, every Christian, every virtuous principle, the privilege was forbidden—yes, unblushingly forbidden.

It is to be observed, that it was forbidden by the church authorities; for in all cases partaking of a criminal nature, none are to be considered as guilty, unless implicated by some act or assent; and in this outrage, I desire none to be implicated except those who are known to have participated in the barbarous refusal by open expressions. Let those who are guilty stand in the solitude of their own unhappy situation, before an indignant and injured public, who have manifested a speaking frown.

But why did those authorities refuse the house? This question will readily present itself to the reader, and certainly a good cause ought to have existed. Did they wish to occupy the house in any way? Not at all. Were the friends of the deceased, characters unworthy of a place in which to have performed the burial ceremonies? Dare this be pretended? Were they degraded members of society? Were they persecutors of that church—revilers of religion—scoffers of sacred things? It is asked again, why did they refuse the house? Why, reader, this is the cause—yes, in a Christian and civilized land, it must be told—the deceased and her friends were believers in the final TRIUMPH OF HOLINESS AND HAPPINESS over sin and wretchedness, and consequent salvation of ALL MANKIND. This was the cause, and the only cause!

The deceased was a young woman who had spent many and many a day and evening raising her voice in singing to the services of that church; but, alas! alas! as soon as her voice was hushed in death, she was not suffered to be carried within the walls which had so often echoed her music, to receive her funeral rites. But she is at rest, beyond the reach of the bitter shafts of bigoted ingratitude and persecution, and lies sleeping near the highway, within sight of the passers by; and I trust, in the providence of things, her cruel abusers may ever be reminded of their evil deed, as they pass and repass her silent dormitory. By thus being awakened to a sense of their wrongs, they will be taught that the sinner will be punished, even "though hand join in hand." They will find a rebuke in every eye that is cast upon them in a generous community, and the incident of that funeral, will ever be a bitter subject of reflection. "I refused the house," will ring through their minds at the still midnight hour, and haunt them in their sleeping hours—at noon-day they will read the same language at every corner of the streets, and with one of old they will say, "every one that shall meet me, will slay me." Let guilt work its way—it is a means in the hands of God, to work a reformation.

Had the house which was so wrongfully refused, been built by the Reformed Dutch Society, it would present a different aspect, although no justification. But the society was a pauper society, and a generous and liberal community contributed to build the house. Yes, that society now worshipping under the roof furnished by the liberal community, pampered by the gifts of others, refuse those others the right of assembling under that roof, to pay the last tribute to a departed friend! But a satisfaction exists in knowing that, in the wisdom of God, good many times springs from evil—and this evil will produce its good.

The Methodist Society very willingly opened their doors, for which they received the heart-felt thanks of the whole community; and a crowded house paid their respects to the deceased and friends, and the dead was granted its due obsequies.

En passant—it is well to state, by way of comment upon the family thus wronged, that the Reverend pastor who had not long since left this place, and who had, before he left, frequently received the generous and free hospitality of that family, although he had not sufficient moral strength and courage to attend a Universalist meeting in the village, came to this place to attend an installation of the present pastor. And when he came, attended with his wife, he called upon and staid with that family, knowing he had nothing to lose by so doing, and that not one of his own church would give him more cordial and free reception. There he felt free to stay, board and lodge, because he knew that he and his family were freely received.

Here endeth the lesson, and I trust it will be a salutary one. HUMANITAS.

Canastota, January, 1839.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE HAPPY FAMILY.

A Juvenile Tale.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

CHAPTER II.

The morning walk—an interesting subject—an object of pity—more blessed to give than to receive—remarks.

The family arose early the next morning, and, after taking breakfast, they all set out for a walk. They first entered a grove by the side of the lake, where the birds were singing very sweetly, and sprightly squirrels were skipping about from branch to branch, among the old oaks. And then there were flowers here of every hue, whose fragrance filled the air. Having walked about a while in this delightful place, Mr. and Mrs. Norton seated themselves on a grassy mound, remarking upon the beauties of the place, while George and Adeline ran about hand in hand, gathering "poesies," as they called them. They soon grew tired of this, and returned, with their hands filled with flowers, which they threw down at their parents' feet, and then seated themselves by their side.

"These flowers," said Mr. Norton, taking up a few of them, "were we to listen to them, would teach us many beautiful and useful lessons."

"Why, father, they can not talk as we do!" said George.

"Very true; yet they speak silently to the heart. They tell us of the goodness of that great Being who made us, and of whom I have told you so often. They tell us that he cares for his creatures. They assure us of his great love, and that he is ever present with us all. And then the flowers speak to us of life beyond this world. Though cut down by the frosts and snows of Winter, and buried in the dust, yet when Spring comes, with its sunshine and song, they burst forth again into life and beauty. So, my children, shall it be with us. These bodies of ours, as I have often told you, are made of the dust.—God did not intend, when he made us, that we should always stay in this world. He has a better place prepared for us—a place where no sickness comes, nor pain, nor sorrow. We must die, but we should not be afraid to die. Death only comes to take us home to God. When the Winter of life has come, we lie down like the flowers; and, like them, we shall burst forth again into life, when Spring visits the 'mouldering urn.' And then we shall die no more, but live forever with the angels in heaven."

Mr. Norton here paused. George and Adeline were very much interested with what their father had been saying; and the big tears of joy stood in their eyes—they did not wish to have him stop.

"Do, father," they both said, "tell us more about God and heaven.'

But it was time for them to go back home, and their mother told them that they would talk about these things on the way. So they all walked from the grove into the green meadows, and through them into the road which led to their cottage. They had gone but a little way here, before they met a very old lady travelling on foot. Her appearance bespoke extreme poverty. Her clothes were dirty and torn; and she was wasted away to a shadow. As soon as she came near them, she held out her hand and asked for a penny to help her on her way. And then she wept. And when George and Adeline saw the tears rolling down her furrowed cheek, they wept too. Mrs. Norton likewise shed tears, when she saw the situation of the poor old woman. In answer to some question asked her by Mr. Norton, she said she had come over two hundred miles on foot, and that she was going to visit some friends in the western part of the State. Her husband, she said, was dead, and she had no means of support; but if she could only get to her friends, she would be provided for. A few shillings, she added, would enable her to get to them.

"I have got four shillings in my purse," said George to his father, "which you gave me to buy toys with—give them to the poor old woman."

"And I," added Adelme, "have got two in my work-bag, that mother gave me to buy a doll with at the fancy store—here they are"—and she reached out the money she held in her hand.

Mr. Norton took the silver handed him by his children, and adding to it the contents of his own purse, and some few shillings Mrs. Norton had with her, gave it all to the poor old woman, who received it very thankfully—and again, and again did she ask the richest of Heaven's blessings to rest upon them. "Such kindness as this," she said, "can never go unrewarded. May God bless you"—and she proceeded on her journey.

George and Adeline were in raptures at the thought of what they had done; their little hearts overflowed with joy. They were richly paid for the deed of charity they had performed. And now they felt the meaning of the words spoken by our Saviour—"It is more blessed to give, than to receive."

Now, all little boys and girls should imitate an example so noble, as far as they are able. They never will be sorry for any deed of charity or kindness they may do. No. They shall not go unrewarded. Heaven will smile upon them. When they give to the poor, they are but lending to the Lord, and he will repay them with happy and satisfied feelings. He will give them that which is of more value than kings can boast, and which the world can neither give nor take away!

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 11, 1839.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAW OF KINDNESS....NO. I.

"Overcome evil with good."—ROM. xii: 21.

As like physical causes produce like physical effects, as vice generates misery with unerring certainty, so revenge will create revenge; for water does not more certainly rush to its level, than the exercise of malicious power rouses into action the fires of anger and opposition. To small purpose has that individual perused the various histories of the world, who has not discovered that evil has been almost universally met with evil, and its pathways have been clouded with the smouldering misery perpetually arising from the horrible spirit of retaliation.—And to as little purpose has he pored over the records of nations, if he is not convinced that when the law of kindness has been practiced, it has been as much more salutary in its influence, and as much more glorious in its results, as virtue is more salutary and glorious than iniquity. For, while retaliation is like the storm which sweeps through the forest in destruction, kindness is like the combined influence of the heat of the sun and the rain of the cloud, which unlocks the secrets of seed, and developes its leaves, flowers and odors.

The spirit of revenge has poured a flood of evil upon this world. Millions have been slaughtered, cities have been sacked and burned, nations have been swept from political life, reputations have been ruined, families filled with discord, friends separated, and happiness withered by revenge. If the earth has a demon to dread, it is the unholy power of retaliation. For there is no clime but that has experienced its blight, no heart but that has more or less felt its poison. What has made man bite and devour his fellow-man in oppression and blood?—What has caused nations, in many instances, to slaughter, in cold blood, the captives of their bow and their spear? What sends a great proportion of the cases of litigation to the bar of the judge? What engenders the quarrels existing in all communities? REVENGE. Hideous principle, murderous power, which slew the Saviour in all the glory of his character, and martyred sainted Stephen!

To trace the consequences resulting from the practice of the law of revenge, is but to read its condemnation in every reflecting mind. And, if for a moment we reflect how many communities, which have been desolated, might have been the abodes of happiness; how many places of the earth, which have become dark with the fury of unhallowed passions, might now be echoing with songs of salvation and virtue, were it not for the law of revenge; surely, the desire must be strong, and the prayer ardent, that the olive-branch of overcoming evil with good, may take the place of the deadly nightshade of retaliation.

It may be urged, however, that some of the principles of the Mosaic Law sanction the foundation of retaliation, in the requisition of an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. But, it must be remembered that the Mosaic Law, rich as it is in its provisions for the widow and the orphan, for hospitality and for other excellent precepts, introduced the law of retaliation into its statutes only as the preventive of an evil which already existed, the same as the lancet and probe of the surgeon are necessary for a diseased limb. The Jews had been thoroughly debased in the Egyptian brick-yards, and the foul airs of idolatry; they had been degraded by ignorance; they were a headstrong, wicked people; they were morally sick; and it was necessary to apply the lancet of fear to them. But this retaliatory principle was not instituted as a universal rule of action. For, when the world was properly fitted and prepared, then a nobler law was given in a system, which is superior to all other systems in its doctrine and morality.

That system is CHRISTIANITY. While the ablest philosophers, at the period of its establishment, were advocating some of the worst features of revenge, Christianity, the child of Heaven and the friend of man, lifted up its voice and proclaimed the divine law, "OVERCOME EVIL WITH GOOD." This law received a comment from the Friend of sinners, and the Saviour of the world.—And what was that comment? Was it like the conduct of David, who, while he indignantly condemned that rich man, who, with great flocks around him, took by force the only lamb of a poor neighbor, yet stole from the bosom of his bravest general, his wife? Was it like the kiss of Judas, the balm of treachery, the love of ingratitude? Ah, no! Throughout all the pathways of his ministry, he met his foes with benevolence. And when his condemnation was effected; when his bitter enemies were mocking his agonies, and adding insult to murder; then it was that he prayed, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do." This was the Saviour's comment upon the law, "love your enemies." And the comment was more sublime, if possible, than the law itself; more glorious in practice than in theory. For, who can remember that Christ prayed for his foes, even when they were scoffing him, and he was enduring the excruciating pangs of a crucifixion, which they had brought upon him by their wickedness, without sincerely exclaiming in admiration, "truly, this was the Son of God," and without admitting that his conduct was the perfection of kindness?

The interesting question now arises, What influence has this law and its comment upon us? Brought up and educated in the school of our Saviour; living in a land, which, above all others, calls itself Christianized; existing beneath the banners of the Gospel, incomparably the most noble system of doctrine and moral ethics extant; how are we influenced by the law of kindness? Do we love our enemies and overcome evil with good? Far from it! We deliberately fold up the banner of Christ, put aside the laws which God has made for us, voluntarily fling ourselves into the requirements of the Mosaic Law, and are governed by the principle of "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth." How many thousands of dollars are spent in our halls of litigation, simply to satisfy revenge! How many individuals will pursue, with most untiring industry, the most questionable means to compass the destruction of another person, against whom a grudge is cherished. Even in this land of boasted freedom, men are found who will challenge one another, and, thirsting for blood, will fight until a valuable life is lost, and perhaps a confiding wife and her children thrown upon their feeble resources for support. A melancholy case at the seat of national legislation in this country, too truly proves this. Yet, this procedure is deemed honorable in the parlance of the world. But, in the sight of Heaven and all correct conceptions of right, it is fashionable murder. How pitiful and degrading is such conduct, when compared with the conduct of the Saviour, which, with all power and sublimity, illustrated the divine law "love your enemies."—Still we claim to be a Christian people, even when one of our sanctioned laws in fashion is a direct contradiction of a most prominent principle of the Christian statutes.

In the plenitude of his wisdom and the divinity of his thoughts, our Saviour deemed that man could and that it was his duty to "overcome evil with good," as well as an imperative practice, in his Christian profession, to "love his enemies." And whenever and wherever the law has been put into direct practice, it has succeeded in a most admirable manner. Though our passions may rise up, and erroneous education intervene, to make us believe that retaliation is necessary, and that thorough kindness is a dangerous instrument, yet it needs but to be tried in order to be embraced. For when an individual follows its dictates, he finds that it affords him such a powerful influence over others, as to lead him to the conclusion, that the law of kindness is the most effectual method of subduing enmity. This position will be sustained by historical facts. G. W. M.

THE CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

In our paper of to-day will be found an earnest appeal to Universalist societies, in favor of this Institution, from its principal and most active originator, the General Agent. Br. S. R. Smith is fully entitled by his numerous and long continued services, to appeal to the liberality of others in behalf of this excellent Institution.—And though not thus entitled, I can not suffer the call to go forth, without saying a few words, why every Universalist, and every Universalist society in this, and even in some of the neighboring States, should promptly, freely and substantially respond to that call.

1. It is now in a more flourishing condition, as respects the number of its pupils, and the grade of study, than it has been at any one period since its commencement, and needs but to be relieved of its long continued debt, to warrant still further improvements, and elevate the Institution yet higher in the scale of respectability and utility. From the peculiar circumstances under which it was established, and has been supported, the reputation of the denomination is some what involved in that of the Institute. For, though not a sectarian Institution, in the common sense of the term, it is a Liberal Institute—one approved and sanctioned by the general voice of our denomination, and such a one as we have long and in vain urged the public to make of the other literary institutions of the land, in order to render them worthy of general patronage, and of the support of the State. Should we not back our approving voice and frequent recommendations, by deeds which shall speak yet louder than words?

2. Universalists generally are in favor of securing an intelligent, able and efficient ministry—one that, by acquainting themselves with all the collateral branches of learning relating to the study of the Scriptures, shall be able to feed the people with knowledge and understanding. True—many (among whom is the writer) are opposed to a gratuitously educated ministry, and a denominational theological seminary—but all desire that means should be provided which will enable the candidate for the ministry to acquire with facility, at the cheapest rate, a good knowledge of the original languages of the Scriptures, ancient and modern Geography and History, Logic, Rhetoric and of Natural, Moral and Mental Philosophy, that he may enter on the study of the Scriptures, either by himself, or under the directions of a minister of his own choice, prepared to understand and apply these acquired stores of collateral knowledge, in his professional duties. Such an institution is the Clinton Liberal Institute.

It is not a theological seminary; but every branch of knowledge useful in the after study of theology, is taught in it, separate from the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures—thus giving to the young man who desires to enter the ministry, every preparation for the study of mere theology, which even a theological seminary would give him. And it does this, without arbitrarily confining him in its walls, beyond his leisure and his means. He can go as far as his inclination and means permit; and pursue such studies as he deems most necessary, without being trammelled and loaded down with the arbitrary routine of a Collegiate course of studies—many of them useless to the learner in his future profession.

It is not a denominational affair—i. e. the denomination, as such, are not officially responsible for it, but its stockholders only—though, as I said before, various circumstances connect our reputation with it in public estimation, and will ever secure to it, its present liberal character, so consonant to the views and feelings of Universalists in regard to literary institutions. And this Institute being purely literary, and not theological, there is no fear that doctrines will be inculcated in its walls which would be offensive to any portion of our denomination.

The Institute being, then, an institution so perfectly suited to gratify the wishes of the denomination in regard to its ministry, (without any fear of offending those opposed to a theological seminary, while it goes very far towards granting the entire wishes of those in favor of one,) and the prosperity of the cause, and the increased numbers and respectability of the denomination being so dependent upon the increased facilities which our ministers need, may we not reasonably expect "a pull, a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together," from our societies on this occasion?

 I would remark, in passing, that the leisure hours, and the ample theological library of the Rev. Dr. Clowes, Principal of the Institute, are at the service of any young men who wish to unite in a class at his residence for Biblical studies. This is a private affair, altogether, not belonging to the studies of the Institute, nor performed in the building of, nor during the hours of study in that Institution. But, by this arrangement, students for the ministry can have all the facilities they can desire.—This, merely by the way.

3. This is the only Institution known in this State, in which there is a chartered protection insured to the student, that he shall be secure from the officious intermeddlings of proselyting sectarians of any denomination, or from interruption of his studies by even public religious exercises. Here the lay members as well as preachers of our societies, have an institution prepared expressly for their accommodation in educating their sons and daughters. It is not a merely clerical, but also an institution for the benefit and education of the laity—and to them it appeals for aid, that they may be benefited. Will they not answer the call?

One word more.—Don't fear giving too much. Even if $10.000 could be raised, it could, every cent of it, be honorably and most profitably employed for purposes of general education. Let, then, every one give as liberally as he can. The receipts for this fund will be duly noticed in our paper, as fast as received. A. B. G.

IS CHRIST THE CAUSE OF SALVATION?

In the Trumpet of October 20th, Br. Whittemore published what he called the creed of Universalists, the fourth point of which was—"that all men at last should be saved from sin and death by the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ." This, he asserted, was believed by all Universalists, and taught in our General Profession of Belief. I replied in the Magazine and Advocate of November 30th, (mind the dates!) stating that "IF Br. Whittemore meant by this, that Jesus was the first and only cause of salvation," his statement was not correct. In the Trumpet of December 15th, Br. Whittemore replied under the sneering and supercilious caption, "Br. Grosh in trouble again," and intimated that I wrote hastily, or with a heated brain, and under the influence of a fault-finding spirit, and of wonderfully irrated combativeness. As to motives, I had none other than to prevent our general views from being misrepresented, or the Universalist name from being denied to brethren who do not regard Jesus as the cause, but the means, only, of salvation.*

As to haste, or heated brain, I appeal to the dates above named—and as to irritated combativeness, I appeal to the article itself, which was carefully prepared so as to avoid even the appearance of discourtesy, of positiveness as to Br. W.'s meaning; and, by carefully defining and explaining our views, I left open a way in which Br. W. could honorably explain the meaning of his incorrectly worded position. But if Br. Whittemore is unsatisfied still as to my combativeness—especially as he has heretofore spoken as if it was excessive—I propose that we submit our respective noddles to good practical Phrenologists, who shall publish the measurements of our respective organs of combativeness, destructiveness, cunning or secretiveness, etc., that our readers may judge from facts and figures which of us is thickest in brain from ear to ear!

But how has Br. Whittemore answered my article? He begins with a supercilious sneer—false accusations and insinuations of my motives, and then virtually admits that he did not mean what his words asserted, and that my statement of our views is correct, as to Christ's agency in our salvation. And yet, strange to tell! he immediately follows his reply with lame attempts, and even false statements, to show that the words of his fourth point, agrees with our General Profession of Belief, and with the Scriptures, (which latter, he declares I have opposed!) and winds up, especially in another article, by a crafty but untrue statement, and as unfair as untrue, that I opposed his statement because he "said that Universalists hold that all men shall at last be saved 'THROUGH the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ'"—the words in double quotation being the words of Acts xv: 11, and not the objectionable phrase of Br. Whittemore's article!!!

I have before complained, and now again solemnly and affectionately protest against this uncandid and unfair mode of controversy It is bad enough in an op-

* Br. Whittemore will please to remember that this is not the first time that he has spoken in the name of the denomination, and virtually denied the name of Universalist to some of our brethren, by declaring that Universalists regarded the doctrine of a limited future punishment as "a relic of heathenism," and that they knew no state for man beyond death but that in which he was as the angels of God in heaven. The effects were disastrous, as he well knows; and many of our brethren who did not separate from us, have, nevertheless, not yet recovered from its effects on their feelings. Perhaps if a Br. Grosh had been "in trouble" then, some good might have been effected, and harm prevented. But be that as it may, Br. W.'s late movement seemed to me of the same nature, but calculated to drive off, or injure the feelings of, our brethren who are Unitarians in sentiment in regard to the worship of Christ, and the cause of salvation, by asserting that all Universalists denied those sentiments, and reprobated them. I trust that thus far they are satisfied that Br. Whittemore's statements on these subjects are to be received with some grains of allowance. A. B. G.

poser of the Restitution, but still worse in a Universalist, especially in a Universalist preacher and editor! Should Br. W. ever defend Universalism against an opposer, in this manner, he would injure the cause in the estimation of every ingenuous and honorable mind. I fervently pray God, therefore, that I may not again have occasion to rebuke him for such ——— what name befits it?—for it is painful—VERY painful to witness such conduct, and to rebuke it, whatever he may think of my fault-finding disposition.—And now to Br. Whittemore's reply.

After expressing hesitancy at again noticing an error by Br. W., I said—"IF Br. W. means by this, that the grace of Christ is the first and only cause of salvation, I deny the correctness of his statement." Then followed proofs of his incorrectness—i. e. if that was his meaning—and a clear statement of our views on the subject. Br. Whittemore replies frankly to this—"Br. G.'s anxiety is groundless; we meant nothing of the kind." Very well; then that point is settled.

But determined, as it seems, to acknowledge no error, even in his words, or to cast me into the wrong, as a punishment of my presumption for doubting his infallibility, he proceeds to justify his statement. He says—

"After having given our four points of faith, we said, 'these points will be found to be all embraced in the Profession of Belief, adopted by the General Convention of Universalists, at its session in Winchester, N. H., in the year 1803.' We then gave, in a note, the Profession of Belief entire, one article of which is, 'We believe there is One God, whose nature is love, revealed in One Lord Jesus Christ, by One Holy Spirit of Grace, who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness.' These words we set in immediate connexion with the article which has so wonderfully irritated Br. Grosh's organ of combativeness; and as we stated that all four of our points would be found embraced in the Profession of Belief, we showed that we meant nothing more than is contained in that Profession. But Br. G. did not stop to think of this. He hurried on to give his dissent, (so it seems to us); and what is very remarkable, after having performed the 'duty,' (a very solemn duty we have no doubt he thought it to be,) of correcting the 'ERROR' of his Br. of the Trumpet, he explains his own opinion, and uses the language of the very same Profession to illustrate his belief, that we had used to illustrate ours! So he corrects our ERROR! We certainly meant nothing more than is contained in the Profession, and so stated at the time, and quoted the Profession to show it."

Not so—he did not state at the time, that he "meant nothing more than is contained in the Profession," but that his erroneous statement "will be found to be embraced in the Profession;" when neither words nor sentiment of that point is named there! I think every reader must see the difference. The first would construe a wrongly worded phrase so as to make it mean what the Profession does teach; but the latter made the Profession responsible for what it does not teach—namely, that final salvation is "by the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ." But Br. W. does not stop here—he proceeds—

"We would not forget to observe, that the language we used, and to which Br. Grosh takes exceptions, is the precise language of the Scriptures. Take one example, Acts xv: 11, where Peter says, 'We believe that THROUGH THE GRACE OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST we shall be saved, even as they.'" The only difference between our language and that of the Scriptures, is, the Bible says 'through the grace,' and we said 'by the grace.' Br. Grosh must "undertake the duty' of correcting Peter's 'error' also, for we used his words without a scrap of comment, leaving them, in our article just as we found them in the Scriptures."

I feel ashamed to offer any reply to such an argument —ashamed for Br. W. Every school-boy knows that "THROUGH the grace" of Jesus, at once implies that the cause of salvation is beyond that through which it reaches unto us. But Br. Whittemore's "BY the grace" of Jesus, without naming any other actor, implies that the cause of salvation is that grace. Br. W. is very modest, therefore, in holding up the apostle Peter as a mere shield to ward off a denial of his erroneous "by." The plain difference between "through" and "by" in these phrases, is also a point blank contradiction of Br. W.'s declaration, that he used Peter's words "without a scrap of comment [or alteration? Br. W.?] leaving them in our article just as we found them in the Scriptures"!!!

And again—in the article entitled "Reply Delayed," he says—"the fresh trouble that has broken out in his [my] mind, because we said that Universalists hold that all men shall at last be saved through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," etc. I fear that Br. W.'s reverence and conscientiousness were in a partial paralysis when he penned that article, and especially if he did not blush when he italicised the words above italicised, as having been said by him! He never used that sentence in his first article, consequently, I did not feel any trouble "because," etc. So endeth this chapter. The remainder of his two articles belongs to our discussion on the worship of Christ, and their arguments will be duly attended to when I publish and reply to his long article on that subject—probably next week.

Br. Whittemore prays me "as a friend and brother to review" my "opinions on this point." I more earnestly, and quite as affectionately entreat and beseech him to review his unfair practices in this controversy, and abandon them speedily, for his own credit and that of the denomination; for I consider his practical errors to be far worse than my theoretical ones can be.

A. B. G.

THANKS—THANKS.

Heart-felt thanks to our many friends who are pouring in the light of hope on the dark cloud that hung over the future, and rendering the pathway of labor and duty more bright and cheering before us! We may not particularize, but suffice it to say, that letters, filled with kind and soothing words—praises from those whom we love and whose judgments we much confide in—apologies for past neglects and promises of speedy atonement for the future—names of new subscribers; and above all, those substantial tokens of support which, alone, can enable us to meet the heavy claims against us now rapidly falling due—such letters are coming in daily, and the number gradually increasing, so as to warrant the hope, that soon our troubles and anxieties will be over and gone! The famished, parched traveller in the sunburnt desert can not rejoice with more unfeigned joy and greater gratitude over the first drops of the cooling shower, as they moisten his parched lips, than we do over these remembrances of our friends and agents; and we feel that we should, in duty to them, thus express our thanks, and the expanding hope we so strongly feel, that they will continue to come in, until the great need that renders them so welcome, is entirely removed by their aid. God bless their senders! A. B. G.

DISCONTINUANCES.

We consider ourselves no longer under obligations to notice requests to discontinue. If those who wished to discontinue, and have neglected to notify until this late date, can not supply their places by some other responsible names, they are in justice bound to take the volume. We have suffered an immense loss every year, by such negligent subscribers, who neglect to notify a discontinuance until some two or three numbers are issued, and then refuse to take their papers, thinking, perhaps, that so few numbers will make but little difference to the Publishers. It is true, that three or four numbers are of no great consequence, but one hundred times three or four are, especially when they break as many files of the paper. All we ask is justice.

G. AND H.

CORRECTION.

Our notice published last week respecting George Davis, proves to be incorrect. He had paid an agent who thinks he forwarded the money to us, but we had no credit on our book, and hence the notice.

REMOVAL.

Br. Wm. M. Delong has removed from Lebanon to Oran, Onondaga county. All letters and papers intended for him, are requested to be directed to the latter place.

NEW AGENTS.

W. S. Wood, Moscow, Mich.—David Dain, Canajoharie.

Br. Rogers—We ordered the Pro and Con some time since, for Lorenzo N. Phinney, Cazenovia, Madison county, N. Y. He has not received it. We directed you to credit him $1, and charge us, and now repeat the request.

Messrs. Clark and Edson—We last week ordered the Knickerbocker for Rev. A. Williams, Poolville. We were wrong, it should have been Andrew Forbes, same office. We have paid Mr. Tiffany, your agent.

The next term of the Clinton Liberal Institute will commence on Monday, the 21st inst.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br. N. DOOLITTLE, at North Norwich, and at Sherburne in the evening.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in February, by Br. BULLARD, at Preble Corners, at 10 o'clock, A. M., and at Tully, at 1 o'clock. P. M., and Vesper in the evening, and also at same time and place once in four weeks until further notice—Br. DOOLITTLE, at McDonough village, and Br. A. G. CLARK, at North Norwich.

Br. WM. SIAS, will preach on the evenings of January 28th, at Phœnix, as Br. Breed may appoint—29th, at Cold Spring Settlement—30th, at Clay Corners—31st, at Cicero Corners—February 1st, at Rotterdam—4th, at Champion village—5th, at Theresa—6th, at Pamelia 4 Corners—7th, near Br. Woodruff's—11th, at Hannibalville—12th, at Bracket's Settlement—13th, at Jennings Corners—14th, at Mexicoville—15th, at Pulaski—18th, at Redfield Square—19th, at Florence, as friends may appoint—20th, at Williamstown—21st, at Mexico, near Br. Dauby's—22d, at Scriba Corners.

A Conference will be held at the Great Brook meeting-house, South New-Berlin, the 23d and 24th inst.—Ministering brethren respectfully invited to attend.

The third Conference of the Chenango Association of Universalists, will be held at the Methodist chapel in Greene, on Wednesday and Thursday, February 13th and 14th.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P H E, New Milford (Pa) for H L—C C B, Niles (Mich) for H D, L R S and A W—A L, East Haven (Ct)—J P R, Quincy (Ills) for self, J M S, S H, P P, W C P and J W—C C, Green Oak (Mich) for self and J H—P M, Granges (O)—P M, Exeter (N H) for J S—P M, White's Store—P M, Jacksonville, for W A T and J T—Rev G W M, Auburn, for J S E, J D C, P M, N I, D M, J S, J C, E B, D H, J A, D B, G S, C S, A B, R R and P P—J B, St. Johnsville, for self, and T B. ☞The letter contained only a $2 bill instead of $3.—E W W, Alps, for self, J J, I W and G G—P M, North Easton—W S, Middlefield, for self, A G, M G, S S, B D N—P M, South Hadley, for C T and B M—C H R, Oakland, for self and D E—P M, Manlius Centre, for W C J—P M, Ripley, for J O—C W, North East, Pa, for self, S L and J B—A G W, Williamson, for self and B N—D B, Harpersville—for T K, A B, J W, D W, I H, G C and W S—P M, Canandaigua, for G D and J G—P M, Clockville, for C B and S G—P M, Linden, for A J W and E B—P M, Knowlesville for A S, W C T, T B, W P and J D—C L B, West Lincklaen for E E—P M, Logan, for self, A F, W B, G S, P S, G H and H H—Rev G W M, Auburn, for A B, S B, C B and S Y—B M, East Pembroke, for self and B L—Rev J F, Denmark, for self and P M—C C, Clayton, for self, C P and D P—C W, North East, (Pa) for self S P and J B—P M, Lyme, (O) for H D and P S—P M, Commerce, (Mich) for C H P and W S—G C, Louisville, (Ky) for J L S, J B, S L, L B, W O, J M S and E A—W S W, Moscow, (Mich) for self and G B—P M, South Scituate, (R I) for S S and E W—P M, Benton Centre, for P S and S M S—Rev J W B, Hinsdale, (N H) for A H and C W—J F D, North Wolfeborough, (N H) for self, J A T and J C—P M, Waterville, for S C—P M, Romulus, for J H S and A B C—J P, Prattsbug, for self I S and A S B—C T C, Madison, for C C, Peoria, Ills pays 2-3 v 10—J F O, Norwalk. (O) for self, M S and T H—P M, Parkman, (O) for J D and S S—P M, Marion, (Mich) for D P, L B and L E B—U C, Castile—J W, Richmondville, for self, T F, S K, C Z, N F, M C, D W, R R E and J J—W L, Poolville—C B, Earlville—J L, Eaton—E D W, D J B and B L, Hamilton—B H and H N Georgetown—P M, South Amenia, for E B and H H—Rev J C E, Earlville—P M, Greenwood, for self, N J and E V L—B T, Erieville, for M H H—G P, Hornby, for T H, J P and A E—J B, Earlville—F F C, Cuba—J P, Potsdam, for self, F S, J M, and A B—P M, Cooperstown, for C N C, A T, O W, O L W and P P—S H L, Waterville—Rev M B N, Amsterdam, for S H P—S J, Adams, for self, A E, A T and I N B—P M, Victor, for L D—L O F, Parma—J H V, South Bainbridge—P M, Coventryville—C G, Reading—G M D, Mentor, (O)—M B, Buffalo, for self, J W G, A Z, G A M and A C M—A G P, Hoosick, for self, J P, R C and A F W,

POETRY.

From the New-Yorker.

UNPUBLISHED STANZAS OF LORD BYRON.

The following lines by the "noble bard" of England, never before appeared in print. They were communicated to the New-Yorker by a gentleman who transcribed them from the original autograph. There is no manner of doubt of their genuineness; indeed, their authenticity is placed beyond question, by the fact of their having been received direct from the late Lady Caroline Lamb, cousin to his Lordship.

I heard thy fate without a tear,
My loss with scarce a sigh;
And yet thou wert surpassing dear—
Too loved of all to die!
I know not what hath seared mine eye—
The tears refuse to start,
But every drop its lids deny,
Fall dreary on my heart!

Yes, deep and heavy, one by one,
They sink, and turn to care—
As caverned waters wear the stone,
Yet, dropping, harden there;
They can not petrify more fast,
Than feelings sunk, remain,
Which, coldly fixed, regard the past,
But never melt again!

DEATH'S FINAL CONQUEST.

These fine moral stanzas were originally intended for a solemn funeral song, in a play of James Shirley's entitled "The Contention of Ajax and Ulysses." This little poem is said to have been a favorite song with king Charles II.—Percy's Reliques of Ancient Poetry.

The glories of our birth and state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armor against fate;
Death lays its icy hands on kings:
Scepter and crown
Must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal made
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Some men with swords may reap the field,
And plant fresh laurels where they kill;
But their strong nerves at last must yield;
They tame but one another still.
Early or late
They stoop to fate,
And must give up their murmuring breath,
When they pale captives creep to death.

The garlands wither on your brow,
Then boast no more your mighty deeds;
Upon death's purple altar now
See where the victor victim bleeds.
All heads must come
To the cold tomb,
Only the actions of the just
Smell sweet, and blossom in the dust.

THE BIBLE.

A late number of the Baltimore Chronicle contains a letter from the Hon. John Q. Adams to a literary society in Baltimore, in answer to one in which he was requested to point out the authors most worthy of their attention. The following extract from this letter, bearing testimony to the value of the Scriptures, is well worthy of a perusal:

"The first, and almost the only book deserving such universal recommendation, IS THE BIBLE—and in recommending that, I fear that some of you will think I am performing a superfluous, and others a very unnecessary office—yet such is my deliberate opinion. The Bible is the book of all others to be read at all ages and in all conditions of human life;—not to be read once or twice or thrice through, and then to be laid aside, but to be read in small portions of one or two chapters, every day, and never to be intermitted unless by some overruling necessity.

This attentive and repeated reading of the Bible, in small portions every day, leads the mind to habitual meditation upon subjects of the highest interest to the welfare of the individual in this world, as well as to prepare him for that hereafter to which we are all destined. It furnishes rules of conduct for our conduct towards others in our social relations. In the commandments delivered from Sinai, in the inimitable sublimity of the Psalms and of the Prophets, in the profound and concentrated observations upon human life and manners embodied in the Proverbs of Solomon, in the philosophical allegory so beautifully set forth in the narrative of facts, whether real or imaginary, of the Book of Job, an active mind can not peruse a single chapter and lay the book aside to think, and take it up again to-morrow, without finding in it advice for our own conduct, which we may turn to useful account in the progress of our daily pilgrimage upon earth—and when we pass from the Old Testament to the New, we meet at once a system of universal morality founded upon one precept of universal application, pointing us to peace and good will towards the whole race of man for this life, and to peace with God, and an ever blessed existence hereafter.

My friends, if all or any of you have spiritual pastors to guide you in the paths of salvation, do not imagine that I am encroaching upon the field of their appropriate services:—I speak as a man of the world to men of the world, and I say to you Search the Scriptures! If ever you tire of them in seeking for a rule of faith and a standard of morals, search them as records of HISTORY. General and compendious history is one of the fountains of human knowledge to which you should all resort with steady and persevering pursuit. The Bible contains the only authentic introduction to the history of the world—and in storing your minds with the facts of this history, you will immediately perceive the need of assistance from Geography and Chronology. These assistances you may find in many of the Bibles published with commentaries, and you can have no difficulty in procuring them. Acquaint yourselves with the Chronology and Geography of the Bible—that will lead you to a general knowledge of Chronology and of Geography, ancient and modern, and those will open to you an inexhaustible fountain of knowledge, respecting the globe which you inhabit, and respecting the race of man, its inhabitants to which you yourselves belong. You may pursue these inquiries just so far as your time and inclination will permit. Give one hour of mental application (for you must not read without thinking, or you will read to little purpose)—give an hour of joint reading and thought of the Chronology, and one to the Geography of the Bible, and if it introduces you to too hard a study, stop there. Even for those two hours, you will ever afterwards read the Bible, and any other history, with more fruit—more intelligence—more satisfaction. But, if those two hours excite your curiosity, and tempt you to devote a part of an hour every day for a year or years, to study thoroughly the Chronology and Geography of the Bible, it will not only lead you far deeper than you will otherwise ever penetrate into the knowledge of the Book, but it will shed floods of light upon every step you shall ever afterwards take in acquiring the knowledge of profane history, and upon the local habitation of every tribe of man, and upon the name of every nation into which the children of Adam have been divided."

FORMALITY.

For, as the shadows are longest when the sun is lowest, and as vines, and other fruit trees, bear less fruit, when they are suffered to luxuriate and spend their sap upon superfluous suckers, and abundance of leaves; so commonly, we may observe, both in civil conversation, where there is great store of formality, there is little sincerity; and in religion, where there is a decay of true cordial piety, there men entertain and please themselves, and vainly hope to please God, with external formalities and performances, and great store of that righteousness, for which Christ shall judge the world.—Chillingworth.

HOW UNIVERSAL IT IS.

We never yet knew the man who would say, "I am contented." Go where you will, among the rich and poor, the man of competence, or the man who earns his bread by the daily sweat of his brow, you hear the sound of murmuring and the voice of complaint.

The other day we stood by a cooper, who was playing a merry tune with his adze around a cask. "Ah!" sighed he, "mine is a hard lot—forever trotting round and round like a dog, driving away at a hoop."

"Heigho!" sighed a blacksmith, in one of the late hot days, as he wiped the drops of perspiration from his brow, while the red hot iron glowed on his anvil—"this is life with a vengeance! melting and frying one's self over a burning furnace."

"Oh that I were a carpenter!" ejaculated a shoemaker, as he bent over a lapstone—"here am I, day after day wearing my soul away in making soles for others; cooped up in this little 7 by 9 room—heigho."

"I am sick of this out-door work," exclaims the carpenter, "broiling under a sweltering sun, or exposed to the inclemencies of the weather—if I was only a tailor!"

"This is too bad!" perpetually cries the tailor, "to be compelled to sit perched up here, plying the needle all the time—would that mine was a more active life."

"Last day of grace—banks won't discount—customers won't pay; what shall I do?" grumbles the merchant. "I had rather be a truck horse—a dog—any thing."

"Happy fellows!" groans the lawyer, as he scratches his head over some perplexing case, or pores over some dry, musty record; "happy fellows! I had rather hammer stone than cudgel my brains on this tedious, vexatious question."

And on through all the ramifications of society, all are complaining of their condition—finding fault with their particular calling. "If I were only this, or the other, I should be content," is the universal cry—"any thing but what I am." So goes the world—so it has gone, and so it will go.

PUNISHMEMT OF DEATH IN AUSTRIA.

During the time that Ferdinand has been on the throne of his ancestors, the blood of not one of his millions of Austrian subjects has flowed upon the scaffold. One man was condemned to death for murder, in the second year after his ascension; but his heart revolted against the barbarous punishment which the law still retains for that offence, and he commuted the sentence to imprisonment for life—a punishment equally coercive with death, but which gives the opportunity and inducement to repentance, and does not destroy in the minds of the people the salutary notion of the sacredness of life, which prince and legislators should ever cultivate and guard.—Aberdeen paper.

MARRIAGES.

In the city of Buffalo, January 1st, 1839, by Rev. David Pickering, Mr. GEORGE A. MOORE, to Miss CATHARINE A. BROWN.

Also, Mr. JOHN O. MOORE, to Miss SUSAN MORRISON, all of Buffalo.

In this city, on the 9th inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. RILEY W. LORING, to Miss ALMIRA WALTON, both of Saquoit.

In this city, January 1st, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. ALLEN DEWITT, to Miss LYDIA E. WICKHAM, all of this city.

In Scipio, on the evening of the 8th of November last, by Rev. H. Boughton, Mr. ORSON M. WELCH, of Moravia, to Miss LOUISA TABER, daughter of Hon. Wing Taber of the former place.

In Lansing, on the evening of the 6th ult., by the same, Mr. WM. T. REMINTON, of Genoa, to Miss CATHARINE E. HOSKIN, of the former place.

In Perry, November 20th, by Rev. S. Barnes, Mr. JOSIAH W. KINGSLEY, to Mrs. SALLY D. EDGERLY, all of Perry.

In Charleston, Montgomery county, October 9th, by Rev. L. C. Marvin, Mr. JOHN BERGOFF, to Miss CATHARINE STALEY, both of Charleston.

In Duanesburgh, November 28th, by the same, Mr. JACOB MERACLE, to Miss JANE DELONG, of Duanesburgh.

In Orange, October 28th, by Rev. D. Van Alstine, Mr. WILLIAM HENDRICK, to Miss LORENZA CHAMBERLINE.

By the same, December 12th, Mr. CHARLES JONES, to Miss PAMELIA M. CALPIN, both of Orange.

DEATHS.

In this city, December 21st, CHARLES W., son of Woodman and Hannah Kimball, aged one year and seven months.

In Oxbow, December 30th, Mrs. ABIGAIL BRAINARD, aged 34 years. In the death of this amiable woman, an afflicted husband is called, a second time, to mourn the loss of his nearest earthly friend. Sister B. was early taught and embraced the Abrahamic faith, and this, aided by her natural soundness of mind, and goodness of heart, conducted her to that rectitude of life which ought ever to accompany the Christian faith. Firm in her faith, she was sustained and consoled by it during a long illness. She directed, with perfect tranquility, the arrangements of her funeral; requesting that Br. Britton should preach the funeral sermon, not knowing that he had left that section, on which account, it became the writer's lot to administer the consolations of the Gospel to a sympathising congregation, from Jeremiah viii: 22. J. FRENCH.

In New-Hartford, on the 3d inst., ANDREW JACKSON, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Rockwell, aged eight months.—May the mourners be comforted by "the faith once delivered to the saints." T. D. COOK.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within four months; $2.00 if not paid within four months; or $2.50 if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis; and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞To City subscribers who receive their papers by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00 if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME X. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, JANUARY 25, 1839. NUMBER 4.

CHRISTMAS SERMON.

Delivered on Christmas Eve, in Lebanon, Madison county, N. Y., and now published by request.

BY REV. W. M. DELONG.

"Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins."—MATT. i: 21.

How full of meaning, and deep with interest is this expression! How momentous the task assigned, and how interesting to mankind the labors that devolved upon the meek Son of Mary! The sable curtain of mental darkness had long hung over our world. Ignorance, with her iron hand, had bound the people in superstition's chains—darkness covered the earth, and gross darkness its inhabitants. Long had mankind experienced the peace-destroying effects of being alienated from God, and long, too, had mental delusion usurped the control of man; and errors, the most revolting and absurd, had crept into the church, corrupted its doctrines, and obscured, by human traditions, the faintly reflected rays of divine truth. The pure worship of the great "I AM," had become neglected, and "the glory of the incorruptible God, had been changed into an image made like unto corruptible man, birds, four footed beasts and creeping things." Those altars, on which were once offered the heart-felt tributes of gratitude and praise to the God of heaven, and where his approving smiles were enjoyed, were no longer favored with his presence, on account of the wickedness of the people, and the corrupt doctrines which had crept in among them. Four hundred years had passed, and no prophet had appeared in the land of Israel, no seer to lift the curtain and penetrate the future, and foretell its events, had been among them. "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners, had spoken to the Fathers by the prophets," had ceased to reveal his designs through man, and no kind prophetic voice was heard. The people had made void the law by their traditions, and neglected the fulfilment of its important requirements—such as justice, mercy and fidelity;—they had perverted the true character of God, and wandered far, far from the fountain of goodness and love.—They practiced upon the principle of revenge—rendered railing for railing and evil for evil. Mercy they regarded not, for they had no compassion on the needy: their love had forsaken its throne, except to gratify their sensual desires, and promote their own aggrandizement, and advance their own sordid, selfish interests. Hence all that constituted the pure principles of religion, was swallowed up in idolatry—and nought was left but its mere name. Ah! how great was the necessity of a reformation! and, to the mind of man, how dark, how dismal the prospect of causing fair virtue, to again assume her throne and control the hearts of mankind!

But the time was at hand, when a new era was to be ushered in—when heaven-born purity should sway the sceptre of all hearts, when truth, emanating from the throne of eternal and immutable Love, should reign in all its purity and loveliness, and cause light to shine and dispel the darkness, that had long veiled the mental horizon, and shed its happy beams over a benighted and sinful world. This new era had long and anxiously been looked for. Israel had been waiting for her deliverance from that darkness, which had long hung, like the sable curtain of night, over her benighted head. Prophets had foretold her deliverance, and spoken of the Shiloh who would come at the departure of Judah's sceptre—and that, "unto him should be the gathering of the people;" and most devoutly did they wish for his appearance. Not only did the Jews anxiously wait for his coming, but some of the most enlightened of the Gentiles expected the appearance of some extraordinary personage. Nor did they look in vain!

The sun had shone for the last time upon the mental darkness, which then hung over our world—the evening shades had fallen upon the earth, still and silent was all around, save here and there, a low murmur of the evening zephyr. The laborer had ceased from his toil. The busy multitude, which had assembled at the inn, in the city of Bethlehem, had retired to seek repose in the embrace of sleep. No light, save the faint glimmering of the twinkling stars, was seen by mortal eye. The peaceful shepherds were silently watching their fleecy care on Bethlehem's plains, when, suddenly as the electric shock, burst forth to their vision, a light, exceeding in splendor the brightness of the noon-day sun. Fear and amazement seized the timid shepherds—trembling and speechless they stood, as if some frighful phenomenon had appeared, when in accents mild and lovely, the messenger said, "Fear not"—no dread calamity is about to befall you—there is no occasion for fear and trembling—be calm and composed—"for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people. For unto you is born, this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you, ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, and lying in a manger." And suddenly, the plains of benighted Judea echoed with the joyful anthem, "Glory to God in the highest—peace on earth, and good will to men."

Such was the introduction of that divine personage into our world, of whom the text says—"his name shall be called JESUS; for he shall save his people from their sins." Humble was his appearance, and lowly his dwelling. No glittering robes bedecked his form—no costly gems or shining pearls adorned his habitation—his dwelling was a hovel, and his cradle a manger! Although our Saviour appeared in this humble manner, he was destined to ascend, and reign King of kings and Lord of lords. It was his to burst the fetters of mental darkness, and pour a flood of light and joy over a degraded and miserable world.

Having mentioned the manner of our Saviour's advent, we shall now inquire the object of his mission.

And here we would remark, although it may be a digression from our subject, that, in addition to the evidence afforded in this Book, of the being and character of Jesus, history, both profane and ecclesiastical, acknowledge that there was such a person, admit the supreme goodness of his moral teachings, and agree in declaring his universal benevolence. That there was such a person, whose doctrine was founded on the best principles of heavenly wisdom—whose religion consisted in justice, mercy and charity—whose integrity and philanthropy, were never surpassed, if equalled—and whose zeal in promoting and extending the happiness of humanity was never known to abate—that there was such a person, admits of no rational doubt, and can be proved as well, or by as good authority, as that any particular person named in history, lived eighteen centuries ago.

It is true, that infidelity may scoff and ridicule the idea of a Saviour, and reject divine revelation as a fable, the conjecture of an enthusiastic or heated brain; but, of one thing we are certain, the moral principles, or laws, which Jesus laid down and encouraged, are infinitely better, than any that infidelity or skepticism can devise.—They may talk of moral virtue, of genuine benevolence, of social feelings, and of brotherly love; they may converse upon the evils of society—upon the licentiousness of man yielding to his wicked passions, but we ask, from whence did a knowledge of things proceed?—from whence came our ideas of right and wrong, except from a faithful study, a long experience of the truth, of the laws and principles laid down in this Book?

But as our object, this evening, is not so much to prove that there was such a person as Jesus, as to show the object of his mission, and the final completion of the same, we shall now turn our attention to this interesting, joyful, and happy subject. Interesting—because, if Jesus came to save his people from their sins, we wish to know who his people are; consequently, who are to be saved. And all feel a deep and thrilling interest to know their final doom. Joyful and happy—because, if we learn that all people belong to him, and, therefore, that all will be made partakers of his salvation, nothing can make us more joyful and happy. Nothing can inspire us with more and purer love for one another, nothing can serve more to kindle in our souls a flame of gratitude to our almighty Creator, and nothing will enable us better to endure the trials of life, and make us more resigned in the solemn and dreaded hour of death.

The object of our Saviour's advent, is of such momentous importance to every individual, that we would not suppose, that any persons would neglect to acquaint themselves with it. And the testimony he has left to settle this important inquiry, is so clear and conclusive, that the feeblest capacity need not mistake its meaning. Previous to the advent of Jesus, mankind were ignorant of the true character and attributes of Jehovah.—They had clothed him in the habiliments of wrath, and crowned him with injustice and cruelty;—His arm was the arm of an oppressor—His word was the mandate of a tyrant—His throne was the seat of vengeance, and His requirements unpleasant and severe. Well was it said of them, that they were in darkness. "Darkness covered the earth, and gross darkness the people." Well, too, were they represented as dead—dead to all the enjoyments which flow from correct views of the character of God. Dead to all the happiness, lost to all the peace and consolation, which is to be derived from a knowledge of infinite goodness, boundless benevolence and love. But it was the object of our Saviour to instruct the ignorant, to enlighten the darkened understanding of the people, and to acquaint them with the strong, quenchless parental love of their almighty Benefactor; and to reveal his character to a benighted and sinful world. Hence it is said, "No man hath seen God at any time. The only begotten Son of the Father, he hath revealed him." The design of our Saviour's advent, is clearly expressed in the words of our text: And the angel said, "His name shall be called Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins."—The name Jesus signifies a Saviour, or a Deliverer; hence Jesus is called "the Saviour of the world."

Now, one who delivers from sin, danger, or misery is a Saviour. For this reason, Washington is justly denominated the Saviour of America—the Deliverer of his people from the hand of the oppressor. But how, we ask, could he be called the Saviour of America, unless he had succeeded in beating back the heavy tide of oppression, that rolled upon her from the mother country? If Washington had succeeded in delivering but one third, one half, or two thirds of America from political bondage, while the other two thirds, one half, or one third, were under the yoke of British usurpation, and subject to the control of the crown, would there be any propriety, any consistency, or any reason for denominating him the Saviour of America? It would be contrary to all reason, and preposterous in the extreme, to give him this appellation, or honor him with this title, unless he had delivered the American people—not a part of them, but the whole of them—from tyranny and oppression.

Jesus is called the "Saviour of the world," "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world"—"the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world," and unless he proves the Saviour of the world; the taker away of the sins of the world, and the propitiation for the sins of the whole world; unless he destroys all sin—makes an end of transgression, and brings in everlasting righteousness and peace; unless he reconciles the world to himself, how can he, with any degree of propriety, bear the name of "Jesus—the Saviour of the world?"

Again—you will take notice that Jesus came to "save his people from their sins." From this, we discover that his people were sinners—that it was to save sinners that he came upon the earth; for, says he, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance"—"they that are whole, need not the physician, but they who are sick." It was the sickly, the unhealthy sinner whom Jesus came to save. Who, but the sick need the physician? Who but they on whom some fatal disease has fallen, need the healing virtue, the saving influence of the physician's balm? It would be to reverse all the just laws of physical economy, to administer medicine to the stout, the robust and the healthy.

If there was a design, we ask, what that design was? And if an effect, what is it? "Thou shalt call his name JESUS; for he shall save his people from their sins?"

There are several important and useful ideas suggested to the mind on reading this passage, and a proper and correct understanding of which will obviate one important objection that is brought against Christianity, and settle a great many disputes now agitated in the Christian church.

Who are Christ's people? There are two ways by which this question may be answered.—We learn by the text that his people are sinners. Let us ascertain then how many are sinners, and how many of the human family were given to Jesus. How many have violated the law of God? "Sin is the transgression of the law;" and how many are there who have violated the commands of Heaven? All—"all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." "Death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Now as all have sinned, so all are sinners; and all that are sinners are objects of Christ's saving grace—are his people.

Secondly, how great a number of the human family are given to Jesus? Answer, God has given all things to Christ as the moral ruler of the world. Saith He, "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee. Ask of me, and I will give thee, the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." Ps. ii: 7, 8. "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand."—John iii: 35. God has given all mankind to Christ that he might save them; hence, he himself says, "Thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him."—John xvii: 2. Here our Saviour affirms that power is given him over all flesh; for this reason, that he should give eternal life to all.

What is eternal life? "This is eternal life, that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent"—and, "all shall know me, from the least to the greatest." "All that the Father giveth me, shall come to me, and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." Here we have the testimony of Jesus, that power is given him over all flesh, and that the Father hath given all things into his hands; and that all that the Father hath given him, shall come to him. Here, then, we have determined who are Christ's people. All that are sinners—all that are given him, are his. And his dominion is from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth. "All people, and nations, and languages shall serve him." "His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away; and his kingdom, that which shall not be destroyed." "All the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him." He is the head of every man—"His people" includes the vast family of intelligences; whether past, present, or yet unborn. And his name was expressly called Jesus, because he was to save his people from their sins.

Your special attention is invited to this part of my subject; for it is on this point that we differ from Christians of other denominations, and it is on this subject that an objection is urged against the truth of the sacred Volume.

Here, says the unbeliever, is a contradiction. We are informed in one part of the Bible, that no sin shall pass without a just recompense of reward—"though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished," that God "will by no means clear the guilty," but "he will render to every man according to his deeds.' And in another part we read, that Jesus will save his people from their sins—"will take away the sins of the world." Now, says he, how can the sins of the world be pardoned, remitted, or forgiven, and yet mankind punished according to their just deserts? Or, what is the use of talking about punishing men for their sins, when they are to be forgiven?

This seeming contradiction of the objector is based on ignorance of the object of Christ's advent. It is founded on the popular error, that Jesus came to save mankind from the punishment of sin. We grant that the Bible speaks of "saving man from sin," of "forgiving iniquity;" but it no where speaks of saving him from punishment, or of forgiving him the just deserts of his sinful course. Sin is a cause, and punishment the effect; therefore when the Bible speaks of the forgiveness of sins, it does not mean the forgiveness of punishment. Hence it is said, "The Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty." "Thou shalt call his name JESUS: for he shall save (or deliver) his people from their sins." Not from the punishment of their sins, nor yet from a sulphurous, burning Tartarus, in a future state of being, unto which they are exposed, on account of their transgression. No—but deliver, save his people from their sins. He will take away the sins of the world. He will subdue the rebellious passions of men; take away transgression, make an end of sin, and reconcile a world to God. This was his object; this was, and is the purpose for which Jesus came into our world; hence it is again said, "We have seen and do testify, that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.

The object of our Saviour's mission, is most beautifully expressed in his own words—"The Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost." And Isaiah says, "All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquities of us all." Mankind had wandered from the pure fountain of living waters, and strayed from the fruitful pastures of a Father's bounty, and become bewildered in the fruitless desert of sin and wo. But, like a kind and faithful shepherd, the Saviour appeared to search out the wanderer—reclaim the lost, and to reconcile a world to God.

In demonstration of this object of his mission, "he went about doing good." He publicly attacked and refuted error—healed the sick—comforted the afflicted—inspired the doubting with hope, and poured the oil and wine of consolation, into the grief-worn and mourning heart. The howling tempest obeyed his voice; the boisterous waves of the troubled ocean became calm at his command, and the sleeping dead burst from the embrace of the silent tomb, at his commanding voice, and proved the truth; that he was the Son of God. He taught the deep, unchanging goodness of his Father, by arguments drawn from nature's ample field, and declared that God was kind even to the unthankful and the evil; and that "God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world, through him might be saved." By his miracles, the doubts of the skeptical were removed, the unbelief of the opposer shaken, and the coldness and indifference of mankind, generally, were aroused to inquiry, to see whether these things were so. He asked no burnt offerings; no vain sacrifices, and no pilgrimage to the temple's altar, did he require of his disciples. Naught but the heart's best affections—the highest, holiest tribute of gratitude, and the purest expressions of thankfulness did he ask, or demand of his followers. And beneath the influence of his doctrine, the moral desert began to wear a far different, and a far more lovely aspect, from what it previously had done. Many flocked around the standard of truth, with lives reformed, and joy beaming from their countenances. Those terrific ideas which had been entertained relative to the divine Being, began to be dispelled by the more cheering and lovely views of his character.

And, to add more beauty and excellency to the doctrine of Jesus, his life corresponded with the precepts he taught. Did he require mankind to love their enemies, and to seek to do them good? O, how deep and strong was this principle manifested by him, towards his worst and bitterest foes. When brought before the tribunal of his persecutors, no anger nor malice burnt within his breast; no threatenings of vengeance, and no denunciations of wrath, were heard from his lips. But he submitted, with calmness and composure, to his fate, and drank the bitter cup without a murmur. And when the combined powers of darkness, had sought, by all other means, to stop him from declaring the message of peace—after they had persecuted him, and ill-treated him, by every means which their evil imaginations could invent, and, finding that none of them could accomplish their design, when they conspired to put him to death, lifted high, upon the cross of Calvary, the Lord of life and glory—still, the same spirit was manifested by him. Benevolence had not forsaken its throne. His heart was still warm with goodness, and, in his last expiring breath, he breathed forth, in accents mild and lovely, this tender petition—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." O! how strong must be that love! how divine that fountain, from which this is but an emanation!

And will—can this love fail in accomplishing its object? No—never! For "Jesus came to save his people from their sins." He is the bread of God, which came down from heaven, to impart life and peace to their fainting and famishing souls. He is the author and finisher of our faith, who, for the joy that was set before him, (which was the reconciliation of the world to God) endured the cross, despising the shame. He is the Sun of Righteousness which arose with healing on his wings—the Physician, who can cure our moral maladies, and the Saviour, who will, in due time, destroy sin and death, and bring in everlasting righteousness and peace.

"I came down from heaven," says he, "not to do mine own will, but the will of Him that sent me." Now, if we can ascertain what that will is, which he came to do, we shall, again, have determined what was the object of our Saviour's advent—what his love will certainly accomplish.—"I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the will of him that sent me, that of all he hath given me, I should lose nothing, but will raise it up at the last day." Here you will remember, that "all power was given him in heaven and on earth"—"power over all flesh." The heathen and the uttermost parts of the earth, are given him for his possession—are his inheritance. Now notice, "This is the Father's will which hath sent me—that of all he hath given me, I shall lose nothing, but raise it up at the last day." Again, the apostle, when speaking of the will, and the purpose of God, says, "God hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence, having made known unto us the mystery of his will according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself—that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him." Again, the apostle says, "God will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." It is the will of God, that Jesus should lose nothing that he gave him, and he has given all things into his hands. It is his will that, in the dispensation of the fulness of times, all intelligent beings might be gathered together in Christ, and it is his will that all should be saved, and come unto a knowledge of the truth. Now, Jesus came to do the will of his Father—to finish the work that was given him to do: and will he do it? Will he reconcile the world unto God? Will he accomplish the object of his mission? and thereby save his people from their sins? Yes. Saith the prophet, "The pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hands; he shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied."

His work is onward, progressive and sure. It is in the hands of a wise, judicious and able Master-builder. He will not be too hasty in the completion of his work, neither will he suffer it to relax—or give up the reins of government, until he shall have accomplished and completed the object of his mission—until all men shall have received his truth—till righteousness and peace pervade every heart, and joy and gladness beam from the countenances of every son and daughter of humanity. Then, and not till then, will the pleasure of the Lord have prospered in his hands, and he have seen of the travail of his soul and be satisfied. Not till then will he deliver up the kingdom to God the Father; "For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet."—"The last enemy, death, shall be destroyed," for Christ took upon himself flesh and blood, "that through death, he might destroy him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver all those, who, through fear of death, were all their life-time subject to bondage."

"And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son, also, himself be subject unto him who did put all things under him, that God may be all in all." And then the glorious object of our Saviour's advent will be accomplished. The long-looked for, and the much desired period will then arrive, when the consummation of all things will take place. Sin shall be finished—no more shall its poisonous darts be felt by man. No longer will its baneful influence mar our peace, or destroy our happiness. Sickness and pain no more will prey upon this frame; or sorrow and mourning disturb our enjoyment.—The dread monster, death, will lose his sting; and we, who now dread the approach, and tremble at the thought of dissolution, will be changed from corruption to incorruption; be clothed in robes of immortality, and assimilated to the likeness of our God.

O happy and transporting thought! Oh cheering and heart-gladdening contemplation! All hearts will be vocal with praises to God, and the sweet incense of devotion and gratitude, will ascend, pure and fervent, before the throne of our Father!

May the contemplation of this glorious period inspire our hearts with love to God, and charity and good-will towards our fellow-men; and may each returning anniversary of the birth of Heaven's Anointed, find us worshipping, praising, and adoring, with strong faith and pure hearts, our Father, and the Father of the spirits of all flesh, for this unspeakable and inestimable gift. May the warmest expressions of gratitude be rendered to him, who has purposed, and provided means to effect the ultimate holiness and happiness of all mankind.

For the Magazine and Advocate

PROFANITY.

There is an evil prevailing to an alarming extent, among many who profess to be Universalists, which does more to retard the progress of our holy cause, and brings a deeper and more lasting reproach upon our denomination, than all other causes put together. I refer to the unholy and demoralizing practice of profane, not to say blasphemous, conversation. It is a melancholy fact, that there are those among us, who are good, honest, and benevolent in all their dealings with their fellow-men—regular and punctual in their attendance upon the duties of the sanctuary, and bold and fearless in defending the doctrine of the "restitution" by argument; who, nevertheless, seem to have forgotten that a holy life and godly conversation, are the best and most powerful arguments in favor of Universalism. They seem to have forgotten the old but true adage, that "example is more powerful than precept"—and that although they may "speak with the tongues of men and angels," in defence of our doctrine, yet, if those same tongues are the next moment employed in cursing their fellow-men, and blaspheming the holy name of "the Father of the spirits of all flesh," in language too foul and corrupt to pass without leaving a stain, their influence must and will be unsalutary.

And what will be the conclusion of our opposers, on this subject, when they behold so detestable a practice persevered in by those who profess Universalism? They will tell us that although "it is a doctrine pleasing to the carnal mind," yet it fails to restrain the sinful and corrupt desires of our natures—that it opens the flood-gates of iniquity, and leads its believers into all manner of licentiousness and impiety. The fact is, that our opposers, when selecting an example by which to illustrate the effect of Universalism upon the lives of those who embrace it, are extremely cautious not to select one who lives his doctrine, as well as professes it—but, on the contrary, they always point you to one who, although loud in his professions, and boisterous in defending it from the attacks of its opposers, is, nevertheless, entirely careless of obeying its requirements, or living in accordance with its precepts. And this, they would fain make us believe, is a fair sample of the denomination of Universalists. This being the case, brethren, "what manner of persons ought ye to be, in all holy conversation and godliness." "Let him that hath named the name of the Lord, be careful to depart from iniquity." "Avoid" even "the appearance of evil," and thus "let your light so shine before men, that others seeing your good works, may glorify our Father in heaven." "Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but rather that which is good, to the use of edifying." "Swear not at all—thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless, that taketh his name in vain."

Now, there surely is not a more unchristian practice, or one that more completely disgraces the name of Universalist, than that of profane swearing. Far better would it be for our cause, if all who indulge in this useless and disgusting practice, would relinquish entirely all claim to the name of Universalist, and join the ranks of those who slander and misrepresent us; for, certainly, they have no just claim to the name, unless they conduct themselves according to its precepts and requirements. "My brethren, these things ought not so to be." "Doth a fountain send forth at the same place, both sweet waters and bitter? Can a fig tree, my brethren, bear olive berries, or a vine, figs?" This would be no more out of the natural course of things, than for the same mouth to send forth both "blessing and cursing."

Who among us, professing Universalism, "is a wise man, and endued with knowledge? Let him show out of a good conversation, his works with meekness and fear." Let your daily walk and conversation, I beseech you, show to all around, that the doctrine of Universalism has a purifying influence upon the hearts and lives of those who embrace it; that it restrains them from the practice of evil, and induces them to practice that which is good. And, oh, what a change in the aspect of our denomination would be seen, if all who profess Universalism, would "put off the old man with his deeds, and put on the new man, which is Christ Jesus." Then would the ancient honors of our holy religion be revived—then would Universalism arise in majesty and strength, and go forward "conquering and to conquer;" while multitudes of converts would flock unto her, "like clouds to their gatherings." God grant to hasten on the glad day, when all who profess Universalism, shall indeed possess it, and practice according to its precepts! H. L. H.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CHAUTAUQUE QUARTERLY CONFERENCE.

Br. Grosh—Our Conference met according to adjournment, at Salem X Roads, (Portland,) on the 19th and 20th of December. Chose Br. Adams Moderator, and Br. Eaton, Clerk. The second day, in the morning, proceeded to organize a church. Brs. McDonald and Lathrop, were chosen deacons, and Br. Sylvester Danforth, Clerk of said church. Among other members who united with us, was Br. and Sister Todd, the parents of L. C. Todd, who a few years since renounced Universalism in this county, but has since told his father that he was insane when he wrote the work against the order he left, from which Mr. Campbell made such a copious extract in his letter to Br. Skinner. We can not but believe that our cause is gaining ground here.—Fifty members united with the church, and partook of the Lord's Supper on the last day of the Conference, in the afternoon. We had a joyful time, and a refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Our hearts burned within us, while we listened to the words of life, and we felt that it was good for us that we assembled in the name of our Saviour. May the great Head of the church watch over us, and preserve us in the unity of the spirit and the bonds of peace. Five sermons were preached on the occasion. Four clergymen were present, viz, Brs. Adams, Paine, Babcock and Eaton. Voted, That Br. Eaton prepare the Minutes of our proceedings for publication in the Magazine and Advocate.

Adjourned, to meet in Columbus, Warren county, Pa., on the third Wednesday and Thursday in February, 1839. T. C. Eaton

Crowded out again.—A desire to oblige our Lebanon friends, by publishing in season the Christmas sermon by Br. Delong, contained in this paper, has induced us to defer some promised articles till our next.—We are getting along, in bringing up the rear, though the size of our sheet does not allow us to do every thing we could wish.

The Knickerbocker for this month, the first of a new volume, (containing an excellent engraving of Peter Stuyvesant, the Dutch Governor of New-York, in all the majesty of wrath at bad news, received through the medium of a Burley-visaged Dutch trumpeter,) has been received, and is noticed unread, because some may have forgotten to subscribe, who will want only to be reminded of it to subscribe immediately.

The Lady's Book for January may be worth naming to our 8000 subscribers; but we can not speak positively, as no copy of it has reached us yet. When it comes, we will notice it as we think it merits.

Removal.—Br. M. B. Smith wishes the Union to notice his removal from Clinton to Salisbury Centre, Herkimer county, where he wishes to be addressed in future.

For the Magazine and Advocate

MEMORY.

Delivered at the Annual Exhibition of Clinton Liberal Institute, August 29, 1838.

BY WM. R. BIDDLECOM.

Memory, the beacon of despair, the talisman of human felicity, the pole-star of genius' mystic flight, how mysterious in its power—how ethereal in its origin—how enrapturing in its influence! It dissipates the dusky twilight of sorrow's nightly reign, disrobes the feelings of the gloomy mantle of mourning, disperses the murky clouds of disappointment, and plants in their stead, the holy joy of youthful association, enkindled into life anew. Like the attraction which pervades all matter, its influence is felt throughout each link of "being's glorious chain," and its power is realized and acknowledged in all the various parts of animate nature.

Association and Hope, the shrines before which the devotee of pleasure offers his most frequent solicitations, at once rush back to it, as the fountain from whence they derive their celestial power. The loftiest enjoyments to be deduced from the depths of science, the benefits and pleasures drawn from the historic page, the treasures of art, and the truths of philosophic lore—all owe their strongest impressions to the inspiration of Memory. The exalted dictates of morality, the sublime truths and holy precepts of religion, may be sternly impressed upon the youthful mind; but how much more indelible is the image of those impressions when remembered in close connection with a father's love, and a mother's undying affection; when in fond recollection they are associated with a lovely home, the domestic circle, and the fireside joys, which ever cluster around the family altar. Man, destitute of its god-like sway, is but the hapless victim of sorrow's barbed shafts—a sportive plaything for the vampire of delusion and folly; without it, he sleeps in the hopeless revery of grief. It is memory that lights up within the soul, the glowing radiance of "Hope's brilliant day-star." It is the recollection of other and holier seasons, that first infuses into the mind the crystal purity which pervades the fountain of anticipation. Unlike the pleasures of anticipation, they are undying, fadeless, and perennial. They are not visionary fantasies, that fade away like the dew, or perish like the rose-bud of an hour. When reason once again assumes her throne, the gay frost-work of fancy melts into an airy void. But, can the wily deception of artful man – can the unholy grasp for dominion's trembling power,

"Snatch the rich relics of a well-spent hour?"

No—these remain until the trembling soul flies—these throw around the parting hour the pellucid stream of calm resignation, and even rise to gild the sapphire courts of heaven. It is Memory that lends to association its richest charms: it first points to that season of life when the young heart was buoyant, and the brow gleamed with heavenly innocence. It is the remembrance of former events, that first opes the flowery field where it plays in all its wonted gambols.

The hours of memory, like the poetic inspiration of the Welsh harp, thrill the whole soul with the electric flashes of joy. It is at such seasons, the mind soars aloft on seraphic wings, and holds converse with the departed spirits of other days. How sweet, in "memory's mellowing glass," to view the treasured scenes of bygone days—to rest the mind's eye in pleasing thought, on the lucid pleasures which once shed a halo of rapture over the troubled soul—to roam, in imagination, among the scenes where whilome we spent our halcyon hours. What subject of reflection sheds such hallowed gleams of triumph to the soul, as "The sweet remembrance of unblemished youth,

The still inspiring voice of innocence and truth."

Such thoughts as these fall upon the soul like the tremulous vibrations of an evening song upon the listening ear. Yes—the holy thoughts of such an hour, rise like the matin orisons of the sainted monastic, to heaven's holy courts, and fill the heart like the rich tones of life's first music.

Without memory, what is friendship? It is but an airy sound—the offspring of an ideal imagination; and oblivion steals over the consecrated word friend, ere the echo dies away on the ear. The world with its cares and anxieties, is but an imperfect sphere for the action of memory; it gives at once an impulse, which partakes too much of the dull monotony of business, and it ever will remain an exotic in the soil of din and tumult. Solitude is the province where it displays its most resplendent beauties. It is at her pensive hour, that contemplation roams free and unrestrained; that the mind wanders back through the dim vista of past time, and gathers the unfading treasures of decayed worth. It is memory alone can seize the keys of knowledge, unlock the portals of renown, and wave on fame's proud heights the magic wand of mind. Mounted on the wings of elevated thought, it is memory can pluck the glittering diadem from science's sublimest tops, and touch the cloud-capt regions of unfading honor. Musing alone among the wrecks of fallen grandeur and ruined ambition, it is memory can recal the refinement of art, witness the soul-subduing might of eloquence, rouse the hidden charms of intellect, and catch the lustrous rays which spangle round the vestal lamp of genius. Or roaming adown the records of the historian, it is memory can catch the last glimmerings of fading excellence, banquet on the treasures of departed time, and hold converse with the spirit of evanescent glory.

What is the alleviating balm it conveys to man? Go, visit the maniac, immured in yonder lonely cell, the silent victim of haggard wo. Few are the gleams of pleasure which visit his soul, as are the rays which steal through the lattice of his solitary prison. He who once struck the thrilling chords of pleasing thought, now tunes on sorrow's plaintive lute, the death-tones of affliction. Of him who once played the harp of poesy, and swept with magic hand the ravished soul, naught remains save a shattered remnant of mental ruin. As he was about to wreathe the pansied garland of fame, the woful voice of penury pealed through his anxious brain the freezing notes of wretchedness. Hope's enchanting minstrelsy died into an echo, and all that is now left, is "A gloomy wilderness of dying thought."

But has his sun of joy forever set? No—the memory of what he once was—the thought that brighter prospects once were his—will entrance his phrenzied soul, like the expiring notes of an evening lay, and bind around his brow the amaranth of content.

The memory of Washington! how sacred to every American heart. When Mount Vernon's "Mecca shrine" shall be no more, his virtues will be cherished in love and admiration. When the marble slab shall have mouldered in loneliness away—when the proud mausoleum, erected to commemorate a nation's gratitude and sorrow, shall have tumbled to the earth—his name will live fadeless and pure, engraven on the entablature of every grateful bosom. In whatever circumstance man is placed, in whatever sphere he may be called to act, its operations are the same. Whether cast upon Arabia's arid sands, he pines in lonely wretchedness among her brutal fiends, or doomed on Norway's rugged cliff to spend a life colder than the icebergs which hang on her brumal rocks, its influence is the same. The bright reflection of better days, will shine through his darkened soul, like the silver beams which steal through the loop-holes of his curtained cell. The fond remembrance of his former lovely home—the friends with whom he chatted away the social hour—the brook that murmured by in babbling music—all recall the wonted sports of youth, rendered doubly pleasing by memory's microscopic power.

Supernal gift! When creation's sons shouted for joyous existence—when yonder circling spheres first sounded the anthem of time—thy reign began. But shall it cease? No! When yonder stars shall no longer gild the vaulted welkin of heaven—when the solar fires shall be but a smoky mass, and all the sister planets but the wreck of chaotic substance—when the last trump shall sound the dissolution of creation's elements—then Memory shall soar aloft triumphant over the darkening clouds of universal ruin.

"When wrapt in fire, the realms of ether glow,
And heaven's last thunder shakes the world below,
Thou, undismayed, shalt o'er the ruins smile,
And light thy torch at Nature's funeral pile!"

For the Magazine and Advocate.

WANT OF ORDER.

BY REV. W. WILCOX.

Perhaps a greater want of order no where exists, than in the Universalist denomination, with regard to the time for holding the annual meetings of our Conventions and Associations. However unimportant this may appear to many, there are reasons to induce a reform. Every one whose heart is engaged in the cause of religion, wishes to obtain a correct statistical account of the situation, growth, and prospects of our united body; yet this is impossible, under our present imperfect arrangements and organization. Let us view the case in its true light, and see whether a reform is not desirable, and easily accomplished. It is well known, that the societies usually report themselves to their several Associations, the Associations to their respective State Conventions, and the Conventions to the United States Convention—from whence the report is published and sent abroad for the instruction of the community.

This is undoubtedly the most correct way for the condensation and diffusion of these reports. This being conceded, it becomes the duty of our public bodies to see that there is no unnecessary delay between the time of the societies' reporting themselves, and the time when the information thus obtained, shall be communicated to the public.

But with our present arrangements, more than a year frequently expires before the statistics of many Associations are transmitted to the United States Convention, and consequently to the people. For example, the New-York State Convention holds its annual sessions in the month of May; several of the Associations meet annually in the month of June; consequently their reports can not be transmitted through their delegates to the State Convention, under nearly a year, and then several months expire ere it can be transmitted to the United States Convention.

Another inconvenience under which we labor, arises from the delegates to the Conventions being appointed so long prior to the session which they are to attend, that their attendance becomes extremely doubtful, it being morally impossible for a man to know, so long before, whether it will be convenient for him to perform the allotted duty.

But the question arises, what can be done to remedy these defects? Answer—let the several State Conventions fix the time for their annual sessions a few weeks previous to the session of the United States Convention; then let the Associations hold their sessions a few weeks previous to the several State Conventions; thus certifying that we have a respect for Heaven's first law—preferring to have things done decently and in order. Again—I would suggest the propriety of our Associations meeting annually upon the day fixed by the constitutions, so that there may be no inconvenience arising from one or more Associations meeting in the same vicinity, at the same time. Shall not something of this nature be done? Brethren, what say ye?

Alps, N. Y., January, 1839.

If you would live happy, endeavor to promote the happiness of others.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

My dear young friends—I am very sorry that I can not print, this week, the third chapter of the tale called "The Happy Family." The reason is, that I have not yet received that chapter from Br. Barray, who writes the tale for you. Perhaps he was too busy in necessary business to write it in time, or perhaps he was sick, but I hope not, or perhaps he sent it, but the Postmasters along the road neglected to send it forward in time. In place of it, I copy for you the following pretty article, this week, from another newspaper, and hope you will try and wait with patience till another week, for Br. Barray's third chapter.

Disappointments will happen to us all, in spite of all we can do to prevent them, and the only thing we can do to make them easy, is to bear them patiently. If we fret over them, we only add so much more unhappiness to that which the disappointment gives us. And, besides this, our fretting, and pouting, and thinking long and much over our disappointments, not only makes us feel worse, but it puts us out of humor with many things that would please us much, if we had patience—and it also makes our friends around us unhappy. You know that when your playmates hurt themselves, and feel very bad, you feel sorry for them, and can not enjoy your sports as well as you could if they were right merry, and playing with you. No—you keep thinking all the time how bad your poor playmates feel, and that makes your heart feel heavy, and keeps you from taking as much pleasure as you would take if you felt light-hearted. So it is with your friends when they see you sorry, or grieved, or fretful. They pity you, and can not be as happy as if you were happy. So that if you really love your friends, and wish to make them happy, as well as be happy yourselves, you will try to be patient in, and to bear cheerfully all your disappointments—to think about them as little as you can, and to be happy in those sports and pleasures that are yet left for you to enjoy. Your affectionate friend.

THE EDITOR.

THE STEP-MOTHER.

I was once staying at a friend's house in the country, where I saw and heard some very interesting things. I recollect, in particular, a little conversation which occurred between Mrs. Peters and her three children, as they were eating a lunch of bread and blackberry jelly, after morning school. There were two little boys, named Joseph and William, and a dear little girl about three years old, who was called Mary.

Now Mrs. Peters was not the real mother of these little ones; their own mother, God had taken to heaven, when Mary was a very small baby. Their poor father was very unhappy after she was gone, and always afraid his motherless babes should be neglected or hurt. So at length he persuaded this same kind lady who was dispensing the lunch, to come and take care of them, and be their mother, and that was what the children were talking about while they were eating. As Willie was standing by her side, waiting for a second slice of bread, he looked up affectionately into her face, and began to speak, then blushing and looking at his brother, he hesitated and remained silent. "What is it Willie?" said his mother, "what were you going to say? there are no strangers here; speak out!"

"I guess I know," said Joe; "say on Willie! I don't care if mother does know my share; I shall tell her myself, if you don't!"

"I was only thinking, mother dear," said William, modestly, "that you would be sorry, if you knew how naughty Joseph and I were, the day father brought you home to live with us; and may be you would not love us so well—but we don't feel so now, nor haven't this great while, have we Joseph?"

"No, indeed," said Joseph, "and poor little Mary had more sense than either of us—she loved mother from the first."

"But what is all this about?" said their mother; "you have not told me yet. Do you think it was so naughty not to love me before you saw me?"

"Oh no, we did a great deal worse than that. When Mary came out to our little garden, to tell us what a pretty new mother we had got, and that father had brought her in a nice carriage, we wouldn't come in to see you; and told Mary what the boys said at school, and frightened her, and made her cry."

"Why, my dear, what could the boys say of me, none of them had ever seen me, had they?"

"No, ma'am, but they said you were a step-mother, and that step-mothers were always cross and disagreeable; and that you wouldn't give us enough to eat, nor let little Mary sit on your lap—and there she is now, this minute, with her mouth so full she can't speak!" said Willie, bursting out into a hearty laugh. But little Mary was much displeased at the idea of her mouth being too full, and made them all laugh the more, by her efforts to prove that she could lisp as well as usual.

"Well Joseph," said Mrs. Peters "how happened you to come in at last, on that memorable day, to welcome the stranger?"

"Why, mother, Mr. Brown was under the hop-vine, talking to John Davis, about sending his children to school, and he heard what I said, and proved it all out to me with logic, that I was making a fool of myself! I'm glad of it now, but I should not have talked so loud, if I had known he was there!"

"Can't you tell us what he said?"

"Oh, he asked me what made the boys think so badly of step-mothers. I told him because Rufus Mann had one that was cross to him, and gave him no peace of his life.—Just then, I threw away an apple I had picked up—he asked me why I did not eat it—I told him it was hard and sour. Then, said he, I suppose you will never eat any more apples, they are so bad? O yes Sir, I said, all apples are not so bad. Indeed, said Mr. Brown, but why not? all step-mothers are bad, because Rufus Mann's is so, why not the same with apples? Then, mother, he never stopped to see how like a fool I felt, but shook hands with me, and told me to go and act like a boy of sense, and one that loved his father; and then he stroked Willie's head and went away, and we all came into the house."

"Well Joseph," said I, when the little boy had finished his story, "have you found out for yourself that Mr. Brown was right, and that all step-mothers are not cross?"

"I guess so! cousin Anna," said Joseph, "and I guess so too!!" said Willie, as they bounded away to school.—Christian Intelligencer.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 25, 1839.

CHRISTIAN TRAITS AND DUTIES....NO III.

THE APOSTLE PAUL.

The apostolical biography of Paul, is full of thrilling interest and moral grandeur. His were the dignity and liberality of the true philosopher, combined with the energetic eloquence and noble zeal of one conscious of possessing a mission of truth. The circumstances of his life previous to his conversion, tend to deepen the interest with which we view his course as a herald of the Gospel. A Hebrew of the Hebrews, of the tribe of Benjamin, born in the city of Tarsus, the metropolis of Cilicia a city we are told, as a place of education, superior even to Athens and Alexandria, "and all the other Greek cities where there were schools of philosophy and of the polite arts"—and, as he tells us himself, "no mean city;"—free-born, the son of one who enjoyed the right of Roman citizenship—deeply imbued with the learning of the Jews—the pupil of Gamaliel, "the most celebrated doctor of his time"—as he says of himself (Gal, i: 14,) "exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers"—"as touching the law, a Pharisee"—with all these influences working upon him, "it is probable," as Macknight says, "that his zeal for the institutions of his fathers, prompted him to join such of his sect as followed Jesus with an intention of finding matter of accusation against him." We know of him, certainly, this much in regard to his zeal against the Christians, that when the proto-martyr Stephen was stoned for his testimony, he "was standing by consenting unto his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him." And at the time of the great persecution against the church that was at Jerusalem, one of the chief persecutors was Saul or Paul. In Acts xxvi: 10, he tell us—"Many of the saints did I shut up in prison, having received authority from the chief priests." And in Acts xxii: 4—"I persecuted this way unto death, finding and delivering into prison, both men and women."

We say, then, that the circumstances of the life of the apostle, previous to his conversion, tend to deepen the interest with which we view his course as a herald of the Gospel. For, when a great and powerful opponent to any cause, becomes converted to that cause, he is naturally an object of stronger interest, in some respects at least, than one who never fought against it, or who has always been its friend and supporter. The thought of what they have been, and the contrast with what they are, are calculated to awaken lively emotion in their behalf. And such was the case with Paul. From being a persecutor of the Christians, even unto strange cities, he was enrolled among the persecuted—from the subtleties of Jewish learning, and the rigor of Jewish law, he had turned to the simple precepts and the glorious liberty of the Gospel—from the hateful and hated Pharisee, he had become the meek disciple of the Crucified.—The power of his intellect, also, and his vast acquirements, make him a remarkable object in the Christian ranks. His daring and his energy of character, add to this, and again we say, that the circumstances of the life of this "Hebrew of the Hebrews," previous to his conversion, add greatly to the interest with which we look upon his after course.

His apostolical life, then, connected with all these considerations, is one full of moral grandeur. No wonder that the old artists have made vivid and powerful delineations from its incidents!

What a thrilling occurrence was his conversion! The young and ardent Jew may have been at Jerusalem, when that strange, solemn, yet meek being entered its streets, and in its temple preached "Wo!" to the Scribe and the Pharisee. Mingling among the curious and envious crowd, he but accumulated fuel to his evil passions. He saw in Jesus no heavenly dignity, no evidence of a mission from above, although his words were such as never man spake, and the blind, and the dumb, and the lame, were rejoicing in the power of his miracles. No! he was a denouncer of the high sect of the Pharisees; he was an innovator upon the sacred rites of the law, an enemy to the traditions of the rabbins, an impostor, claiming to be a Son of David, the King of the Jews, the Messiah! (he the Messiah! with that humble garb, those travel-worn sandals, those uncrowned locks, those few and defenceless followers!) and these were enough, we say, to feed the flame of evil passions, and he joined with the multitude in crying, "Let him be crucified," and he looked upon him with gratulation, as he stood in his scarlet robe and his crown of thorns, with the reed in his hand, and meekly and unresistingly received the spitting, the cruel blow, and the mockword! And triumphantly did he follow him up the side of Calvary, and unmoved in his hate did he stand and see him nailed to the cross, and then passed by, wagging his head, and saying—"Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself"—or, perchance he lingered near, unconvinced by the darkness, and heard his "Eli lama sabacthani!"—and, when the tidings of his glorious resurrection was spread abroad, he turned a deaf and incredulous ear upon it all. For the pride of the Jew was touched, and the evil passion aroused within him.

All this, we say, he *may have done. But this which follows, he did do. With the blood of the saints upon his hand, and fresh from the binding and the delivering into prisons of men and women—breathing out threatenings and slaughter, and bearing letters to the synagogues—he was on his way to Damascus, "to bring them which were there, bound unto Jerusalem, to be punished." Proud was he then, in his blood-thirsty zeal! Behind him, was his host, ready to do his will. Farther and farther went they on their journey, higher and higher rose the sun, and up flashed the spear-points, and gayly fluttered the banners. Farther and farther went they on their journey, and quicker beat the heart, and higher and deeper glowed the blood of the young Pharisee. And proud, I say, was he in his zeal; for was he not on a mission to crush the enemies of the law, the contemners of the authority of the Rabbins, the followers of the poor and lowly Nazarene—the false Messiah? And was he not in the confidence of the chief men of his nation?—was he not entrusted with a troop?—and was not his name already known and terrible to these Christians? So proud was he, and farther and farther went they on their journey, and nearer and nearer was the city of their destination, and brighter and more dazzlingly flashed their spear-points, and fainter fluttered the banner-folds in the hot and feeble air of the noon-tide, and more slowly and wearily moved the steel-loaded horses, and thought and stillness were among that band;—when lo!—a great light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, shone around on the way, and down went those mailed warriors, and down went that haughty Pharisee, and to his ear came the startling appeal—"Saul! Saul! why persecutest thou me?"—and he arose from the earth, a blinded, for a time, but a converted man, entrusted with the glory of a mission of light and gladness to the Gentiles.

* See Macknight, Life of the Apostle Paul; in his work on the Epistles—719 page; Phil. ed. 1835.

But one of the most thrilling scenes in his biography, is the discourse on Mar's Hill. This event has been so eloquently and minutely described,* that any attempt by me would seem arrogant or superfluous. But I would draw your attention to it now, in order to exhibit a "TRAIT" in his character, of which I wish to make a practical application. Athens was the capital of ancient heathenism. There were centered the beauty and power of idolatry. There were the temples, and the altars, and the statues. And there was the pride of learning, and eloquence, and poesy, and music. Rome exceeded it, at that time, it is true, in the splendor of triumph and of conquest. But the philosopher, who wished to preserve the relics of lofty intellect, and gaze upon the reflection of the descended orb of the past, in its brightest lustre, and muse by consecrated tombs, and linger amid glorious memories, would have visited the metropolis of Greece. Nor was it merely the splendor of the past, which adorned it, and made it attractive. There was philosophy yet, with its teachings—and there were the sects of the learned—and there gathered strangers and citizens, spending their time "in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing." There was the Epicurean, who acknowledged no God, and the end of whose philosophy, was pleasure; and there was the stern and marble-hearted Stoic, and the foul, sneering Cynic, and the exile Jew, and the haughty Roman—all the natural enemies of the Nazarene and his doctrines. And amid all this splendor, and hostility, and false worship, and learning, and pride, that lowly man of God ventured, strong in the armor of the truth, mighty with the weapons of spiritual warfare. And in the synagogue, he disputed with the Jew, drawing from his patriarchs and prophets, the description of Christ, and exhibiting the fulfilment of that description to them, in the crucified Jesus. And "in the market daily with them that met with him," he promulged the spiritual principles of the Gospel, and told of the glorious resurrection, and brought life and immortality to light. until, as the tidings spread of his strange system, and the crowd grew dense and hung wondering upon the words of his doctrine, the philosophers mingled with them, and sneers interrupted the deep impassioned utterance of his truths—"And some said—What will this babbler say? Other some, He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange Gods: because he preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection. And they took him, and brought him unto Areopagus, saying, may we know what this new doctrine whereof thou speakest, is? For thou bringest certain strange things to our ears: we would know, therefore, what these things mean."

And there, at that tribunal which, among various causes, took cognizance of matters of religion, and "one of the peculiar privileges of which was, inflicting extreme and exemplary punishment upon any person who should slight the holy mysteries and blaspheme the gods of Greece"—there stood the moral hero, Paul.—Yes, as has been eloquently said by a celebrated traveller*—"He stood upon the top of the rock and beneath the canopy of heaven. Before him there was spread a glorious prospect of mountains, islands, seas and skies: behind him towered the lofty Acropolis, crowned with all its marble temples."—And oh! with this glorious vision of the natural before him what a scene was there in the mental and moral world gathered to listen to his teachings! The prospect of beauty would naturally, under such circumstances, remind one of his God, of his duty, of the prevailing idolatry around him, and of the perversion of glorious faculties and privileges.—Here, then, might the once persecuting Saul, speak for that Jesus and that Gospel against which he had madly warred. Here, on the darkness of ignorance and skepticism, and the dimness of philosophic speculation, he could prove the glad light of immortality, and preach the doctrine of a resurrection from the dead. He was ready, therefore, to exhibit his doctrine in reply to their question—he was ready to stand there and lift up his voice for the truth!

We may learn then, from this particular instance, and from others, that moral courage was one of the strongest traits in the character of the great Apostle to the Gentiles. This event is a powerful manifestation of that trait, and may illustrate the practical application which I intend to make of it in the next number.

E. H. C.

* Dr. E. D. Clark, as quoted by Horne.

* See Fox's Discourses on Christian Morality, Sermon—"The Universal Brotherhood of Man."

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. II.

HADES.

Deliberate investigation and direct examination of the Scriptures, by the light of reason and well-established facts, is a sure method of attaining truth; because, in such a case, we are not left to mere conjecture, ignorant assertions, and ill-founded conclusions, for the principles we adopt; but, coming at once to the consideration of the great question, "what is truth?" we are led to establish undoubted premises, and then to reason from them cautiously with the aid of parallel truths from the Scriptures.

In continuing the work of interpretation of those passages in which the word hell occurs, we deem it our privilege to avail ourselves of the criticisms of men of research and acknowledged worth, not only because it might be thought too great a degree of assumption for a young man to advance important statements on his own authority alone, but because, when we can gather facts from those who did not believe the faith we defend, we may depend on their correctness. For when an opponent is constrained to bear testimony to the purity of character belonging to his foe, we may rest assured that his approbation is correct, inasmuch as we can not suppose him actuated by any other motive than the power of undoubted truth; so, when an individual advances criticisms which support an opinion that he deems incorrect, we may believe those criticisms honest and sincere, as well as entitled to consideration.

In the last article, it will be remembered that we explained the passages in the Old Testament in which the word hell occurs, as derived from the Hebrew word sheol. In the New Testament, there is the word hades, which is the Greek translation of sheol; which said hades is translated by the English word hell. Concerning the meaning of the word hades, I wish to present the remarks of two eminent men, adopting those remarks as expressive of our own opinion, because they agree with the spirit of the Scriptures.

Dr. Campbell remarks—"As to the word hades, which occurs in eleven places of the New Testament, and is rendered hell in all except one, where it is translated grave, it is quite common in classical authors, and is frequently used by the Seventy, in the translation of the Old Testament. In my judgment, it ought never in the Scriptures to be rendered hell, at least in the sense wherein that word is now universally understood by Christians. In the Old Testament, the corresponding word is sheol, which signifies the state of the dead in general, without regard to the goodness or badness of the persons, their happiness or misery."—5th Dis. p. 181. Dr. Clarke says—"The word hell used in the common translation, conveys now an improper meaning of the original word; because hell is only used to signify the place of the damned. But as the word hell comes from the Anglo-Saxon helan, to cover or hide, hence the tiling or slating of a house is called, in some parts of England, (particularly Cornwall,) heling to this day; and the covers of books (in Lancashire) by the same name; so the literal import of the original word hades, was formerly well expressed by it."—Note on Matt. xi: 23. From this plain and undoubted testimony, we derive one clear and distinct fact, viz., that hades, like its original sheol, simply means the grave, or the state of the dead, without reference to character, happiness, or misery. It is used in this literal sense, when Jacob, on hearing the supposed death of Joseph by wild beasts, said that he would go down into the grave (sheol) unto his son, mourning."—Gen. xxxvii: 35. From the literal signification of the word, it branches out into a figurative meaning; for the darkness of the grave is used to denote the mental affliction which arises from sin; as when David said, that the pains of hell gat hold of him—Ps. cxvi: 3—and also, when he was forgiven on repentance, that the mercy of God had delivered him from the lowest hell.—Ps. lxxxvi: 13. This literal and figurative usage of the word hades or hell, is clearly seen in the New Testament, as a reference to the passages in which it occurs, demonstratively prove; while the fact will distinctly appear, that in no instance does it sustain a future place of torment.

1. The first place where it occurs, is Matthew xi: 23: "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shall be brought down to hell; for if the mighty works which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day." The parallel passage is Luke x: 15; but as the idea there conveyed is the same, it will not be necessary to refer to it.

By a little caution, it will be discovered, that the words heaven and hell are used as figures—the word heaven denotes the proud exaltation of Capernaum, the same as the pride of the king of Babylon is represented by his ascent to heaven, and the exaltation of his throne above the stars—the word hell denotes its utter destruction and the gloom of its condition. Dr. Campbell remarks—"As the city of Capernaum was never literally raised to heaven, we have no reason to believe that it was to be literally brought down to hades. But as by the former expression, we are given to understand, that it was become a flourishing and splendid city, or, as some think, that it had obtained great spiritual advantages; so, by the latter, that it should be brought down to the lowest degree of abasement and wretchedness."—Dis. 6. Pt. 2, pp. 299, 300. Dr. Clarke says, that the word hell in this passage, "means a state of the utmost wo, ruin, and desolation, to which these impenitent cities should be reduced. ...This prediction of our Lord was literally fulfilled; for in the wars between the Romans and the Jews, these cities were totally destroyed, so that no traces are now found of Bethsaida, Chorazin, or Capernaum." From these facts it will be perceived, that Capernaum was a flourishing and proud city in the time of our Lord; but that it was to be utterly destroyed, and its condition in the expected destruction, is prefigured by the gloom of hell, or the state of the dead. Its punishment was to be severe, for our Lord said of it, "it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom, in the day of judgment, than for thee."—Vs. 24. Its distress was greater than that of Sodom, in the day of judgment which fell upon it—(for the phrase "day of judgment," means any period of punishment—) Sodom was destroyed in one night by fire; but the destruction of Capernaum was protracted by a siege, during which, all the sufferings attendant upon such a condition, were endured by its inhabitants In this case, then, at least, the power of the figure drawn from the gloom of the departed dead, is very clear and obvious.

II. The next instance where it occurs, is Matthew xvi: 18—"I also say unto thee, that thou art Peter; and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it". From the context of this passage, it appears that Jesus had been inquiring of his disciples, whom men thought him to be. After they had answered him, he put the inquiry to them, who they thought he was. Peter answered, that he was the Son of the living God. Our Saviour then said, "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven—and I say also unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." The meaning here is evident. Upon the fact that he was the Son of God, and also upon the fact that Peter should be the first preacher of the truth, and should unlock the kingdom of heaven to the Jews on the day of Pentecost, and to Cornelius and his band, he would build his church or system, and "the gates of hell" should not prevail against it.

In ancient times, the gates of fortified cities were used as places of council—to this circumstance our Saviour alludes by the gates of darkness or hell—not all the schemes of enemies, formed in the gates of darkness, shall succeed against his truth. That the word hell, in this instance, does not refer to a future place of torment, is evident from the fact, that, even admitting that there is such a place, the system of Jesus has never met with any trouble from it; all the enmity against his truth, has arisen from men. But every person can see the appropriateness of prefiguring the dark stratagems of men, by the gloom of the state of the dead, hades, hell, or grave—for the state of mind which led them to oppose the holy child Jesus, must have been something like that of David, when he said, "the pains of hell gat hold upon me."

No opposition did prevail against Christ. The whole Jewish nation met in the "gates of darkness," to devise a plan to destroy the Nazarene Reformer—they determined to kill him—and by the influence of false witnesses, they crucified him, while mocking his agonies. But did they prevail against him? Receive an answer to the question in his resurrection from the dead, the Lord of life and glory, and in the first promulgation of his system, when 3000 obeyed him; and very soon 5000; and very soon again, a great company of priests. Between the years 33 and 70, the Jews, by the iron hand of persecution, endeavored to stifle the growing principles of Jesus—but did they prevail? Find an answer in the destruction of Jerusalem, when the banners of Judaism were torn from their station, and the power of Israel blotted from among the nations of the earth; when Christianity rose in all its fair and beautiful proportions, shining with greater vigor than ever. Between the death of Christ and the fourth century, no less than nine distinct bloody persecutions were urged against the cause of Jesus—but did they prevail against him? Look at the triumphant advance of truth, rolling forward like a sea of glory, causing the sons of error to forsake the altars of idolatry and the temples of paganism, until Christianity filled the imperial city like the gushing waters of the fountain, and the banner of Christ waved over the mistress of the world, and you have an answer. In the dark ages, the power of ignorance, the hiding of the Bible from the mass of the people, as well as the hideous persecutions that were going on, were enemies to the cause of Jesus—but did they prevail? Look at the waters of truth breaking down the barriers of state policy on the morning of the reformation, conveying freedom of thought and investigation to all people, taking the Bible from the cell of the monk, for a thorough examination by the cautious eye of reason, and you have an answer. In fact, no enemy, not even the power of sin, could or can ultimately prevail against the system of Jesus. Though man should universally discard the truth, and blot God from his heart, and write upon every tombstone, "the gate of everlasting sleep," yet the pure light of divine truth, in connection with the light of nature, will triumph over it all; while by the love of God, truth shall light a torch in the sepulchres of the dead, teaching us that the mind shall shine amid the glories of the universe after the body shall be dissolved into its original elements by the chemistry of death. And the Gospel will go on conquering and to conquer, until the rebellious shall be subdued, the sinner saved, iniquity finished, error destroyed, when Christ shall give up his mediatorial reign to God, our heavenly Father, that he may be all in all.

III. The next instance where hell, hades, occurs, is in Luke xvi: 23, in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. As that parable requires more room than we can give it at present, it will be sufficient for me to remark, that the Rich Man was representative of the Pharisees; that the hell in which they were to lift their eyes, was the same hell to which Capernaum was driven, viz., utter destruction as a nation, together with the overthrow of their city and the burning of their temple, and the scattering of their remnant over the whole globe.

The next instance where it occurs, is in Acts, when Peter was preaching to the Jews In his discourse, he quoted from the language of David in the 16th Psalm, who spake of Christ thus—"Because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine holy One to see corruption."—Acts ii: 27. This was spoken in reference to the death of our Saviour; and whatever view we may take of hades, it can not be supposed that our Saviour went to a place of future punishment; such a supposition is so contrary to all propriety, as to be beyond the necessity of remark. What Peter does mean, however, is clearly explained in another part of his discourse. "He [David] seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither did his flesh see corruption."—Vs. 31. From this language, the idea advanced is plain—that Jesus, when he was crucified, went into hades, hell, grave, or the state of the dead; but God did not suffer his body to experience the corruption of the tomb, for on the third day he raised him from the dead with the same body that was taken from the cross, to convince the disciples, by its reappearance, that Christ, who was crucified, had actually escaped from the grave to be the Lord of immortality. This, and this only, can be the true explanation of the matter.

IV. The next instance is Rev. i: 18. In the communications which the Son of man made to the Revelator John, among other things he said—"I am he that liveth, and was dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore. Amen; and have the keys of hell and death." This hell is evidently the same as that into which Christ descended, the grave, the state of the dead. Christ is said to have the keys of death and the grave, because he has power over them. He was once dead, but he rose from the tomb to exist forever, with authority to open the grave, to deliver all its victims from dissolution, to clothe them with immortality, that, in the language of Paul, they might exclaim, "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! [hades or hell,] where is thy victory?"

The next passage is equally clear—"And I looked, and, behold, a pale horse; and his name that sat on him was death, and hell followed with him."—Rev. vi: 8. If a future place of punishment follows death, it would seem that it swallowed up all whom death touched—but if we say that the grave follows death, how natural is the idea, for the grave receives all people without remorse, whether good or bad. We shall see this idea clearly carried out in the rest of the verse—"and power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth." This language seems to me to have reference to the Jews, upon whom, for their sins, God sent death—thousands were destroyed by the sword, many fell by hunger, hundreds perished in the mines and on the sands of Egypt, while others perished among wild beasts, to gratify the ferocious taste of the Roman people.

G. W. M.

[To be concluded in our next.]

E. Smith returns his paper requesting a discontinuance. We have some eight or ten E. Smiths on our book, which can it be?

Why can not those who return papers as orders to discontinue, give us their residence as well as name? Some do not even give us their name.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br. D. R. Biddlecom, at Sullivan, and at Cazenovia in the evening—Br. C. S. Brown, in the Baptist meeting-house, near Mr. Hazzard's, in Triangle.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in February, by Br. Bullard, at Preble Corners, at 10 o'clock, A. M., and at Truly, at 1 o'clock, P. M., and Vesper in the evening, and also at same time and place once in four weeks until further notice—Br. Doolittle, at McDonough village, and Br. A. G. Clark, at North Norwich—Br. D. R. Biddlecom, at Geneva—Br. C. S. Brown, in Upper Lisle—Br. M. B. Smith, in Eatonville.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in February, by Br. E. E. Guild, at Richmondville, at 10 o'clock, A. M.—Br. D. R. Biddlecom, as Br. Holmes of Silver Creek may appoint—Br. O. Wilcox, in Russia—Br. C. S. Brown, at South Bainbridge—Br. M. B. Smith, in Herkimer.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in February, by Br. M. B. Smith, in Middleville—Br. D. R. Biddlecom, at Parker's Settlement.

Br. D. R. Biddlecom, will preach on the evenings of January 26th, at Canastota—29th, at Spafford—February 4th, at Bristol—6th, at Roanoke, Genesee county—9th, at Silver Creek—11th, at Fredonia—12th, at Westfield—13th, at Quincy—14th, at North East, Pa.—15th, at Harbor Creek—16th, at Erie—18th, at Springfield. See also, Sunday notices.

Br. O. Wilcox, will preach on the evenings of February 5th, in Carthage—6th, in the Trafarn neighborhood—8th, at Trenton Falls.

The third Conference of the Chenango Association of Universalists, will be held at the Methodist chapel in Greene, on Wednesday and Thursday, February 13th and 14th.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper

P M, Linden, for A J W and E B—P M, Knowlesville, for A S, W C T, T B, W P and J D—C L B, W Lincklaen, for E E—P M, Logan, for self, A F, W B, G S, P S, G H and H H—L L S, Morganville, for S O O—H B, Benton, for self, I D G, O B, and J P B—P M, Pekin, for J H—H W D, Geneva, for self and C C—P M, Ellery, for I D W—R C, Smyrna, for self, A P and F H—P M, Rhodes, for C C and R N—T A G, Champion, for N H, A P and C H—W K C, Otsdawa, for self and C H—S W, Clockville—P M, Wolcott, for J W—P M, Richmond, (N H) for O S—Rev M S, Bath (N H) for H H and G W—M B, Three Rivers, (Mich)—D P, Newport, for N P, of Painsville, (O)—W W T—E Hamilton—T W, Connesought, (O) for self, E F, H W, W R, D H, N and L, J S and S H—P M, Walton, for J B—C L, Camillus, for self, W W, S D and A B—J L, Byron—R S, Medina, for self, D F, G D, E B M and J C T—P M, Jamesville, for S R—D M, Magnolia, (Ills) for A H, M I, and H G—A B, Norwalk, (O) for J M—L H, Toledo, (O) for self, B P P and J F—P M, Bradford, (Mass) for A H—P M, Sheshequin, for J T Jr and N H—P M, Middlebury, (O) for I S and H H—P M, Hanover, (Mich) for self, A W, D P and A B—P M, Matthew C H, (Va) for J P W, L L and J W—P M, Canal, for self, N L B, S L and A S—P M, Ridgeway, for H S—L S, Moreland, for self and I E—P M, Concord Centre, for C C L, L C, G B, N E D and M A C—P M, York Mills, for G M—P M, Waterville, (O) for A C B—P M, Martins Mills (O) for self, R C and J R—E S, Otsego (Mich) for self, F I, M W R, H S and P B—P M, Sheshequin, (Pa) for G K—P M, W Chazy, for J A and W A—P M, East Haddam, (Ct) for P R—P M, Otto, for J B—Rev L P, Panama, for I P, G A F, I G, L D, S P and E W—B H T, McHenry, (Ills)—J F, Ithaca—B M, Sylvania, (Pa) for self, I P, S C T and L L—P M, Pontiac, (Mich) for S R—W H S, Poughkeepsie, for self and H M—L E F, Lafargeville, for H C and C P—P M, Watertown, (O) for W W—J C K, Lima, (Ia) for self, D C, T G and S W,

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SHALL THIS SPIRIT PINE?

BY MISS EMELINE ROUNSVILLE.

Shall this spirit pine and weep,
Drive afar restoring sleep;
Shall it sit in sullen ire,
That some songter's notes are higher?
Or because that lyre of thine,
Wakes a happier strain than mine?
Nay—as well the dove might die,
When the eagle cleaves the sky.
Just as well, the grating jay
Might in anguish close her lay;
And refuse to spread her wings
When sweet philomela sings!

Shall this spirit tamely cower,
When ill-omened tempests lower?
Shall it break, or meanly bend,
When it meets a truant friend?
Yield itself to dark despair,
That earth's flowers so fading are?
Think it not! with gentle stroke,
Ye might rive, as well, the oak;
Or with easy, careless sweep,
Tear the rock from yonder steep!
Nay—this spirit, spite your wiles,
Still shall bear its high-born smiles.

Shall it, in each passing ear,
Breathe its woes and griefs severe;
Making sigh, the spirit glad,
Sadder still, the spirit sad;
When from life's impartial cup,
It hath sipp'd the contents up?
Mine shall be the nobler part,
Binding up the broken heart!

Let pale Penury's meagre train,
The last ebbing life-drop drain;
Let neglect and haughty scorn,
Heartless, soul-less, still pass on;
Let false friendship strike the blow,
Silent will I bear the wo.
For to mortal ears I'll tell
Not the griefs, this bosom swell—
But when falls the chast'ning rod,
Breathe my woes but to my God!
He can quench the burning flame,
He, the raging tempest tame;
Draw the poison'd, rankling dart,
Heal the wounded, broken heart!

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE DOUBTING REPROVED.

BY MRS. C. D. DOOLITTLE.

"O ye of little faith; wherefore do ye doubt?"—BIBLE.

Repining mortals that we are
Who, nourish'd by a Parent's care,
Yet oft are found in doubt and fear,
While looking on our prospects bare,
Unmindful of that bounteous hand,
Whose blessings fill our happy land.
True, 'tis our lot while here below,
Full oft a share of grief to know;
Yet, when we count our mercies o'er,
We find a thousand favors more
Than all the evils, which abound
In every shape, wherever found.

O could we ever live in faith
Of what our lowly Saviour saith,
Who, pointing to the birds of air,
"Behold," said he, "a Parent's care.
He hears the helpless ravens cry,
And kindly gives them their supply.
And think you, ye of little faith,
Less care for you than them he hath?"
Then never more let doubts intrude,
But raise the song of gratitude
To Him who reigns below, above,
And rules o'er all with ceaseless love.

FALSEHOOD.

To this class of evils, which, though petty in detail, are momentous in the aggregate of mischief they produce, belong equivocation in speech; false professions; shuffling conduct, promise-breaking, prevarication, and all the other shapes, which insincerity and duplicity so apply put on.

Such is the motley brood of falsehood, that overrun our land, as the land of the Pharaoh's was overrun by the loathsome frog and the devouring locust. And the moral pestilence is far the most deplorable. The reptile and the insect are only an outward annoyance; but the poison of falsehood penetrates the inward man, and turns him throughout to a moral lazar. Were this pestilence of the soul confined in its ravages to the ignorant and uncultivated, it would still be an evil of dangerous import. But when it fastens on men who occupy some of the high places of the community, whose examples are weighty, and their sway extensive, it becomes a national distemper, and threatens the production of a national calamity. And such is, at present, the alarming condition of the United States. Among the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the cultivated and the uncultivated, a disregard for truth is portentously prevalent. In the pursuit of business, and the transactions of affairs both public and private, plain dealing and honesty of purpose are wantonly discarded, and intrigue, management, and stratagem, have possession of their places. In this perverted and ominous condition of things, prevarication has supplanted truth, cunning has become the substitute for wisdom and talent, a love of power has usurped the place of patriotism, and selfishness the places of charity, justice and philanthropy. Wealth, and popular favor, as instruments of power constitute the idol to which "the million" do homage. To propitiate that, sacrifices are made on the altar of a vulgar ambition, unprincipled in their nature, and degrading to all who take part in their ministry. The man who attains his end by hypocrisy and stratagem, instead of being censured and rebuked, as in former times, for his dishonesty and guilt, is praised now for his acuteness and dexterity.

Is a project set on foot, whose object is the promotion of intellectual or moral improvement, the correction of abuses, or the accomplishment of any other form of acknowledged usefulness? Is it for the establishment or endowment of a university or a college, the amendment of the condition of a professional institution, or the advancement of the interests of some mechanical or literary association? Or is it for any other purpose subservient to the public welfare? In such a case, sentiments of honor and manliness, no less than motives of morality and duty, require, that those concerned in the project should act with fidelity, consistency and firmness, and not play the part of time-servers or shufflers, dependants or parasites. Influenced only by public considerations, they should press towards the attainment of a public end. Neither selfish nor social feelings, apart from this, should mingle in their counsels, or sway in their measures.

But rarely, at the present time, is this line of conduct faithfully pursued. In cases of the sort, different individuals shrink, at times, from their duty in supine inaction, or join in opposition to schemes, of which even they themselves had been the first proposers, for different reasons—some from a craven dread of responsibility—others from a fear of the loss of popularity, and a forfeiture of the incense of flattery and favor—a third set, from an unwillingness to encounter difficulty and trouble, or make personal sacrifices—a fourth, from feebleness of resolution and instability of purpose—a fifth, from bribery, or some other venal motive—a sixth, perhaps, from a mixture of several of these influences—a seventh, from a still more unpardonable cause—a malicious determination to betray their associates in the enterprise, and injure their reputation and standing, and thus gain an ascendancy over them in general popularity, or in the direction and benefits of some other undertaking about to be set on foot.—Caldwell.

GERMAN HONESTY AND SIMPLICITY.—"An inhabitant of Leipsic," says Madame de Stael, "having planted an apple tree on the borders of a public walk, annexed a notice to it, requesting the people would not gather the fruit." How the wise-acres and "knowing ones" laughed at the trusting simpleton! But hark! "not an apple was stolen during ten years." So much for a people, all of whom read and think. In England there are not a few who have resisted the instruction of the poor, lest it should corrupt them; but with the protection of ignorance, what would have been the fate of the apple tree in the neighborhood of London? What a contrast between this respected tree with its harmless defence, and the steel traps and spring guns of our British Pomona!—London Magazine.

DEATH.—The first conviction that there is death in the house, is perhaps, the most awful moment of youth. When we are young, we think that not only ourselves, but that all about us are immortal. Until the arrow has struck a victim, and our hearth, death is merely a unmeaning word; until then, its casual mention, has stamped no idea upon our brain. There are few, even among those least suspected of thought and emotion, in whose hearts and minds the first death in the family does not act as a powerful revelation of the mysteries of life and of their own being; there are few, who, after such a catastrophe, do not look upon the world and the world's ways, at least for a time, with changed and tempered feelings. It recalls the past, it makes us ponder over the future; and youth, gay and light-hearted youth, is taught, for the first time, to regret and fear.

MARRIAGES.

In Butler, December 6th, by Rev. Wm. Andrews, Mr. ISAAC YOUNG, to Mrs. JANE COOK, both of Butler.

In Huron, December 21st, by the same, CHARLES LEE, Esq., of Barre, to Miss ELIZA UNDERHILL, of the former place.

In Manchester, December 23d, by Rev. S. Miles, Mr. MARSHALL M. LOUTH, of Farmington, to Miss MARGARET PRATT, of the former place.

In Mendon, November 11th, by Rev. J. Chase, Mr. WM. WATKINS, to Miss RACHEL JOHNSON, both of Mendon.

In Lima, December 5th, by the same, Mr. CASEY WIGGINS, to Miss SARAH PARKER, both of Lima.

In West Bloomfield, January 1st, by the same, Mr. JOHN FISHER, to Miss MARY ANN HARMON, both of West Bloomfield.

In Canton, St. Lawrence county, December 25th, by Rev. F. J. Briggs, Mr. NELSON SANDERSON, to Miss ZADA M. LANGDON.

In same place, January 1st, by James Livingston, Esq., Mr. EDWIN WALLIS, to Miss ALMINA HENNY, both of Canton.

In Charlotte, October 26th, by Rev. T. C. Eaton, Mr. WATERS GRAVES, to Miss MARIA GRUN, both of Charlotte.

In Hamburg, Erie county, December 30th, by the same, Mr. FRANCIS B. PARKER, to Miss PHEBE LINDLEY both of that place.

DEATHS.

In Canastota village, December 31st, last, Miss HARRIET JARVIS, having completed her 22d year, on the previous Christmas Eve. She was amiable and intelligent, and was respected and beloved by all who knew her, and died as she had lived, a believer in God's endless and universal goodness.

Her funeral was attended on new year's day, by Br. Woolley, (under afflicting and inhuman circumstances, narrated by our correspondent "Humanitas," in last week's paper,) who ably and feelingly tendered the consolations of divine truth to the mourning relatives and friends, and a large congregation of sympathising neighbors.—Com.

In Stockholm, on the 4th inst., Mrs. ANN WESTERN, aged 79 years. Funeral services by the writer. F. J. B.

In Perrysburg, Cattaraugus county, October 25th, CARY C. DOLLY, aged 39 years. This unfortunate man put a period to his existence by throwing himself headlong into a well, while in a state of insanity. Mr. D. was a kind and obliging neighbor, and an affectionate husband and father. The cause which led to his death, may be traced to the cruel influence of the doctrine of endless misery. He had professed to believe in the salvation of the whole world, through Christ, which gave him great comfort in the hour of affliction, and apparent death; but while he was feeble in health, through the sophistry of priests, and the temerity of friends, he was led to doubt the infinite mercy of God, and was told, that to be on the "safe side," he must believe in the peace-destroying doctrine of endless wo! Soon after abandoning the Gospel of Christ, and the sentiment of the final salvation of all mankind, he became deranged. This growing insanity was looked upon as great zeal for God, and true marks of piety and growth in grace. One of his neighbors called to see him one day. Mr. D. saw him coming, and fancied he was coming to take his life. Accordingly, he armed himself with a knife, stood behind the door, and when the man entered, he stabbed him. This affair took place in Yates county. Mr. D. was arrested and tried for murder, but acquitted in consequence of his insanity. He afterwards came to Perrysburg, where he remained until his death; some of the time chained, and believing that men and devils were after him, and that they would not let him die, but that they would drag him to a place where they would torment him eternally. His object in killing himself, was to escape their tormenting power. No blame is attached to Mr. Towsey and his family, from whose house he escaped, and in whose well he drowned himself. The funeral was attended on the 28th, by the writer. T. C. EATON.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within four months; $2.00 if not paid within four months; or $2.50 if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis; and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their papers by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00 if not paid within the year.

☞ C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME X. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1839. NUMBER 5.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

GROUNDS OF FRIENDSHIP.

BY MERRITT SANFORD.

In forming an edifice, it is all-important to have a good foundation, lest, in time of wind and storm, the structure be swept away, and "leave not a wreck behind." There are not a few in the world, who have been deceived as to the true basis of friendship, and in forming their attachments, have built upon nothing better than the sand; and when the storm of adversity came, those whom they had called friends, deserted them, and their baseless castles were carried away by the tempest. Such will then complain of the unkindness of the divine government—curse man for his corruption and selfishness, and talk as if no real friendship graced the human heart. We wish to probe this subject to the bottom, and show that all such whining complaints result from grounding attachments on the lower and animal feelings, or propensities of our nature. We will first strive to remove the false basis of friendship, and then point out one on which the true and genuine can be safely built.

1. We must not base friendship on the gratification of each other's animal appetites. This is so very evident that it need not have been named, except for the admonition of those whose attachments are formed by these means, such as drunkards and gluttons. These men—beasts, I might have said—talk much of their friendship to each other, and it is no rare thing to see them make their vows to the god of their friendship, over a glass of spirits, which is its stimulus. This is well told by Robert Burns, in his curious and instructive poem called "Tam O'Shanter," he figures Tam as having "an ancient, trusty crony;" and their friendship he sets forth in the following couplet.

"Tam loved like a very brother;
They had been drunk for weeks together."

This is a faithful picture of the friendship that exists among drunkards. But just think of the nature and effects of such friendship. It is kindled by the fire of alcohol; it is built on the debased animal appetites. In its progress, it manifests itself in swearing, gambling and quarreling; when it ends, it leaves its subjects cold-hearted, jealous and disappointed. Marvel not that they say much of the coldness and deceitfulness of the world. When they utter complaints of this kind, they are only drawing pictures of their own hearts. In looking at others through their corrupted moral vision, they see themselves, and it seems a pity that they do not know what they see. But if they should know themselves, it is probable that they would straightway forget what manner of persons they are.

These hints should caution us against forming attachments on the indulgence of the animal appetites. What has been said of drinking may be said also of eating. There are some gormandizers whose friendly feelings will receive a livelier impulse, from a high seasoned meal, than from the most valuable of moral virtues. These are such as remember longer, the public dinners given on certain occasions, than the patriotism, love, and friendship, which they were made to represent and commemorate, but not to create.

2. Friendship should not be based on flattery, love of applause, or external beauty. In what are called the fashionable circles, much that goes under the name of friendship, is built on those gilded toys. Some spirits seem to be cast in such a peculiar mould, that their favor can be won in no way but by flattering them in the praise of their talents, dress, or possessions. Now, to our minds, friendship gained in this way is little or no better than that which is kindled by the spirits of alcohol; for the flame will expire when the wanted stimulus is not given. No sooner do you cease to feed their vanity, than you get their frowns for their smiles, and their secret indignation for their courteous and frank hospitality. Is there not much of this kind of friendship in society? Are there not many, who do not calculate on forming attachments on higher principles than pride, vanity, flattery, or love of approbation? Such merit our pity. If causality was half as active in them as approbativeness, they would see that attachments can not prosper which are founded in this manner, because their hearts are left untouched with affection; they have no soul-felt desire to benefit each other. They are blind leaders of the blind, and as a natural consequence, they fall into the ditch of disappointment. A little change of fortune scatters their admirers, and you will hear them complain of the barreaness of human nature, saying, there is no real friendship in the world. Mistaken souls! they have yet to learn what true friendship is. If we are to take what they call friendship, for the genuine, they may be correct in saying there is none in the world. But it is not. That which they followed after and thought to be friendship, was nothing more than admiration of self. And those whom they call friends, are—just like themselves—mere admirers—not of each other's virtue and moral goodness, but of each other's vanity; and the result ought to be just what it is—"vexation of spirit." It is but a just punishment for their folly, ordained of God to warn them of their mistake, and cause them to cultivate higher principles, as the only means of obtaining true and faithful friends.

3. We should not build friendship on wealth. This may be a good foundation for a worldly fortune; but if we make it the basis of friendship, we ought not to be disappointed, should the storm of adversity make us the forsaken children of cold neglect. Our views on this subject can not better be expressed than in the language of George Combe, and we here give an extract from his Constitution of Man. "There are friendships, particularly among mercantile men, founded on acquisitiveness, just as in fashionable life they are founded on love of approbation. Two individuals fall into a course of dealing, by which each reaps profit from transactions with the other; this leads to intimacy, and a feeling of attachment is formed. The moment, however, that the acquisitiveness of the one suffers the least inroad from that of the other, and their interests clash, they are apt, if no higher principle unite them, to become bitter enemies. It is probable that while these commercial friendships last, the parties may profess great reciprocal regard and esteem, and that when a rupture takes place, the one who is depressed, or disobliged, may recal these expressions, and charge the other with hypocrisy, but they really were not insincere. Each felt something which he colored over, and perhaps believed to be disinterested friendship; but if each would honestly probe his own conscience, he would be obliged to grant that the whole basis of the connexion was selfish—and hence, that the result is just what ought to be expected by every man who places his reliance for happiness chiefly on the lower feelings. And in complaining of the hollowness of attachments springing from the lower faculties exclusively, we are like men who should build a pyramid on its smaller end, and then speak of the unkindness of Providence, and lament the hardness of their fate, when it fell."

Where, then, shall we look for the true basis of genuine friendship? We would refer the reader to a piece of sacred history. "The soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul." Here was a communion of the heart; soul met soul; mutual sympathy, affection and benevolence linked them together in the strong bond of true friendship. The soul of Jonathan was not knit with the riches of David, nor with his love of personal applause:—if it had been, no real affection could have existed between them, and the least change of fortune would have separated them. But "the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David," and the consequence was what might be expected—"he loved him as his own soul."

This is the true key to all genuine friendship. There must be a kindred feeling, a mutual desire to benefit each other's condition. In other words, all pure friendship must be built on the moral sentiments of human nature, or on the duties of justice, fidelity and benevolence. This is certified by a proverb of Solomon, "A man that hath friends, must show himself friendly." Let a man show himself friendly, and he will have no reason to complain of not having friends. He must first show that he is friendly to himself. If he is an enemy to his own good in cherishing evil habits that are ruinous to his own prosperity and usefulness, he can not be relied on as a true friend to others. Hence some poet, who has good sense as well as good poetry, has said,

"See if he be Friend to himself, who would be friend to thee."

Does he respect himself? Does he cherish no bad habits, such as drunkenness, profanity, gambling, etc.? Does he deal justly with mankind? Does he love moral purity, and desire to improve in moral excellence? If so, he has one thing, needful to entitle him to our friendship. But this is not enough. He must show himself friendly to others, as well as to himself. He must not confine his wishes and interests to his own individual circle, but he must show that he lives for others, while he lives for himself, and that he delights to see others happy through his exertions in their behalf.

If, therefore, we would have friends true and faithful, we must show ourselves friendly, first to ourselves, by uprightness and purity of character, and then to others, by our benevolent efforts to do them good. Let us not dream of gaining real friends in any other way. We might gain a few admirers by flattering their love of approbation, or by feeding their love of worldly gain; but they would not be friends—they would be mere admirers; and whenever we withheld the objects of their ambition, they would forsake us without a sigh, or a tear. Not so with attachment founded on moral principle, or on the mutual love of justice, fidelity and benevolence. Gain a man's love and esteem in this way, and you have a friend who both loves you and the duties by which his respect was gained. A friendship formed by these means can not be broken by the freaks of worldly fortune; it will endure the storm of adversity unmoved and unharmed, and nothing can dissolve its holy ties but the criminal neglect, or treachery of one of the parties in the connexion.

Bath, N. H., January, 1839.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SHORT SERMONS....NO. I.

BY A LAY PREACHER.

"For my yoke is easy, and my burthen is light."—Matt. xi: 30.

Religion has made a great noise in the world, and caused much bloodshed; but has the noise and bloodshed arisen, and flowed, in consequence of the religion indicated by the text? To say nothing about the bloodshed, the noise is now the question to be inquired into. But in order to come to a fair decision on the subject, it seems to be necessary to inquire, What sort of religion has made the most noise in the world? It will need no great stretch of inquiry to answer this question—unless there should be some doubt which of two sects to place in the front ranks.—But as Presbyterians are, as yet, the most numerous, and of late years full as active as their brethren, the Methodists, they must be allowed to take the lead. In granting this, I must at the same time beg pardon of the Methodists, if by so doing, I have in the least done them injustice.—Moreover, if it will give them any satisfaction, I will here candidly admit, that they, in my humble opinion, stand in the second rank of noisy religionists.

Having settled this matter so far—and I hope to the satisfaction of my readers, and the parties concerned—it now becomes necessary to inquire into the nature of that religion which has become so ultra and boisterous; and to see whether it bears any affinity to our text. This can not be better done than by an examination of the creed which prompts its votaries to such energetic measures. A short discourse, however, will not admit of the whole of this sublime article. I shall therefore quote the following:—

"By the decree of God for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are pre-destined unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death: these angels and men thus predestined and foreordained are particularly and unchangeably designed, and their number is so certain and definite, that it can not be either increased or diminished"!

Let not the reader be astonished at the noise which the believers in such a doctrine are making, in the world. It is the best plan they can adopt to hide the deformity of their creed. It reminds one of the thief, who, when pursued, cried out with his pursuers, at the top of his voice—stop thief! stop thief!! and by that means escaped detection. But such a course can not last always. The yoke is too galling, and the burthen too heavy, to be endured for any great length of time. The palpable inconsistency of such a course of conduct, with the principles of the creed, will ere long, be discovered. The weakest minds, when out of the turmoil and noise of the excitement, will see, that if God for the manifestation of his glory, has drawn the line of distinction "so certain and definite," no alteration can possibly be made, that all their day-riots, and midnight orgies, are totally useless. Were it not for the effect which the conduct of such religionists has in society, it might, perhaps, be the best way to let them go on till they weary themselves out. But when we see the misery which they cause in society; the breaking up of families, separating man and wife; the distraction and suicide, as the result of such conduct; it becomes the duty of every reflecting and candid member of society, "to rebuke them sharply."

Having spoken of the effects which a noisy religion has in society, what shall we say of the recipients of this system, who are fortunate enough to escape distraction and suicide? Does weeping, wailing, sighing, and groaning, indicate an "easy yoke" and a "light burthen?" If it does, and the creed of such is true, there is no help for the writer of this article. He is one, for the glory of God (!) foreordained to be damned, as he can perceive neither the one nor the other in or about it. Be it known, however, that he feels under no concern about the matter. His yoke, and burthen, are as different from the one he has been examining, as light is from darkness. He participates in a reasonable share of enjoyment in this life, [thank God for this, if he has in the end decreed me to everlasting wo,] and is happy in regard to his future destiny. But then, if I am one doomed to eternal death, I am greatly puzzled to understand a certain passage of Scripture, which says—"the wicked have no peace, neither day nor night."—When I am told by these noisy religionists, that I am one of these, I am very certain that they neither know me, nor themselves; and that they have placed the cart before the horse; for who can say, and speak the truth, that they have peace either day or night?

In my next, (though not from the same text,) I shall endeavor to show what that religion is, which wears an easy yoke, and carries a light burthen. To this, I add no more. J. K.

Sheshequin, January, 1839.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THOMAS POTTER.

Br. Grosh—Permit me, if you please, through the medium of your most excellent paper, to communicate to our brethren of the Abrahamic faith, a few hints upon a subject connected with the memory of the first American friend of the venerable and lamented Murray. It is well known that Thomas Potter first greeted him with the cordial embrace of a brother in Christ, on his landing at Goodluck, New-Jersey. There it was, that, strongly impressed with the belief that his heavenly Father would, in his own due time, send a preacher to disseminate the truth as it is in Jesus, Potter set apart a lot of ground belonging to himself, erected a house, and dedicated it to the peaceable worship of the true God. By divine mystery, was the Heaven-directed Murray guided to that hospitable retreat; and there, in that secluded temple, like "the voice of one crying in the wilderness," he lifted up his voice and proclaimed the grace of God, which bringeth salvation to all men; and there, too, in his large pew, sat his friend Potter, listening to the welcome message of Gospel truth.

In this memory-consecrated place, lie the remains of that friend. Animated by the desire, that the worship of the true and living God might continue to be performed in that place, untainted by the orisons of bigotry, he bequeathed the meeting-house, and the lot where he now reposes in the silence of dissolved nature, to his beloved Murray, who afterwards conveyed the title to the society worshipping in that place, as a memorial of their illustrious predecessor.

But alas! what a change! An opposing denomination now holds possession of this sequestered place. Another doctrine has succeeded the pure principles which were loved and practiced by him who dedicated his house to the worship of God. An opposing sect now chant the requiem over the grave of departed worth.

Brethren, methinks this ought not to be so.—Can we not put forth a united effort, to secure to ourselves the possession of this place. It is a desirable thing to obtain the burial place of our long since departed brother, as the property of the denomination; or at least to rescue it from the shades of a theory which we labor to expel from the Christian church. It will require but a mite from each individual to raise a sum sufficient to accomplish this desirable object. Let us try.

Williamson, January, 1839. A. G. W.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ALL THE WORLD.

We have been tracing upon the maps, the outlines of the once famous Roman Empire. Considering the immense extent of thickly peopled fields, included within the Atlantic Ocean on the West, the Rhine and the Danube on the North, the Euphrates on the East, and the sandy deserts of Arabia and Africa towards the South, we are not astonished at the imposing annunciation of a sacred historian, who informs us that "in those days there went out a decree from Cesar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed." The above boundaries comprehend all the most renowned provinces of antiquity. What were the inducements which moved the Romans to make such extensive conquests? was a question put to me, while surveying these almost illimitable territories of this leviathan empire. I showed that it could not be, in all cases, a love of living upon the spoils and labors of the subjugated nations; for it took much more to defend their outposts among the forests, mountains, and morasses of Germany and Britain, than the savage hunters of these regions could be made to repay to their victors. I said that the love of power or dominion, was probably as great a moving force as the love of tribute or of spoils. Alexander the Great and Bonaparte, were referred to as instances in which this passion was prominently developed. National pride might also be a powerful exciting cause of the Roman world—subduing propensity. The voice of reason and prudence is generally despised when fame, national or personal, is in view, and for the bubble reputation, "the Romans might carry their arms wherever dwelt an independent people, even when their pecuniary interests, or their love of life, were opposed to the aggression. The power of these two propensities, or principles of action, was commented on. To turn this subject, still further, to some good account, I suggested the inquiry, To what purpose was this immense empire permitted to extend "from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same?" The knowledge of letters and the arts of civilized life, were thus introduced among barbarous nations; but I submitted if it were not the greatest benefit to the human family, arising from this cementing and consolidating of so many people and provinces, that a knowledge of Christianity was not confined for ages to that people among whom its Founder appeared, but was carried over the whole of the then-known world. A. N. S. S.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CONFERENCE AT HUME.

The third Conference of the Allegany Association, met according to previous adjournment, at Hume, the 29th and 30th of December last. Br. Couch, Moderator, and Br. N. Partridge, Clerk. Brs. Minard, Couch, and Partridge a committee to arrange public services. Sermons were preached by Brs. Todd, Thornton, Lewis, Babcock and Manley. The Baptist society was very kind in giving the use of their meeting-house for the occasion, for which the believers in the final restitution in Hume, tender their best respects. The meeting was well attended, and on the last day the congregation was so large that not much more than half could get into the house. It was therefore proposed to have a discourse in the school-house, for the accommodation of those who could not get into the meeting-house. We hope the time is not far distant when there will be a meeting-house in Hume, large enough to hold all who may assemble to hear the Gospel of life and salvation. The Conference adjourned to meet in Randolph, on the 23d and 24th of February, 1839. I. B. Sharp.

The following communications from Br. Townsend, should have been inserted in their time, but were delayed through mistake. A. R. B.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ONTARIO ASSOCIATION FOR 1838.

The Ontario Association met in Newark, October 10th, 1838. Elected Br. S. Miles, Moderator, Brs. N. Bingham, Wm. Andrews, and S. Miles, Committee on fellowship, etc. Brs. Azel Berry, O. Ackley, and J. Chase, Committee of discipline Brs. T. J. Whitcomb and Wm. Queal, clerical, and Brs. Daniel Kenyon and Azel Berry, lay, delegates to N. Y. S. Convention, with power to elect substitutes. The Committee of discipline reported no cause of complaint. Br. Isaac Sargeant resigned his letter of fellowship as a preacher, and his resignation was accepted. Adjourned to meet in Wolcott, on the 1st Wednesday and Thursday in September, 1839.

The societies in Arcadia, Perrinton, North Penfield, Victor, Livonia, Wolcott, Geneva, Manchester, Rochester and Bristol, were represented in council. Five sermons were preached to large and attentive congregations. Our cause in this section is in a prosperous condition. The friends in this part of the country have done themselves much honor. But a few months since they had no preaching, no house of worship, no organization—and a chance meeting was but thinly attended. In a little more than a year, a congregation has been gathered, preaching sustained for the past twelve months, a society organized, and a church commenced, completed and dedicated; and all this has been accomplished by the understanding efforts of a few devoted friends.

In our vicinity, congregations are now large, sometimes unusually so. Three times, at 4 o'clock lectures, we have been compelled to resort to the woods, the school-house being insufficient to accommodate the female part of our congregation. The first meeting was largely attended, the congregation at the second had visibly increased, and at the third, it was still larger than before. K. Townsend, Standing Clerk.

N. B. Br. Spencer Mitchell, with whom I have been long acquainted, is with me, intending to spend the Winter, and to attend to such calls as may be made for his services as a preacher, in this section. He has already preached some, and I understand to good acceptance. K. T.

November, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

DEDICATION.

The new church recently erected in Newark, (town of Arcadia,) was dedicated to the worship of God, on the morning of the 10th of October, being the first day of the session of the Ontario Association. Sermon by the pastor of the society. Prayer by Br. O. Ackley—dedicatory prayer by Br. Geo. W. Montgomery.

K. Townsend.

November, 1838.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

TO UNIVERSALIST MINISTERS.

This Institution, which has been in successful operation for more than six years, was projected by Universalists—it was organized by them—its officers, its teachers and its patrons, are principally of that denomination. The funds contributed for the erection of suitable buildings (and they are of the best and most convenient kind) have been almost exclusively given by Universalists; and the entire superintendance of the Institution has always appertained to them. More than one thousand youth of both sexes, have been respectably educated under these auspices; which, but for the existence of this Institution, must have been done, if done at all, by those of opposing faith. It is therefore no longer a question whether the Liberal Institute will be beneficial—it has already done much good, and rescued a large number of youth from the control of the opposers of our faith.

But it should not be forgotten, that all this has been effected principally by the money advanced by one man. For this, he has never had any security—nor even asked the interest of some thousands of dollars. It is reasonable and right, that this money should, if possible, be refunded; and it is believed to be in the power, and perhaps at the will of Universalist ministers to accomplish that desirable end. And with a view to its attainment, and with the sincere hope that it may be attained, the respective ministers of Universalist congregations in the State of New-York, are affectionately requested to take up collections in their several meetings on the third Sunday in February next, and transmit the sums so collected at their earliest convenience, to Rev. A. B. Grosh, Utica, who will pay it over to the Treasurer of said Institute, for the liquidation of said honest debt.

January 9, 1839. S. R. Smith, Agent.

N. B. Those societies which have not public services on the third Sunday in February, are respectfully solicited to take up the collection on the earliest Sunday on which they have such services. S. R. S.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

MY VIEW OF THE CASE.

Reader, this is to be a very short article—only just long enough to fill out this corner of the paper. You can, therefore, afford to peruse it attentively, and even to read the following paragraph twice over. Will you do it?

Every believer in Universalism is under very great and solemn obligation to be a sober, honest, industrious, benevolent, virtuous, and useful citizen—a charitable, pious, praying, practical Christian. And this obligation rests upon all who believe, whether they profess their faith or not—to say, as many do, "I am not a professor," is making no valid excuse for want of conformity to the requirements of our faith.

Reader, this is my view of the case—what is yours? Philip.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE HAPPY FAMILY.

A Juvenile Tale.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

CHAPTER III.

The ride—visiting the sick—the power of faith.

It was on a fine Autumnal morning, a few weeks after the occurrence of the events of which we spoke in the last chapter, that the family went on a ride into the country. The sun was shining very pleasantly when they set out—the birds were singing, and every thing seemed to smile and rejoice. It was indeed a beautiful morning. And then the pure air was so refreshing—altogether, it was just the time for a ride, seeing there was every thing to render it pleasant.

George and Adeline were much delighted—their eyes sparkled with joy and animation. They were praising every thing; and every object, to them, was clothed with beauty. And then they were continually asking their parents about those things that particularly attracted their attention. Now they inquired the names of the different trees of the forest through which they were passing; and then of the different birds that were flitting about among the branches, and tuning their voices to the sweetest music.

"God must be very good," at length said Adeline, while conversing with her mother—"God must be very good to make these pretty birds to sing so sweetly for us." And this was uttered in a way which told that the beautiful sentiment came from the heart of the child.

"Yes, my dear," said the mother, "God is good to us in this, and in a thousand different ways. To please the eye, He has made the pretty flowers, the green meadows, the hills, the valleys, and the thousand water-brooks. To gratify the sense of hearing, he has filled the world with song. He has made the birds to sing, the streams to murmur as they run, and has clothed the human voice with melody! Yes, my child, in a thousand ways God has blessed us. And we ought to love him more and more for the kind care which he takes of us."

"We have loved him," said George, "ever since you told us that He was our Father, and that he made for us the sweet flowers and the pretty birds."

"We do not doubt it," said the father in return; "we have every reason to think that you do love him; but, as your mother has just said, you should love him more and more. God will always be your Father. He will always be kind to you. And when your parents are both dead and gone, He will watch over you, and guide you through life in peace. Ever trust in Him, my children, and you shall be richly rewarded."

The conversation here ceased. They had arrived at the dwelling of a poor widow woman, who was dangerously ill. Consumption was bearing her down to the grave. She was already wasted away to a mere skeleton. Children she had none. Two sons had once called her mother, but they were cut down in their youth, and laid out of her sight in the grave. Her husband, too, had perished away, and she was left alone. She had indeed seen affliction; but her's was a faith which overcomes the world, and she bore up under it patiently. Mr. Norton, after the family had left the carriage, and walked up to the house, gave a low rap at the door, and was bid to enter by the nurse. They went in and walked up to the bed-side of the sick woman, when she stretched forth her feeble hand to them all, expressing herself very much pleased that they had called to visit a poor widow in her affliction.

"But few call to see me," she said, "but yourselves; and it rejoices this old heart to meet with kindness now, when so much needed. Kind words affect me more now, than before this sickness came"—and tears were seen standing in her eyes.

"You appear to be in less pain now than when we were here before," said Mr. Norton.

"I think I am more free from pain; but then I grow weaker and weaker every day. I must soon lay aside this earthly body, for one that is spiritual and heavenly—and this change will be welcomed when it comes. I feel to say as did the great Apostle of the Gentiles: "For me to live is Christ, but to die is gain."

"You seem to be perfectly submissive to the will of Divine Providence," said Mrs. Norton—"Your faith must be strong in him who died for us."

"I try not to murmur nor complain, but to pray in sincerity as did our Saviour—'Not my will, but thine be done.' And how can I repine? I look upon God as my Father, and as afflicting me for my good. I look upon him as the Friend and Parent of all, and forward to a time when sin shall be no more, nor pain, nor death; when the Great Redeemer shall have triumphed over every foe and every enemy of man, and every heart be filled with gladness, and every tongue with praise."

The old lady here paused, having become completely exhausted; for it was with great effort that she could speak at all.

After Mrs. Norton had given some directions to the nurse concerning the giving of some medicine which she had brought with her, and they all had shaken hands with the poor sick woman, and bid her good bye, promising to call again soon, they stepped into their carriage and drove home, much happier for their ride, and their morning visit to the sick.

BR. SKINNER.

By a letter received from Br. Skinner at St. Croix, we learn that his first two letters (containing, most probably, the account of his voyage and the particulars of his health,) have been sent, but have not yet been received here. It would appear from the letter now received, that he is enjoying improving health and good spirits. A. B. G.

Business Items.—C. S., Phelps, is credited for vols. 9 and 10.

Br. Sanderson—Sidney Allen, Pultneyville, says he paid for vol. 9 at your office in Rochester, and has a receipt. Is this correct?

Br. Rogers—Credit Jesse Richards, Binghampton, Pro and Con, and send him the four back numbers from this date. Br. C. S. Brown suggests the propriety of your sending the Pro and Con in some other form to make the postage less. Thinks he could get several subscribers if it were done. Also, credit Selleck Seymour, Cold Water, Branch county, Mich., $3, and charge us. He wants the three years paper for the $3.

Publishers of the Expositor—Send current vol. to Rev. S. Barnes, Perry, Genesee county, N. Y., if you have not already.

Also, transfer one copy of Rev. O. Wilcox's Expositor of Fowler, to Rev. J. French, Denmark, Lewis county, N. Y., and send Br. French No. 1, which has not been received.

Please say to Br. Price, send Hon J. Berry, Adrian, Lenawee county, Mich., Octavo edition of Union from commencement, and credit Br. B. $2.50, and charge me. Also, send John W. Crane, Jr., Quarto edition Union, commencing with present vol., credit Br. C. $1 and charge me. Also, credit Br. S. K. Jones, Ann Arbor, Mich., on old account, $8, and charge me the same.

N. Sawyer.

New Agents.—B. Monroe, Sylvania, Pa.—W. H. H. Crandall, East Greene—Wynan Whitcomb, Pason, Ills.—Rev. Wm. Parker, Felchville, Vt.

Br. Ichabod B. Sharp, requests that all letters and papers designed for him, be directed to Hume, Allegany county.

SOME AGENTS

Have informed us of their intention to defer remitting until next Spring, when they could send by private conveyance. We cheerfully pay postage on all remittances of five dollars and upwards, and would advise them not to delay such sums, especially if they can send drafts or acceptances. Our heaviest payments fall due between this and Spring, and a dollar now is worth more to us, than the same, with treble interest, after a delay of some months. A dollar (as well as a friend) in need, is a dollar indeed.

[From the Trumpet.]

REPLY TO BR. GROSH.

On our last page to-day, will be found the entire article from Br. Grosh's pen, verbatim et literatim, to which we are now to offer a reply. Let the reader in the first place peruse that with candor.

This controversy was not of our seeking. When the Rev. Richard Roe, of Dublin, in Ireland, refused to accept the office of Corresponding Secretary for Ireland, to the Universalist Historical Society, alleging as a reason for so doing that the Universalists of the United States were Unitarians, we thought he had come to the conclusion that our sentiments in general were in agreement with the Unitarianism of Great Britain. We said, "he regards Unitarianism, as it prevails in Great Britain, to be a modified infidelity," etc. We did not speak of Unitarianism only in one feature, but of its general character; and we wished to correct Mr. Roe. We therefore added, "Mr. Roe is altogether misinformed if he supposes the Universalists of this country have any sympathy with Unitarianism as above described," viz., as it prevails in Great Britian, "a modified infidelity, claiming the name of Christianity, but denying many of the most essential points of Christian faith." We have examined this subject again and again. We can not see wherein we were wrong; and we are obliged now to reaffirm, that the Universalists of the United States, have no sympathy with Unitarianism as above described.—We will speak shortly of the worship of Jesus, though that was only one of the points in which we described the opinions of Universalists. We fully believe that our statements were correct, in regard to the Universalists of America; and so believing, we can not retract them.

Br Grosh affirms, again and again, until the repetition becomes unpleasant, that we intended Mr. Roe should infer, that the Universalists of the United States held to the worship of Christ, in the Trinitarian sense of the term worship. He says, we must have intended "that Mr. Roe should understand the term worship, as Trinitarians understand that word when applied to Jesus in the Scriptures." He is a little too positive in his terms. We have said again and again, that we discard the doctrine of the Trinity altogether, and so we stated, with great particularity, to Mr. Roe. We are not sure that we precisely understand what Br. Grosh means by the "Trinitarian sense of the word worship." The word Trinitarian comes from Trinity; and has reference to the doctrine of a triune God. A Trinitarian worships a triune God; and this is worship "in the Trinitarian sense of the word." If Br. Grosh means by "worship in the Trinitarian sense of the term," any thing to which the word Trinitarian may properly be applied, we affirm that we do not believe in the worship either of Christ, or any other being, in such a sense.—And we esteem it an unfortunate word for him to have chosen, when we stated so particularly to Mr. Roe, that Universalists are not Trinitarians, but hold to the undivided and absolute supremacy of God. Why he should use this word again and again in regard to us, and with extraordinary pertinacity declare that we MUST have used the word worship in such a sense, we can not explain, except upon the supposition, that he wrote in great haste, and in a warmth of feeling not favorable to a fair judgment.

Laboring under this view, Br. Grosh goes on to show, what nobody ever thought of doubting, that Universalists address their prayers to God, dedicate meeting-houses to God, etc. Who in the name of reason ever doubted this? It is not necessary to make the least reply to suggestions like these. They were altogether uncalled for.

Let us see if we can not settle this matter in regard to the worship of Christ, to Br. G.'s satisfaction. He is so sure what we MUST have meant, that there will be some difficulty we fear in convincing him; nevertheless we will try. We said to Mr. Roe, [and we really wish Br. Grosh had attended to these words when we gave them to him the second time,] "Jesus shall participate with the Father in receiving ascriptions of praise and glory from the boundless universe." Is not this true? Let us proceed. "When his work is fully done, when sin is finished, and transgression has an end, when all apparent evil is banished from the wide universe, then shall Jesus receive the homage of all." Is not this clearly true according to the Scriptures? Do not the sacred writers most fully bear us out in the above statement? Do they not assure us, that the redeemed in heaven, render blessing, honor, glory and power to God AND THE LAMB? They most assuredly do. Well, after having asserted to Mr. Roe, that Jesus should thus participate with the Father in receiving ascriptions of praise and glory from the boundless universe, we stated, what was an undeniable deduction from those premises, and we stated it as a deduction from the premises, that "Universalists are clearly of opinion that Jesus Christ is an object of worship." What kind of worship we did not define, any farther than this, that it was the worship, which the glorified hosts of heaven rendered unitedly to God and the Lamb. We did not say to Mr. Roe, what we are perfectly willing now to say, that this worship is spiritual and divine [not Trinitarian]. We do not believe that Jesus will ever be worshipped as the supreme God, for all the worship that heaven will render to Christ will be "to the glory of God the Father;" but we do believe that the sacred writers most plainly teach, that God and the Lamb shall receive divine honors from the assembled universe. And we do affirm again, that we never heard of a Universalist denying this, until Br. Grosh's denial came on. Universalists can not deny this without denying the Bible; and it is doing them great injustice to represent them as not believing it.

After having in our article concerning Mr. Roe, shown that the universe should at last worship God and the Lamb with divine honors; and after having stated that Universalists believe Christ to be an object of worship, we proceeded to prove it by an appeal to the word of God; and to this appeal which we made, Br. Grosh has not paid the least attention. He thus passed over our main point. He failed to notice the explanation we gave of our meaning, and the Scriptural proofs we offered in defence of it. If, instead of striving to make it appear, that we held to the worship of Christ in the Trinitarian sense of the term, he had given his attention to see whether we did not hold to it in the scriptural sense of the term, we might have been spared this controversy. We immediately proceeded to prove what we said on this matter. Follow us, reader, and see how fully we proved it. "Universalists are clearly of opinion that Jesus Christ is an object of worship. What passage of Scripture do they more frequently quote than the following: 'God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.'" After having quoted this, we added, "we are unable to understand this passage, if it does not describe the worship of Christ by the assembled universe." We did not mean in the Trinitarian sense, but in the scriptural sense.—We then quoted from the book of Revelation, the passage in which John describes his vision, wherein he heard the angels saying, "WORTHY IS THE LAMB that was slain." Worthy of what? Worthy "to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing." And then every creature in the universe was heard to say, "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and UNTO THE LAMB FOREVER AND EVER." See Rev. v: 11–13. This we willingly allow is not worship in the Trinitarian sense, but it is heavenly worship, divine worship—the Lamb participates with the Father in these ascriptions and addresses. Now if Universalists believe the Bible, they believe this. There are no passages they more frequently quote than those quoted above: and we have no doubt they believe them. And if they do believe them, then (Br. Grosh to the contrary notwithstanding) "Universalists are clearly of opinion that Jesus Christ is an object of worship." Such was our original proposition. We have defined this worship to be spiritual and divine; and we once more affirm this original proposition to be true. Ninety-nine Universalists in a hundred believe it; yes, must not every real Universalist believe it?

This then is our opinion concerning the worship of Jesus. Now remark, this is not dedicating meeting-houses to him.—it is not regarding him as God the Supreme. And here let us say, that as the Supreme Being, God ALONE is the object of worship. In this sense we may say,

> "Worship to Thee alone belongs,
> Worship to Thee alone we give."

And here we might introduce all the hymns Br. Grosh has quoted, and the extract from Br. S. R. Smith's sermon, also. Those hymns assert nothing against the worship of Christ as we have defined it. In fact, almost, if not quite all the hymns, from which Br. Grosh has quoted, were written by thorough going Trinitarians, who believed in the worship of Jesus as the second person in the Trinity. Br. G. therefore must not bring up their hymns to show, that Jesus is not to be regarded as an object of divine worship. He forgot that he was quoting the unaltered language of Trinitarian poets.—And as to the extract from Br. S. R. Smith's sermon. He was evidently speaking of the worship of God as the Supreme Being. We must have it from his own lips before we can believe, that he intended to deny that Jesus is to be worshipped with the Father, and participate with him in receiving ascriptions of glory and honor forever and ever.

We have thus given our views in full, of the worship which heaven renders to God and the Lamb; and we know nothing we need add to this description, except to say, that if it is our duty to pray to God, "thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven," we surely may on earth, so far as our limited vision and our feeble powers shall permit, imitate the worship in which the heavenly hosts are engaged.

Let us now look at Br. Grosh's views of the worship of Christ. We deeply regret that he has not been more particular in stating them. After reading what he has written, the only impression left upon our mind, may be thus expressed. 1st. He professes to believe in the worship of Christ in some sense; but he has left this matter very indefinite. 2d. He believes in the worship of Christ, he says, as Unitarians do, but this does not make his views much more definite. 3d. He does not believe in the worship of Christ "with what is commonly called religious or divine worship." Then in what manner will he worship Christ? If he can not render either religious or divine worship, what worship will he render? He says he can sing from the heart all the hymns we quoted in a former article; but still he can not render religious worship to Christ. He says he believes all the passages of Scripture we have quoted, but he can not render to the Saviour divine worship. He must explain these things as best he can; but we fear he has fallen far into the depths of Priestleyian philosophy. How much soever we regret this, we attach no blame to him for it; but we claim that he ought not to represent ninety-nine hundredths of the Universalists in the United States as agreeing with him in opinion. He says, (and it is the most painful sentence to us that ever proceeded from his pen,) "UNIVERSALISTS GENERALLY, to say the least, [and to use the language of Belsham, quoted by Br. W.,] disavow all those personal regards to Christ, and direct addresses to him, either of prayer or praise, which properly fall under the denomination of religious [or divine] worship." We enter our utter dissent to this statement. We will not speak for New-York: but we do not know of a clergyman of our faith in all New-England, who would subscribe to this sentiment. Did John, the Revelator, disavow all those personal regards to Christ and direct addresses to him, either of prayer or praise, which properly fall under the denomination of religious [or divine] worship, when he uttered the following words: "UNTO HIM WHO HATH LOVED US, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; TO HIM BE GLORY AND DOMINION FOREVER AND EVER. AMEN."—Rev. i: 5, 6. Is not this a "direct address" to Christ? There can not be a doubt of it. Is it not in its form and spirit, an address of gratitude and PRAISE? Does it not ascribe glory and dominion forever and ever to the Redeemer for what he had done? Certainly. Then it is a direct address of praise. It is evidently worship; and of just the same character with all the worship that heaven is said to render. True, it is not worship in the Trinitarian sense of the term, but it is worship in the Scriptural sense of the term; and if it be not religious and divine worship, then no worship can be religious and divine. It is not the worship of God, nor of Jesus as God; but it is the worship of Christ in a religious and divine manner, as the Redeemer, who hath washed us from our sins in his own blood. It is the same worship with that which is spoken of in the fifth chapter of Revelation. "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto him which sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." We repeat here, that the Lamb evidently participates with the Father in receiving ascriptions from all men. And now Br. Grosh says, that "UNIVERSALISTS GENERALLY, to say the least," agree with Belsham in "disavowing all those personal regards to Christ, and all those direct addresses to him, either of prayer or praise, which properly fall under the denomination of religious or divine worship." We do not say that Br. Grosh made this misrepresentation with any malicious intent; we do not think he did; we think it is a mistake; but that it is a VERY GREAT ERROR, we think there is no doubt. We beseech Br. Grosh not to impute his Belshamism to Universalists generally. And let him be careful too, the next time he calls us to account for misrepresenting the opinions of Universalists, that he does not greatly misrepresent them himself. If there be a Universalist clergyman in the United States, excepting Br. Grosh, who feels himself misrepresented by our declaration, that the Universalists as a body disagree with Belsham in the above remark, if he will send his name to us, we will publish it as an exception. We except Br. G., because he has already joined hands with Belsham in this derogation from the character of our Lord. We must esteem it a derogation although Br. G. does not.

Perhaps we shall again subject ourselves to the charge of using the ad captandum style; but nevertheless, since Br. G. has adopted as his own the words of Belsham, we must apply those words to some of our hymns, and see how they agree. Br. G. "disavows all those personal regards to Christ, and direct addresses to him, either of prayer or praise, which properly fall under the denomination of religious [or divine] worship." Now we take the late hymn-book of Br. H. Ballou, 2d. 1st

Direct Addresses. See 218, C. M. four verses, in which we find these four direct addresses to Christ:

"Jesus, and di'st thou condescend"
* * * * *
"Jesus, thou Son of David hear,'
* * * * *
"O pity Lord, and save my soul,"
* * * * *
"I perish, Lord, O save my soul,
For thou alone canst save."

See the 255th hymn, by one of our own clergy, now departed, beginning,

"Jesus, Comforter divine,
Consolations, Lord, are t[illegible]"

But instances of the direct addresses are too numerous to quote in full. See hymn 254, 251, 267, [illegible] 542, 543, 43. Our hymn books abound with direct addresses to Christ. It seems to us too on reading these hymns they partake of the character of prayer as well as praise, and are direct addresses, and proofs of personal regard to the Saviour.

We have settled the matter of the direct address and personal regard. We next enquire, Do Universalists praise Christ? If any one will look at the arrangement of subjects in Br. H. Ballou 2d's Hymn-Book, he will find one division entitled, "Praise to Christ," extending from the [illegible]th to the 244th hymn. All these hymns are in praise to the Redeemer, and we need not quote passages from any of them. Now we have found the personal regards, and the direct address of praise and prayer to Christ, in our latest hymn-book. It only remains to inquire, whether these properly fall under the name of religious and divine worship. That they are worship no one will doubt. We sing them in our public assemblies, as parts of our worship; and these hymns rank among our most favorite hymns, some of them composed by our own preachers. These addresses to Christ, therefore, properly fall under the denomination of religious worship. So we see our hymns are a direct contradiction of Belshamism. Well, is "his worship divine, for Br. G. adds that word to Mr. Belsham's sentence. See 245th hymn of Ballou.

"Jesus is worthy to receive Honor and [illegible]"

If this is not ascribing divine honor and power to Christ, then we know not the meaning of language.—And yet Br. Grosh tells us that "Universalists generally ☞ to say the least!! 'disavow all those personal regards to Christ, and direct addresses to him, either of prayer or praise, which properly fall under the denomination of religious [or divine] worship.'" This was a sad and wide-sweeping mistake of his.

We may then ask, 1st. "Are Universalists of opinion that Jesus Christ is an object of worship?" This question beyond all dispute must be answered in the affirmative. 2d. Do they worship Christ in the same manner with the Unitarians "in Great Britain?" for that was our original qualification. No, not if Belsham's authority may be depended on. 3d. Have we not shewn then, that our original statements on this matter were correct? and have we not sustained them by irrefutable testimony?

Br. G. complains of us because we quoted Rev. R. W. Emerson as authority, to show what Unitarians believe. If this were wrong, we regret it. There was no need at all of our quoting that gentleman; but his Address having so recently been delivered, it was uppermost in our mind, and we adduced it without cause.—But Br. Grosh states that "Prof. Ware has preached and published an able and generally approved refutation" of Mr. Emerson's opinions. We suppose Prof. W.'s sermon was designed to counteract Mr. Emerson's pantheism; but the Professor does not mention directly either Mr. E. or his Address, in a single instance. But notwithstanding he does most clearly expose the folly of Mr. Emerson's pantheism, he makes not even the most distant allusion to what Mr. Emerson said in regard to Christ. So that the reference to Prof. W.'s sermon was rather an unfortunate hit for Br. Grosh. It seems scarcely possible that Br. G. should have referred to this sermon as he did, if he had read it.

Thus we have written a long communication. Peruse it, gentle reader, attentively; and may God guide you into the knowledge of all truth.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

"I HAVE NO TIME."

How frequently do we hear uttered the above excuse;—and often, much too often. I ween, at the expense of—do I speak harshly when I say—truth? At least, I fancy we may, many times be in an error; and if we would candidly examine ourselves, when we make the apology, we should not unfrequently find that it was not so much "time" that was scanty, as a will to employ the portion given us. E. R.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1839.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. II.

HADES.—CONCLUDED.

V. The last instance where hades is translated hell, is Rev. xx: 13, 14—"And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works. And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death." In considering this passage, as I have a number of ideas to offer, I shall,

1. Remark, that the book of Revelation is so highly figurative, and of such doubtful interpretation, as to make it clear that we should not rely upon it for proof of any important doctrine. Men of the highest talents have given so many fanciful views of it, as to render it a matter of doubt whether any person fully understands it. Besides, if endless misery is taught in the passage last quoted, how shall we understand John, when in the 16th chapter, thirteenth verse, he said. "And every creature which is in Heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever"? Certainly, the book can not teach both endless misery and the restitution of all things.

2. Some divines have concluded that the book of Revelation was written after the destruction of Jerusalem—others of equal talent, have supposed that it was written before. But from the consideration of all circumstances, it appears to me probable that it was written previous to the destruction of Jerusalem, because it appears that the holy city and temple were still standing when the Revelator wrote. In chapter xi: 1, 2, he says. "And there was given me a reed like unto a rod, and the angel stood, saying, rise and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein. But the court which is without the temple, leave out, and measure it not, for it is given unto the Gentiles; and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months." Take the fact, that the temple in Jerusalem had an outer court, called the court of the Gentiles, with what our Saviour said: "And Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled," Luke xxi: 24, and it seems positive proof that the temple was standing when John wrote the book of Revelation.

Besides, it is evident that John expected that the events of which he wrote, would soon transpire. Hence he commences his book by saying, "The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass."—Verse 1. In verse 3, he says, "for the time is at hand." In the last chapter he said, "And the Lord God of the holy prophets sent his angel to show unto his servants the things which must shortly be done." — xxii: 6.—Again: "Behold, I come quickly."—V. 7. Again: "Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book; for the time is at hand."—V. 10. Again: "He which testifieth these things, saith, Surely I come quickly."—V. 20. If these unequivocal expressions do not denote that John believed the events of which he was speaking, were shortly to transpire, then I do not understand language. But if it be true that the events were soon to transpire, then John must have written his book previous to the destruction of the Jews, for the purpose of illustrating the punishment of that people, and the more complete establishment of Christianity.

3. Observe the language of the passage itself—"and death and hell were cast into the lake of fire." Thus hades, whatever we way deem it to be, is to be destroyed. Dr. Campbell remarks of this passage—"If we interpret hades, hell, in the Christian sense of the word, the whole passage is rendered nonsense. Hell is represented as being cast into hell; for so the lake of fire, which is, in this place, also denominated the second death, is universally interpreted."—Dis. 6, P. 2, Sec. 13, p. 294. It then follows, even if we admit the lake of fire to be a place of future torment, that hell is to be swallowed up in it. Why, then, do we hear the word hell so often appealed to as proof of endless misery? It is not hell which is the proof—it is the lake of fire, if any thing. If the lake of fire be the place of future torment, as Mr. Campbell thinks, then we are driven to the strange conclusion, that believers in such torment are driven to Revelation, a book confessedly of doubtful meaning, for proof of their sentiments; for the phrase "lake of fire and brimstone," occurs in no other part of the Bible. View this as we may, however, our object of showing that hell, in this instance, does not refer to a place of future pain, is effected, because it is to be swallowed up in the lake.

4. We will present a few observations concerning the lake. I presume it will not be necessary for me to show, that this "lake of fire and brimstone" is a figure; for the notion of a literal, burning lake of fire and brimstone, in the future world, is now obsolete; scarcely an individual believes it; the lake is supposed to be a figure of pain of conscience. I need not, therefore, attempt to prove what is generally admitted. I think, so far as I have light on this subject, that the words death and hell, hades, or the grave, are figures, expressive of the benighted condition and moral death of the Jews, previous to the destruction of their nation; and I suppose that the "lake of fire and brimstone" is a figure of the horrible punishment which came upon them for the murder of Jesus. In support of this position, I will quote a passage which is so much like the prophecies concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, and so obviously alluding to calamities on earth, that its bare recital will be sufficient to show that the "lake of fire and brimstone" may be this side of the grave. "And I saw the beasts, and the kings of the earth and their armies, gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse, and against his army—And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. And the remnant were slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse, which sword proceeded out of his mouth; and all the fowls were filled with their flesh."—xix: 19, 20, 21. How very like this is the language of Isaiah, when speaking of the overturn of the Jews—"And they shall go forth, and look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against me: for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh."—lxvi: 24. Besides this, Drs. Hammond and Clarke explain the lake of fire and brimstone in the last passage, as having reference to things of this life—and we have no reason to suppose that in the other passage, it has a different reference.

This casting into the "lake of fire and brimstone," is called the second death—a phrase which is supposed to mean destruction from the presence of the Lord in a future world. But there is one consideration, even admitting that there is such a death in the future world, which positively forbids it to be called the second death; for it is not a second death. Every believer in Christianity admits that there is a moral death arising from transgression, and that all men, at some period of their lives, endure this moral death—this is the first death.—What is the second? Why, clearly, natural death, when we leave this earth. Consequently, if there be another death beyond the grave, it must be a third death—it can not, with any degree of propriety, be called the second death. What then is the second death, spoken of by the Revelator?

The Jews, at the time of Christ, were morally dead. Matthew says, when our Saviour commenced his ministry, that the people which sat in the region and shadow of death, saw great light.—Chap. iv. They were dead to their condition, dead in hate of the Redeemer, dead in sin. But at the time of the destruction of their nation, they all had a resurrection, spoken of in the 5th of John; some had a resurrection to the eternal life of knowing the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he sent—the rest had a resurrection to a knowledge of their sinfulness in crucifying the Redeemer, and in their horrible punishment, prefigured by the lake of fire and brimstone, they experienced a second death—death to prosperity and national as well as religious honor.

It is a well-known fact, that all believers in Christ had previously been in the moral death of sin and error—but by faith they had passed from death unto life, as our Saviour expresses it. In defending the truth, from the resurrection of Christ to the destruction of Jerusalem, the believers had many severe trials to encounter. Our Saviour said, in the 24th of Matthew, that he which endured to the end, should be saved. To the church in Smyrna it was said, "He that overcometh, shall not be hurt of the second death."—Rev. ii: 11. This was true—not an individual believer in Christ, who persevered in his Christian integrity, was lost—all were preserved. But those who apostatized, (for our Saviour spoke of some whose love would wax cold,) would again sink in moral, and to them, a second death; more severe than the first, because their criminality was greater in sinning against greater light. Hence, Jude speaks of false teachers who were "twice dead, plucked up by the roots"—that is, those who had once been dead in ignorance and sin; but by the renewing power of divine truth, had received the spiritual life of believing the Gospel in all its glory and vigor; after a time, however, they apostatized from following the Saviour, fell back into the dominion of error and transgression, and a second time tasted moral death. Thus they were twice dead, plucked up by the roots; their faith in Christ was wholly gone.

Now, from all these facts we feel justified in concluding, that the common interpretation of this passage is incorrect and incapable of proof; that the passage not only affords no countenance for endless misery, but it presents no obstacle to the fulfilment of the gracious truth, that when "the fulness of the Gentiles be come in," "all Israel shall be saved."

VI. The concluding fact which we shall present, is, that death and its dominion, sheol, hades, the grave, the state of the dead, are to be destroyed and forever to lose their power over man. Call hades what we please, think of it as we may, it can not always exist, for it is to be overturned and annihilated. What says the holy prophet?—"I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death; O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction; repentance shall be hid from mine eyes."—Hosea xiii: 14. The apostle Paul must have had his eye on this language, when he said, "O death! where is thy sting? O grave (hades,) where is thy victory?"—1 Cor. xv: 55. Well may we ask of hades, where is its victory, when Christ shall have destroyed death in all its forms, and made the whole human family "equal to the angels of God in heaven." How glad will be the triumph, and how noble the song which a redeemed world shall chant, when there shall be "no more death," and God shall "be all in all."

VII. Taking all the foregoing considerations into account, together with the fact that hades is to end, can that word present even a shadow of proof in favor of endless misery?

G. W. M.

WORSHIP OF CHRIST.

Under the head, "Reply to Br. Grosh," will be found Br. Whittemore's article on this subject, copied from the Trumpet of December 22d. It has been delayed till now, partly by the crowd of articles incident to the season—partly to remove Br. W.'s complaints of my haste and hot headedness! The article to which it replies, appeared in No. 48 of our last volume—let the "Reply" be read in connection with that and the present article, and the reader can then judge for himself.

Br. W. says this controversy was none of his seeking, and, in another article, that he has stood on the defensive alone. If to misrepresent our views, and to persist in that misrepresentation for a time, is to act on the defensive, he is correct—if not, he is the aggressor; I, the defendant.

His history of the controversy needs some addition. He gave the worship of Christ as one point on which we differed from Unitarians, and that to a Trinitarian, who would, of course, understand him to mean that we worshipped Jesus in a sense opposed to the Unitarian sense of the word worship—i. e. in the "Trinitarian sense," by which I mean "supreme worship." I therefore noticed his statement; but, lest I should be misunderstood, I carefully defined the meaning from which, only, I did dissent. I said—"IF by worship, Br. W. means what all Unitarians [afterwards modified to 'Unitarians generally'] understand by the term as used in the Scriptures," then he was correct—"but IF he meant by the term worship, what our Trinitarian brethren generally understand by it," then (and then only) I denied the correctness of his statement. Br. W. asserts that I denied the correctness of his statement—of course, he meant worship in the Trinitarian, or (in other words) the supreme sense of the word, though he now denies that meaning.

Notice—I was careful to state both kinds of the worship of Christ—the supreme and the inferior—and to give my reasons in full. And, again, in concluding that article, I was careful to repeat the conditions on which, only, I disputed his correctness, by confining my dissent to the sense in which a Trinitarian understands the term worship, and by excepting from dissent, the sense in which I believe the word worship is often used in the Scriptures. Let the reader turn to No. 43, last volume, and he will see how careful I was to define, again and again, the conditions on which I dissented from, or agreed with, Br. W.'s statement, that "Universalists consider Jesus Christ a proper object of worship."

Well—Br. W. joined issue with me on those conditions—denied my statements—called my views unscriptural—and reasserted his first proposition with proofs. He did not say that he used the word worship in any other sense than the two meanings I had pointed out. He did not say that he used it in accordance with the reasons I gave for my views. No—he assumed "the strictest, highest, and most common meaning of the word" worship, by denying what I said about Universalists worshipping God, only, in that sense; and argued as if that was the only scriptural sense, and that, therefore, I, and all Universalists that agreed with me, and all Unitarians, denied the Scriptures and refused to worship Jesus—that we rejected the examples of the apostles and magians, and the use of our hymns, etc.! Such was his reply to my conditional dissent. What could I learn from it, but that he had intended Mr. Roe to understand that Universalists worshipped Jesus "in the highest, strictest, and most common meaning of the word"—that he meant by "worship," "what our Trinitarian brethren generally understand by it"—used it "as it is commonly understood, and not as I believe it is often used in the Scriptures?" [N. B. These quotations and definitions are from my first article, in No. 43, last volume—and yet Br. W. complains that I have not defined my terms!] Every one who has spoken or written to me on the subject, so understood Br. W.—I so understood him, and answered him accordingly.

In No. 48, last volume, I showed conclusively, from our prayers, our dedications of houses of worship, our sermons and hymn-books, that we worshipped God, only, and not Christ, with worship "in the highest, supreme and most commonly understood meaning of the term"—"with what is commonly called religious or divine worship"—with "worship in the highest, supreme sense of the word." On the other hand, I stated that I believed "all the Scriptures and hymns he [Br. W.] has quoted"—that "his numerous quotations of Scriptures and hymns, where the words 'worship,' 'adoration,' etc., are applied to Christ.....I believe.....as firmly as he [Br. W.] does"—and that I believe that "all Universalists (and nearly all Unitarians.....) do worship Jesus" "in a sense infinitely below" the "highest sense" of the word worship, etc., etc. [N. B. See No. 48, last volume, where these and similar quotations and definitions occur, and remember that Br. W. complains that I do not clearly define my meaning!!!] Thus hemmed in, Br. W. virtually, but very reluctantly and ambiguously concedes the point—adopts for his meaning the very sense of the word worship, in which I stated that I agreed with him—acknowledges that we worship God, only, in the Trinitarian, or commonly understood, or highest and supreme meaning of the term worship; and that we only worship Jesus in a sense inferior to, or below the supreme and highest sense of the word!!! But, as if loth to give up frankly, his combativeness or some other big organ, leads him to shift about, and to divide some of my definitions, and thus endeavor to show that his first and his present positions are, somehow or other, most mysteriously, one and the same position!!!

But his most complete concession is in the Trumpet for January 12th, where, in reply to a correspondent, he says—

1. "First then, we do not hold to the worship of Christ as the Supreme Being. God only is to be worshipped in that character. He is the Supreme, uncreated intelligence, and as such alone ought to be worshipped.

2. We believe that Jesus ought to be worshipped as the Agent of the Father in the salvation of the world—as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. This worship will be to the glory of God the Father, as well as to the glory of the Son."

And again:—

"Can any other being be honored as Christ is honored, as 'him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood?' It is said, the 'four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb;' but is it ever said they fell down before either the prophets or apostles? 'The ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands, said with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb, etc., etc. Now do we read of any such worship ever being paid to man, however eminent? We ought never therefore to confound the worship of Christ with the respect we render to man, any more than we would confound the worship of God with it."*

Compare this with the remarks of my first article, and see the close agreement. Verily—verily, but Br. T. W. "has fallen into the depths of Priestleyan philosophy," along side of the poor heretic, A. B. G.! May God give them grace to copy the frankness, candor, and meekness of Priestley—in reference to whose freedom from all craft, guile and double meaning, even his warmest Trinitarian opposers said—"he is like crystal; you can see clear through him!" Amen.

Here I might close—but courtesy to Br. W., and justice to both, require that I notice very briefly several other particulars in his "Reply."

Br. W. complains that I do not clearly define my views. I have shown otherwise in the fore part of this article. But how has Br. W. defined his terms? By quoting the passages of Scripture containing the word "worship," when he well knows that Trinitarians would understand them in one sense, and Unitarians in a different one! And when I have assured him that I believe those very passages, which define his meaning, he complains of a want of clearness in my definitions!!—True, Br. W. assures us that he holds to the worship of Christ in the "Scriptural sense"—the Trinitarian and the Unitarian give us the same term to define their several views—hence Br. W.'s meaning is at once apparent to all!

Br. W. complains that I have not answered his arguments on the Scriptures. I have admitted all that those texts teach. Further answer is unnecessary, as the controversy is not, what the Bible teaches, but what Universalists believe on that subject.

My quotation from Belsham was meant to be taken as a whole, not to be divided into parts, and perverted from its clear meaning. Br. Benjamin Whittemore has my thanks for appearing in the Trumpet in explanation and defence of my use of that quotation.

Br. T. Whittemore still thinks the inferior worship offered to "Jesus as the Agent of the Father," is divine and religious worship. Let us see. Lexicographers, I believe, agree in defining divine, an adjective, as "relating to the Divinity." If so, and if Jesus is not worshipped as the Divinity—as God (as Br. W. admits he is not)—then I see not how we can call the worship offered to him "divine worship." That it may be religious in one sense, I admit; but not in "the commonly understood sense" of the words religious worship. The marriage service of the Church of England, (compiled about the time our Bible was translated,) is a religious service. In it the husband says to the wife, "with my body, I thee worship"—yet no one would pretend to say that he worshipped his wife with "divine or religious worship," in the common meaning of that phrase. Belsham's definition of religious worship, then, as he plainly meant it to be understood, and as my numerous definitions show I used it, is the "scriptural sense" of Br. T. Whittemore, who professes so much horror at "Belshamism"!!!

Br. W. admits that we do not pray to Jesus, and afterwards quotes an invocation from one of our hymn books to prove that we do pray to Christ! If he will tell which of the two contradictory positions he intends to abide by, and for how long a period, I will attend to his proof! Till then, suffice it to say, that his logic will prove the abhorred Unitarians to be, really, worshippers of Jesus—to pray to him—as he may see by referring to their hymn-books. What then comes of his assurances to Mr. Roe! The following is from Greenwood's (Unitarian) Collection—hymn 505.

"Jesus, Prince of peace, be near us;
Fix in all our hearts thy home;
With thy gracious presence cheer us;
Let thy sacred kingdom come;
Raise to heaven our expectation,
Give our favored souls to prove
Glorious and complete salvation,
In the realms of bliss above.

Besides—his logic will prove that we follow the example of one who was once more than an Emerson in our ranks,* in praying to ourselves! See our popular restitution hymn, "Come then, O my soul," etc. But enough—the man is hardly serious in overthrowing his own words.

That Jesus did "receive honor and power divine" is true—for it was honor and power from and of the Divinity—but who says he is worthy to receive divine worship? Not the Bible. That tells us to render to God the things that are God's—to pay divine worship and service to God, only.

The quoting of Emerson as a standard author among Unitarians, was equally unfair, whether Professor Ware noticed Mr. E.'s mysticism about Christ, or not. Br. W. well knew that every Unitarian periodical in his vicinity disavowed Emerson's sentiments—that Professor Ware's sermon was directed against them—and that not one periodical of that order advocated them. Knowing this, and yet quoting Emerson as a standard author of their order, was neither fair nor candid—nor was it in any wise creditable either to Br. Whittemore or to the denomination in whose name he professed to speak.

Br. W. thinks I am too positive in saying how Mr. Roe must have understood him, and how Br. W. must have intended Mr. Roe to understand him. Perhaps I am; but I have only judged Br. Whittemore in this case, as he has sometimes judged our Unitarian brethren, when they have studied ambiguity regarding the duration of punishment, by quoting the Scripture language on that subject to Partialists. Suppose a Unitarian, who was supposed to believe in the final salvation of all men, were to write to a Partialist who feared that Unitarians were infected with the heresy of Universalism. The Unitarian assures his Partialist friend, that he has no affinity for Universalists of a particular class, and proceeds to point out several particulars in which Unitarians differ from Universalists. He says—"Unitarians think that the proper duration of punishment for the finally impenitent is everlasting or eternal. What passages of Scripture do they quote oftener than the following—'And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal'—'Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power'—'Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.' Here we are assured that the life of the righteous is eternal, and contrasted with it, the punishment of the wicked is called everlasting," etc. What would Br. W. say of this writer? Would he not declare, that, by using the terms everlasting, and eternal, under such circumstances, in such a manner, and to a Partialist, who, of course, understands those words in these passages to mean endless—that (I say) by such a course, the Unitarian intended to give a false impression to his friend, and so, virtually, misrepresent his own views of human destiny, and those of a great number of Unitarians, beside!—Let Br. W. decide whether I was far wrong in judging positively in a similar case, especially after he joined issue with me on the conditions I laid down in my first article.

I have done—I trust, with this dispute with Br. W. Had he read my first article carefully, and candidly answered it with the concessions that, at last, have been wrung from him, I had been saved this protracted controversy in defence of the views of Universalists respecting the worship of Ch[illegible]. A. B. G.

[illegible]

Several ministering brethren have expressed themselves much gratified with the proposed plan of taking up collections to defray the remaining debt of the Clinton Liberal Institute; and we hope that on the third Sunday in February (inst.) every worshipping congregation of Universalists in the State of New-York, at least, will cheerfully respond to the call in a hearty and substantial manner. Let the members of each society assemble together, prepared to give as liberally as their circumstances will permit; and let every preacher not only give notice on that day, of the intended collection and its objects, but let him give a precious notice thereof, and add his counsel and influence in securing as large a contribution as possible. And, as regards those societies to whom he does not minister on that day, let him fix on the next meeting after the third Sunday, and see that, when it arrives, the much desired aid is given by them also.

To the ministering brethren, especially, we look to see this measure fairly started. If they stir up the minds of our lay brethren by way of remembrance, we have no doubt of the efficacy of this measure. Our lay brethren have always loved the plan of the Institute, and we can not doubt their willingness to aid it now. Remember, then, and be prepared for, the collections on the third Sunday, instant. A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

New Laborers.—These are multiplying rapidly, not only from our own young men entering into the ministry, but by conversions from other denominations. A Mr. Perkins, a Methodist missionary to Oregon, is said to have renounced the doctrine of endless wo, though the Methodists in Maine, his native State, deny the statement. In Lynn, Mass., where a Christian preacher, Rev. Mr. Taylor, and a good portion of his society, have embraced liberal views, and united with the second Universalist society; another Christian preacher, Rev. Mr. Dean, has since embraced, and avowed his faith in universal salvation. Another Christian preacher, named Bennett Palmer, a worthy and talented man, has also commenced preaching the Restitution of all things, in Stoddard, N. H. A Protestant Methodist preacher, of great talents and worth, named Johnson, has also been converted in Cincinnati. A young man of good character, named J. K. Ingalls, has commenced preaching universal reconciliation in Swanzey, Mass. There may be some others that have escaped our notice—if so, we will notice them soon—but four conversions, and one addition in the ministry, are enough to be noticed at a time.

Removals.—Br. E. Manford, who has been pioneering for some time, settles in Michigan city, Indiana.—Br. D. J. Mandell, in Bangor, Me.—Br. A. Case, of Plymouth, Mass., in Charleston, S. C.—Br. D. Forbes, of Norridgewock, in Hallowell, Me.—Br. T. P. Abell, of Rochester, N. Y., is at present supplying the desk in Plymouth, Mass.—Br. J. Britton, late of Carthage, N. Y., has settled in Dummerstown, Vt.—Br. E. Brown, of Waitsfield, in West Roxbury, Vt. Br. J. Perry, has removed from Reading, Pa., to Philadelphia city, but still continues to preach in Reading. These, with the removals noticed separately, complete the list, it is believed, up to the present time.

DEATH OF REV. I. HAYWARD.

Just after our last paper went to press, we learned the melancholy news that Br. I. Hayward had departed this life, at his residence at Burlington Flats, on Wednesday, January 16th, and had been buried on the Friday following; Br. T. J. Smith officiating at the funeral.

It was too late to give a notice, and as I had no particulars of the melancholy event, I concluded to wait, and that doubtless we would receive a full obituary notice from the proper person. None has yet come to hand, and it is due to departed worth, and sorrowing friends, and the bereaved friends of the cause, to defer noticing Br. Hayward's departure no longer.

Br. Hayward was a practitioner of medicine until about three years ago, when, moved by the power of a divine faith working within his heart, he resolved to proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ to his fellow-men. His labors were well received, and proved very useful to the cause—for he labored by example as well as by precept in all things pertaining to godliness. Modest, unassuming, talented, and unostentatiously pious and devout; he was loved in life and is regretted in death. His ministerial career was brief—and he had not been settled in Burlington more than a year. He has left a family—a wife and some children. His age, and his pecuniary circumstances are unknown to me. His illness was very painful, and of several weeks duration, depriving him during the latter part, of the exercise of reason. But while reason remained, his Christian piety and resignation to the Divine will were conspicuous.—He has gone from his earthly labors to the fruition of his Christian hope. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. Gage, in Madison, and at Oriskany Falls in the evening.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. Guild, at Richmondville, at 10 o'clock, A. M.—Br. D. R. Biddlecom, as Br. Holmes of Silver Creek may appoint—Br. O. Wilcox, in Russia—Br. C. S. Brown, at South Bainbridge—Br. M. B. Smith, in Herkimer.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. Smith, in Middleville—Br. D. R. Biddlecom, at Parker's Settlement—Br. Kibbe, at Knox-

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. Smith, in Salisbury.

A Conference of the Allegany Association of Universalists, will be held in Randolph on the 23d and 24th inst.

A Conference of the Chautauque Association will meet in Columbus, Warren county, Pa., on the third Wednesday and Thursday, 20th and 21st inst.

The third Conference of the Chenango Association of Universalists, will be held at the Methodist chapel in Greene, on Wednesday and Thursday, February 13th and 14th.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P M, Lenox, (O) for J A—W W, Skeneateles—P M, Van Hornelsville, for J D H and C T E T H—P M, New-Berlin Centre, for self and T A B—P M, Waddington, for J R and E and H M—P M, Schroon, for H-K and R—Rev D T, Laporte, (O) for J D, H W and A M—A S, C C D and S B, Westmoreland (N H) Rev I B S, Hume, for L C, C P, W H, I W and R B M—J P, Michigan City, (Ia) for self and S W—M McI, East Clarindon, (O) for self, L H and M B—J B, Kinderhook, (Ills)—J W, Richmondville, for self and W S—A R B, Hunter—Z N E, Canton, for self, C C P and A D McC—Rev W H W, Watertown, for E M, I H M, W P, O G, C C, A T, E B, D S and I McA—I T H, Clintonville, for self, M M, R T and H B—P M, Pittsford, for J L and H F—P M, Truxton—P M, Alfred, for R C—W S, Olean—J H, Mixville.

*Abner Kneeland.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SAIL ON, MY BARQUE.

BY MISS EMELINE ROUNSEVILLE.

"When true hearts are withered,
And fond ones are flown,
Oh who would inhabit
This bleak world alone?"

Sail on, sail on, my tiny barque, nor here prolong thy stay,
I would not that thou laggard prove, or truant on the way;
But speed thy destined pathway still, and bear thee nobly on,
Nor heed the rushing of the blast, nor list the Syren's song.

What though the torrents wildly rage, the surges madly roll,
And liquid flame most fearfully unite each distant pole;
Yet faithful bear thee on thy way, though shattered be thy frame,
Thy end, thy happy, glorious end, will be alike the same!

I would not meanly scorn, nor look with brow of gathering gloom,
Upon life's sun-bright flowers, because they will not always bloom;
I would not, cold and heedless, pass the music of our sphere,
No—rather be it mine, full oft, a jarring note to hear!

Let not this spirit ever deem a sacrifice, if given,
Most worthy and acceptable, when spurn'd the gifts of Heaven!
I, grateful would enjoy; in all I'd share an humble part;
But never, 'mid earth's brightest scenes, would e'er inter my heart!

Then bear thee on,—thy comrades gay, that, with the morning sun
So proudly rode, have lightly passed and vanished one by one;
Methought when they were by thy side, thou wert as fleet as they,
But now, how tardy is thy course!—Speed, speed thy flight away!

I see a bright and happy band unfold the golden gate—
The loving and the loved are there—with open arms they wait!
Their smiles are on me, and I hear the soft and silv'ry tone
Of well-known voices, call my name and bid me welcome home!

What, ling'ring yet?—more slow, and still more slow thy movements seem—
I would thou wert some winged bird, or gliding meteor's beam;
Oh! let me flying, rush at once, as with the lightning's dart,
And fondly, closely let me press those lov'd ones to my heart!

PYRAMID OF CHEOPS.—This monument of pride, science, or superstition—who knows which?—was building while Abraham was in Egypt; Joseph and his brethren must have seen the sun behind it every day they sojourned in Egypt; it must have been the last object Moses and the departing Israelites lost sight of as they quitted the land of bondage; Pythagoras, Herodotus, Alexander, the Colphi; it has been the gaol of nations; lost nations have pilgrimized to its foot, and looked up as their common ancestors did before them, in awe and humility; and now, two strangers from the "ultima thule" of the ancients, Britain, severed from the whole world by a watery line, which they considered it impious to transgress, stand here on the summit, and, looking round, see a desert where once stood the "the cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces." The temples and tombs of Memphis arose in their calm beauty, and wisdom dwelt among the groves of palm and acacia solitary now, and deserted, except by the wandering Arab and his camel.—Lord Lindsay's Letters.

REMEDY FOR HARD TIMES.—One proposed by Dr. Franklin is, probably, as effectual as any that can be prescribed. It is this:—"Spend less every day than you can earn." If it had been "Spend less every day than you receive of your earnings," some of us could not act upon it without going somewhat hungry.—Ch. Mirror.

No rank in life precludes the efficacy of a well-timed compliment. When Queen Elizabeth asked an Ambassador how he liked her ladies, he replied, "It was hard to judge of the stars in the presence of the sun."

The eye is never to be mistaken. A person may discipline the muscles of the face, and he may control the voice, but there is something in the eye beyond the will, and we thus frequently find it giving the tongue the lie direct.

HOME.—There is something inexpressibly touching in the story of Ishmael; the youth was sent into the wilderness of life with his bow and his arrow, "his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him." Even in our crowded, busy, and social world, on how many is this doom pronounced! What love makes allowances like household love? God forgive those who turn the household altar into a place of strife! Domestic dissention is the sacrilege of the heart.

The degree of estimation in which any profession is held, becomes the standard of the estimation in which the professors hold themselves.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 19th inst., by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. SETH J. KING, to Miss ROSANNA ANDREW, all of Schuyler, Herkimer county, N. Y.

In Camillus, on the 30th of December last, by Charles Land, Esq., Mr. EDWARD BRATTON, of Wayne county, to Miss AMANDA PARLEY, of Marcellus, Onondaga county.

In Onondaga, on the 1st inst., by the same, Mr. JAMES WAGGONER, to Miss JANE KENYON, both of Onondaga.

In Boonville, on the 9th inst., by Rev. Mr. Kimball of Leyden, Mr. TRUMAN I. VALE, to Miss NANCY CHURCHELL, both of the former place.

In Mexico, December 27th, by Hiram Skinner, Esq., Mr. RANDALL BETTIS, to Miss EMILCENT P. WOOLMAN, all of that place.

In Madison, Jandary 1st., by Rev. Mr. Clark, Mr. ELIAS HUNT, Jr., to Miss EMILY L. HOLCOME, both of Hamilton.

In Stark, December 30th, by Rev. J. D. Hicks, Mr. JACOB MOWER, of Danube, to Miss IRENE MOWER, of the former place.

Also, same day and place, by the same, Mr. GEORGE TINGUE, to Miss MARGARET ANN WALS, both of Starke.

Also, in same place, January 6th, by the same, Mr. ALEXANDER CONKLIN, son of Jonathan Conklin, to Miss ELIZABETH WIGLEY, both of Stark.

Also, in Manheim, January 14th, by the same, Mr. HENRY A. HUDSON, to Miss HENRIETTA SNELL, daughter of J. P. Snell, Esq., all of Manheim.

In the Universalist church in Watertown, October 3d, by Rev. W. H. Waggoner, Mr. JOEL BLOOD, of Brownville, to Mrs. MEHALAH GLEASON, of the former place.

In Watertown, January 1st, by the same, Mr. [illegible] BECKWITH, to Miss ELIZABETH B. HINDS.

In Eatonville, January 14th, by the same, Mr. ROSWELL D. BROWN, to Miss ELVIRA A. EATON, daughter of Mr. John Eaton.

In Pompey, January 16th, by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. ELIHU PARRY, to Miss PERLYETT HIGGINS, of Van Buren.

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 14th inst., JAMES HENRY COBBETT, aged 14 years. Consumption was the destroyer, and patiently were its long continued ravages borne by the victim, who was supported by the unfailing consolations of God's universal grace as revealed in the Gospel for a wearing world.—Mr. C. was a native of England, but had resided for some [illegible] in this city and in Auburn, where he was much es[illegible] by his friends. He has left a widow, several children and numerous friends to deplore his departure, [illegible] but on their own. The [illegible] services at [illegible]e, were performed by the Rev. Dr. Rudd, (Episcopalian,) of this city—prayer by Br. T. D. Cook—and an appropriate discourse was delivered by the latter, in the Universalist church, on the succeeding Sunday, to the mourners and a large and sympathizing audience.

A. B. G.

In Ogdensburgh, on the 4th inst., of the scarlet fever, Mr. PARLEY DUSTIN, aged 38 years. He has left a wife and three children to mourn the loss of a worthy husband and an affectionate father. His [illegible] a world's [illegible] wave [illegible] his confidence in God unbounded. His warfare [illegible]t, and its last hours, tranquil; [illegible] His [illegible] attended in Stockholm, on the 6th. Sermon by [illegible]

In Vienna, January 12th, MARTHA D., consort of John [illegible]ds, in the 32d year of her age. Her funeral was attended on the 14th, and, by request of the deceased, the consolations of the Gospel were rendered by the writer. Respected and beloved by all who knew her, sister [illegible] died as she lived, a practical Universalist. She left a companion and two small children to mourn her early departure.

W.

In Caroline, September 18th, Mr. WILLARD LEGG, aged [illegible] years.

Also, September 23d, Mr. DAVID LEGG, aged 61 y[illegible]

Also, October 2d, Mr. SAMUEL LEGG, aged 19 y[illegible]

Thus, within a few days, this family have been called [illegible], and two sons. Truly the [illegible] incomprehensible. But [illegible] survivors have consolation in the promises of the G[illegible], and may Heaven grant them that faith which will enable them to look to Jesus as the Saviour of all.

S. B.

In West Hartwick, Otsego county, January 15th, Mrs. MARTHA, wife of Capt. Eleazer Smith, aged 28 years.—Thus in the midst of prosperity and usefulness—with a discriminating mind, and high moral sentiments, well qualified for, and discharging the duties of wife, daughter, sister, and neighbor, she has early fallen in our midst, leaving behind numerous witnesses to her moral worth, who deeply mourn their loss. The funeral services were performed by the writer in the Presbyterian meeting house, to an unusually large and deeply sympathizing congregation.

J. POTTER.

In Fenner, January 13th, MARY ELLEN, youngest daughter of Robert and Lucy Ransom, aged 3 years. This is the fourth child that has been removed by death from this family in about 4 years. But I trust that the remaining members of the family are all prepared to say as did Jesus, "the cup which my Father giveth me, shall I not drink it?"—Funeral services on the 14th, by E. M. WOOLLEY.

"SONGS OF ZION."

Just published and for sale at the "Trumpet" office, No. 40, Cornhill, (Up stairs,) the NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY, entitled, "SONGS OF ZION; OR THE CAMBRIDGE COLLECTION OF SACRED MUSIC; designed for the Church, for the Social Meetings of Christians, and for Family Worship; comprising a rich variety of the most popular tunes, anthems, etc., with many pieces from various authors, never before published, written expressly for this work; arranged with a figured bass for the Organ and Piano Forte. To which is prefixed a Familiar Introduction to the art of Singing, designed for the aid of those who are entirely unacquainted with the science of music; the Instruction being reduced to great plainness and simplicity." By THOMAS WHITTEMORE. Fifth Edition, enlarged and revised, containing eight additional pages of original anthems, for Temperance Celebrations, without any increase of price. Persons acquainted with the science of harmony are requested to call and examine this work.

This book contains upwards of three hundred tunes, of a great variety of metres. In addition to these, there are upwards of 100 pages of Anthems.

It has upwards of 350 pages of the size of the "Boston Academy's Collection;" and will be sold at the same price. The author pledges himself to the public, that neither pains nor expense have been spared to render this work correct, in its scientific, and elegant in its mechanical execution.

This work is very particularly recommended in cases where different denominations of Christians unite in "Union Singing Schools." On the great theme of praise all Christians agree; we can all unite our hearts and voices in celebrating the praises of God and the Redeemer, and the glories of eternity. In a great number of cases, the whole hymn is put upon the same page with the tune, which will be very convenient in singing these tunes as voluntaries. There are many most excellent hymns inserted entire, which appear in no hymn book in common use.

Boston, September 29, 1838.

UNIVERSALIST UNION.

This publication, as its title imports, is in defence of the final Restitution—in other words, the ultimate holiness and happiness of all men. A portion of it is devoted to miscellany of strict moral tendency. No efforts are spared to make it an instructive and interesting periodical—a welcome visiter in the domestic circle.

The publication of a highly interesting series of [illegible] articles, under the title—"JOURNAL OF A PHYSICIAN"—has just been commenced in its columns, and will be continued weekly throughout the present volume, and completed with it. They contain, "Observations on men and things, during several years peregrinations through Poland, Russia, Germany, France," etc., and are from the pen of an eminent European Physician. This work alone, though occupying but about one eighth of the paper, it is believed, will be decmed worth the entire subscription.

The Union is a large super royal sheet, published weekly, and is now issued in two forms—Quarto and Octavo. Terms, $2 per annum for the Quarto, and $2.50 for the Octavo. The first No. of the 4th Vol. was issued November 10, 1838. The numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Specimen numbers also may be had on application at the Publishing Office, No. 139, Fulton-st., between Broadway and Nassau, New York, to which place all communications and letters on business should be addressed.

☞ Universalist clergymen are respectfully requested, if agreeable to their feelings, to name the commencement of the Foreign Correspondence to their congregations. There may be those who would like to secure the vol[illegible] on that account, who would not otherwise [illegible] reduction of it.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

BY A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per [illegible] in advance, or within four months; $2.00 if not paid [illegible] four months; or $2.50 if not paid within the year. [illegible] subscription received for less than one year, [illegible] money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers, Agents or Commissioners, paying [illegible]ties, will be allowed the nine copy gratis: [illegible] proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their papers by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00 if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME X. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1839. NUMBER 6.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER EIGHTEEN.

BY S. R. SMITH.

Unbelievers have frequently amused themselves, and indulged in much sarcasm, in drawing a parallel between Moses and Mahommed—and by supposing that there was the same, or at least as good reason to believe that the religion of Islam was from heaven, as that of the Hebrews. And that if we admit the divine authority of the latter, we must that of the former; that if we regard the one a fanatic or impostor, we are bound so to consider the other. They represent both as designing pretenders to inspiration. Moses, we are told, like Mahommed, so managed as to attain and exercise unlimited power over his nation, under the pretext of divine direction—a "thus saith the Lord"—while he oppressed the people with an unmeaning, expensive, and burdensome ritual.

To all this we answer, that plausible as some parts of the objection are, it is entirely destitute of force, because there is, in fact, no parallel in the cases. Of this, any person can satisfy himself in a short time, who will take the pains to read the Koran, and compare it with the Bible. And he may make the comparison with particular parts, or the whole. But he must assure himself, that the more diligently he examines, the further he pursues the comparison, the more fully and certainly will he become convinced that there is no parallel in the cases, and no weight or force in the objection. He will perceive that the conduct of Moses, throughout, was open, frank, and manly; and that there is in that of Mahommed, a secrecy, a continued series of assumptions, a caution in the delivery of his oracles as the time and occasion seemed to warrant, and that he purposely mystified them so as to render them of uncertain import—all of which is wholly unlike the proceedings of the Hebrew Legislator. Of the miracles of Mahommed, there was no human witness; while those of Moses, like those of Jesus, were wrought in open day, before multitudes, and in the presence both of friends and enemies.

Now, with the exception of the difficulty of understanding, in all cases, that peculiar oriental style and imagery, there is no evidence of obscurity in the Pentateuch. We may safely challenge an instance of apparently studied obscurity of expression, in all the writings ascribed to Moses. But it is believed, that no person acquainted with the subject, can be found, who would hazard a similar remark respecting the Koran. The Pentateuch is free from ambiguity and mysticism, while every part of the Koran is replenished with instances of a redundant, verbose unmeaningness. This very mysticism and obscurity, seems to be the first object with fanatics and impostors, as they affect it in every instance, with undeviating certainty. In proof of this, the objector may compare, at his leisure, the Bible with the works of the whole catalogue of enthusiasts and impostors, from Gregory Thaumaturgus, or Nicholas Loyola, down to Emanuel Swedenborg, or even the book of Mormon. The Koran is of the same cast, and bears upon its front the impress of the same self-delusion, or deceptive purpose—characters which all the ingenuity of skeptics, never has, and never will be able to fasten upon the sacred writers.

While we would not impeach the candor of unbelievers, it is due to truth and justice to say, that the alleged parallel between Moses and Mahommed, betrays an unreasonable prejudice, or an unwarrantable ignorance of the Pentateuch, as well as of the Koran. What did Moses gain to himself, or to his family, by assuming to be divinely inspired, which could not, and would not have been as certainly obtained without that assumption? He made no provisions for his own family whatever—and the distinction assigned to his tribe, was notoriously to their disadvantage, as it excluded them from all participation in the division of the country, except a few small villages, and from many other common privileges of citizens. It is madness to suppose that the family of the Levites were as well off in worldly matters, as their brethren of the other tribes. Men of general candor deceive themselves in this particular, in a most surprising manner.—They have in their view, the ample tythes of the English national establishment; and they infer that the provision for the sacred family among the Hebrews, was equally abundant. But nothing can be further from the truth. For it is notorious, that the Levites constituted about one-twelfth of the whole population. This is certainly a proportion which no one will pretend, is borne by the English clergy to the inhabitants of Great Britain. And if it were, we have every reason to believe that it would so diminish the revenues even of the Bishop of Durham, as to render him "poor indeed."

In times of public distress, the misfortune must bear particularly hard upon the Levites. And in times of apostacy from the established religion, they must have been without any resource. When war or famine spread its sable and desolating wing over the land, the Levite was sure to feel its first, and its heaviest influence. The regular order of things being interrupted—the attendance upon the stated worship, and the offerings at the national altar being suspended, the fountains of his scanty pittance would be dried up, and he left to feel the utter helplessness of his situation, and the full weight of his wretchedness. This is no fancied representation of his situation. The reader of the historic portions of the Old Testament, will remember that more than once, this part of the nation was driven to seek the means of subsistence by any menial service among their more favored brethren. And with these facts—undeniable facts—before them, how is it that skeptics are so very sensitive to what they call the partiality of Moses for his tribe? It is at best, a partiality for which few Levites could thank him—and one which decidedly bettered the condition of all the rest of the nation. It is a partiality, which if applied this day in the same proportion to the unbelievers in the United States, would reduce them to a state of beggary; and probably bring them to the exercise of more just views and apprehensions of the subject, than they have yet entertained. Thus much, for this notable partiality of the Hebrew Lawgiver for promoting the worldly interests of his tribe!

Skepticism has arrayed and included the miracles wrought by Moses, in the same rank with those ascribed to Mahommed. But it has been merely assumed and asserted—for it has not been proved, nor does it admit of the shadow of proof. The miracles ascribed to Moses, were wrought before his countrymen, for the purpose of convincing them of his mission—before Pharaoh and his court, for the purpose of inducing him to permit the Hebrews to leave the country in peace—and during their journeyings, for administering to their wants, or for the overthrow of their enemies. These miracles always have spoken, and will ever continue to speak for themselves. And in every instance, there was no room, and no occasion for fraud or collusion.—Had they not been real, there is no good reason to doubt, that except in a very few instances, the same ends could have been attained by other means. Indeed, had they not been all that they professed to be, the restless multitude, impatient of delay and of control, would have effectually exposed and exploded any and every attempt at imposition. For the history is fraught with abundant proof, that even while they admitted and admired the miracles, they were little disposed to act beyond, or otherwise than their feelings or apparent interests prompted.

Now can any man say in all good conscience, that there are equal proofs of the miracles ascribed to Mahommed—that, in fact, there is any proof whatever of their reality? Who was witness of his wonderful night excursion through some ninety heavens? Who saw the Koran delivered piecemeal by the angel Gabriel, to the prophet of the faithful? Nay—who can compare its fulsome and unmeaning pages, with the Pentateuch, and feel that he is drawing a legitimate parallel, between works of equal merit, and equal claims to divine authority? Any but a Mussulman, who can do this, is beyond the reach of argument, or the influence of testimony, and may feel safe against conviction of any truth, because it is reasonable. Such an one may well be a sceptic, for he is not fit to be any thing else.

It is also a very great mistake, to suppose that the ritual imposed on the Hebrews, was either unmeaning or oppressive.* And the imputation of either, betrays a culpable inattention to the nature and objects of the Mosaic institutions. It is very true, that the Lawgiver at Sinai, required a considerable number and variety of sacrifices. But it confined its requirements to such animals—and to such exclusively—as could be used for food.—Whereas, several of the Heathen offerings were of the most offensive kind—and frequently included the immolation of human beings. In all the rites of the Law, the sense of decency, cleanliness and moral purity, is always impressed, and appears to have been uniformly understood and appreciated. Among the Gentiles, on the contrary, their religious rites, and especially their festivals, were the scenes of indecency, filth, and the most unseemly and degrading debauchery. Under the Law, the presence of God, his fatherly care and benignity, were celebrated with becoming solemnity, and by every indication of sincere gratitude. The Heathen rites were ostensibly designed to propitiate some imaginary monster of cruelty and blood; and were observed for the more obvious purpose of indulging in the most brutal manner, some of the worst and lowest of the animal propensities.

Instead of a particularly burdensome, or even an expensive ritual, the institutions of Moses are, in these respects, by no means to be compared with those of the Heathens. He gave to the Hebrews but three public festivals in the year—the Heathens, on the contrary, had more than ten times that number. He gave directions for a votive offering, at best not very expensive, and then graduated to the humblest means of the poor—while the Heathens, the great exemplars of the religion of nature, considered the presentation of the most valued and costly things, as the exclusive pledge of uncommon piety. And yet, can any thing be conceived more inappropriate and grotesque, than the rich offerings of robes and tunics for the services and bedizenment of a wooden god! There is none of this unseemliness in the requisitions of the Law of Moses; every service is suited to the relative situation of the creature to the Creator—is well adapted to foster a spirit of devotion—is not pretended to be necessary to the Deity, but is the pledge of obedience to his requirements.

We may now be permitted to ask, where are the special indications in the administration of Moses of his oppressions and exactions, or of a disposition to make the most of his high authority? Whether we consider his disregard of the interests of his family, the integrity and rectitude of his personal conduct, or the nature and utility of the institutions which he established, the world has never furnished his equal. If it were admitted that he was not inspired, he must certainly be considered the wisest, greatest, best of statesmen and rulers. This, skepticism itself would cheerfully admit, were it not for the claim to inspiration, on which all his authority and actions are founded. If he were not inspired, how is it to be accounted for, that he was some three thousand years in advance of his age, and brought his people, in moral science and views of the Deity, to a station of pre-eminence which all the efforts of philosophy never conceived nor attained? And we press the question, whether what is absolutely and undeniably good, is or can be the worse for having been derived from superhuman aid? Is the unbeliever prepared to reject as useless or corrupt, those benevolent institutions, which do honor to human nature, merely because they are professedly of divine origin? Would he wish us to believe, that he considers the high morality inculcated in the Decalogue—and which he knows is only taught there, except in the Christian system—as less pure, proper, and necessary, because avowedly dictated by the inspiration of God? Will he do, what has never yet been done—assign a respectable reason, why Moses was capable of doing what he did, and of establishing the institutions for which his nation was distinguished, if he were not inspired?

* Priestley on the originality of the Mosaic Institutions, at the end of Notes on the Pentateuch.

Again—does it follow, because certain leaders and conquerors have attained their pre-eminence by fraud and violence, and ruled with a rod of iron, that therefore no man can rise to authority, and govern and direct the affairs of a nation, without being oppressive and tyrannical? If so, we may expect, in the next age at least, that unbelievers will charge, in this country, upon Washington, the character of usurper, rebel, and tyrant—that his forbearance was cowardice, his modesty but hypocrisy, and his retirement but imposture! And suppose, further, that the armies and people of the United States, had testified universally, that they had seen him work miracles, and had witnessed the descent of the visible symbols of the Deity in attestation and confirmation of his right to lead, and his authority to govern—on this principle, his pretensions must be founded in venality, his institutions be cumbersome, or costly, or nonsensical, and his people dupes and slaves.

Now, we have the united testimony of a whole people, that Moses was divinely appointed to lead them out of Egypt—that they saw, and were benefited by his miracles—that they witnessed the palpable indications of the divine presence in vindication of his authority, and in approbation of his institutions. And this testimony is further sustained by the maintenance of certain opinions, and the performance of certain rites or ceremonies, by that people, through a succession of ages. It goes still further, and proves that all this power was attained and exercised without an appeal to the sword, and that these remarkable institutions were adopted and obeyed—not because any compulsory measures were employed in the first instance, but because their recipients were convinced that they were sent from Heaven. What right, then, has any man to assert, that the Hebrew Legislator was either usurper, tyrant, or impostor, that could not be assumed, as far as mere authority and power are concerned, of King Alfred, or of Washington? But every one knows that it can not be done of the latter, with decency, and much less with the show of reason. Nor can it be done, for the same, and yet higher considerations, of the Lawgiver of Israel.

Having now followed the skeptic through his supposed parallel of the pretensions and institutions of Moses and Mahommed, and having shown that he is mistaken in his inferences, and that no parallel exists, we must be permitted to ask him, in turn, to accompany us in the consideration of certain points and bearings of the Law, which appear to have wholly escaped his observation. It is not a little singular, that certain persons never discover what is good and praiseworthy in the lives or precepts of the sacred writers—while, at the same time, they can find much to admire in the stubborn insensibility of Zeno, and more in the filthy semi-beast, Diogenes, in his tub. They fasten upon some imperfection or indiscretion in the conduct of a patriarch, or prophet, and set it down as a plain and incontrovertible truth, that both the persons implicated, and all others enrolled as Scripture writers, were weak and contemptible enthusiasts, or base and impious pretenders. And all this, when an accidental discovery of a single moral truth or respectable wise saying, among a cart-load of vulgarity, sophisms, and nonsense of Heathen extraction, is quite enough to sanctify a whole system of philosophy. They appear to be so completely baptized into this prejudice, that they want little besides a few portable divinities, to identify them with the disciples of some antiquated and long since exploded Pagan theory.

To say nothing of the moral aspect of the Mosaic dispensation, there is enough to recommend it, at least, to respectful consideration, if not to unqualified approbation. Let any one attentively read the benevolent provisions of the Law, for the "stranger, the fatherless, and the widow," so often repeated, and so variously modified in its objects and bearings, and then ask himself whether there is nothing useful, or appropriate, or necessary in its requirements? Thus it is said, "Thou shalt neither vex a stranger nor oppress him.....ye shall not afflict any widow or fatherless child." When the time of the vintage and the harvest came, the Hebrews were forbidden to gather the whole for themselves—the scattering bunches of grapes—the corners of the field—the forgotten sheaf—must be left for the "stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow." Once in three years, every householder was required to bring out a portion expressly set apart for the use of the "Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow." Where else in all the wide world, shall we find any specific, and appropriate, and well-ordered arrangements for these classes of persons? The murdered traveller, the plundered caravan, the Christian prisoner and slave, bear ample and appalling testimony to the benevolent provisions of the system of Mahommed! Its well-known maxim is, "No faith with infidels"—by which is meant all who do not profess the faith of Mahommed. And until since the recollection of many of the present generation, this rule was carried out in fearful practice. Piracies of the most atrocious description, under the connivance of the Sublime Porte, and at the very foot of the throne of the successors of Mahommed, were only prevented by purchase and tribute, until our own government applied a more effectual remedy, and taught the Mussulman, what the Koran never did—to respect the rights of strangers. Let the skeptic review the history of the infamous and unprovoked robberies and murders committed upon merchants and travellers, under the sanction of the Arabian prophet, and by his followers, and then, if he dare, assert that there is a perfect parallel, or any parallel at all, between the institutions of Moses and Mahommed.

It need scarcely be remarked, that among the Heathens, there were no suitable provisions for the "stranger, the fatherless, and the widow." But it should be admitted, that the courtesies and even charities of social life, were in general better sustained by them, than they have ever been by Mahommedans. A species of conventional hospitality entitled the stranger to protection, and civility to a limited extent, in some Pagan countries. This, philosophy encouraged, but went no further. And man was left to the operation of his undirected sympathies, in giving or withholding charity, unimpressed by the sanctions of authority either human or divine. So that, in fact, the Mosaic institution stands alone, transcendently above any and all other systems, except the Christian, in its hospitable and benevolent provisions for the solitary alien, the helpless and distressed. And how is this to be accounted for? Must we suppose the author of the Hebrew institutions, so much more humane than all the world besides—not only more so than the age in which he lived, but pre-eminently more so than any age of philosophy and Gentilism? Certainly, skeptics and unbelievers will not admit all this, without at least heaving a sigh over the comparative degradation of their venerated philosophers! But this they must admit, or admit his inspiration!

But we must not suspend this comparison of the humanity and kindness of the legal dispensation, with other systems, as yet. And however reluctantly, the skeptic must go with us through a few more particulars, evincive of the superior benevolence of the Mosaic system—that system which he considers so repugnant to all good sense and sound philosophy. Does he so view it, because it is so superior in philanthropy to any merely human theory, or because it is so repugnant to some of the practices which the interests and policies of men have rendered it convenient for them to pursue? Some of its venerable requisitions, it would be particularly gratifying to see more generally embodied in Christian practice, and, especially, illustrated in a more benevolent treatment of the poor. And were this done, it would exclude some of the speculations built on human suffering, and annihilate much of the wealth wrung from the hand of the sons of poverty—often, of industry.

From time immemorial, it seems to have been the practice for one man to borrow of another, what he particularly wanted, and could not command by other honorable means. And the inference usually corresponds with the fact, that in a great majority of cases, the poor borrow, and the rich lend. The hazard incurred of losing the thing, or the amount loaned, naturally suggested some expedient for rendering payment certain. This we call security. One of these expedients always has been, the acceptance of some article of the required value, as a pledge. And it appears to have been customary with the Hebrews, to pledge some article of clothing, or of common and necessary use in the business of life. All this was very proper—and all this is still done in most countries, in the every day transactions of man with man. But how is it done? Is the least attention paid to the wants or the privations of him who makes the pledge? Is a thought apparently turned upon the sacrifice which the poor may make, by giving security in this manner? Is not interest, rather than the comfort or the wants of the needy, the great matter of concern, and the established and acknowledged rule of action? And does not the lender, accordingly, pursue every means that law or public opinion will warrant, in order to compel the payment of his dues, regardless of all wants, or interests, except his own?

Now it is questionable whether the skeptic is aware of the regulations prescribed by the Mosaic institution, in relation to pledges. If he is not, he may be surprised to find that they are such as no worldling, or oppressor, or impostor, alike reckless of means or measures to compass his ends, would be likely to impose! They are indeed far, very far from every thing of the kind. For they breathe a spirit of genuine charity and kindness, such as no other then existing institutions knew, and such as no part of mankind, save the Hebrews, have ever practiced with equal fidelity. Put let them speak for themselves. "If thou at all take thy neighbor's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him, by that the sun goeth down." "If the man be poor, thou shalt not sleep with his pledge; in any case, thou shalt deliver him the pledge again when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his own raiment, and bless thee." Provision is also made for preventing the acceptance of certain indispensable articles of common use. Thus—"No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge; for he taketh a man's life to pledge."

Are these benevolent arrangements, the indications of total apathy to the welfare of the distressed? Are they to be regarded as the exclusive offspring of personal interest? or are they the unmeaning aberrations of a fanatic's mind? or yet, the unprincipled and unhallowed usurpations dictated by an unfeeling impostor? Can they with decency, or sense, or honesty, be ascribed to either? And if not, they prove their author to have been more than three thousand years in advance of his age, inconceivably more benevolent than the best of the Heathens—or, what is infinitely more reasonable, that he was inspired. Their existence only among the Hebrews, proves, also, that while they were known to be the most useful and benevolent institutions in all the world, the philosophers and moralists of other lands, were too vain of their own theories to adopt them. And we leave it to the advocates of the all-sufficiency of the light of nature, to determine whether they are not, at this day, rejecting "the counsel of God against themselves," in the same way, and for the same reasons.

Another benevolent provision of the Mosaic Law, relates to usury. "If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer; neither shalt thou lay upon him usury." And this prohibition is repeated under such modifications of expression, as leave no doubt respecting its import, or of the moral bearings to which it was directed. Where shall we look for an instance of attention to the circumstances of the poor, like this, among the high-sounding institutions of a worldly philosophy? Where else can we find an insurmountable barrier interposed for the protection of the poor against the rich—the weak against the strong? And can any man in conscience say, that this looks like courting the favor and countenance of the most powerful and influential class of the nation, and building up and establishing authority without right—divine right?

We do not particularly object to the established custom of paying interest for the use of money. The borrower is, or ought to be, benefited by its use; and it is difficult to conceive of any reason why he should not render a suitable compensation for the privilege, except that assigned by the law under consideration—the national kindred, and poverty of the borrower. However this may be, it is certain that the modern shaver would find himself sadly bereft of his gains, were he brought under the unflinching regulations of the Hebrew Lawgiver. A fact that may aid in accounting for the antipathy of certain members of that fraternity against the Bible, and who appear to hold the Pentateuch in special and utter abomination. We may be assured, that neither the light of nature, nor human policy, nor yet the wisdom of an exclusive philosophy, ever dictated these benevolent provisions for the needy. It remained for the Hebrew institutions alone, to recognize the true principles of human kindness, and to enforce them under sanctions from which the heart can make no appeal.—And these considerations, when the age of the world and the general state of morals are taken into the account, constitute a mass of unimpeachable testimony, which it seems impossible to resist, in favor of the inspiration of the author of the Pentateuch.

One of the most remarkable regulations that ever distinguished legislation, remains to be noticed. It is the universal right of resuming personal freedom, and all possessions previously alienated, whether by the misfortunes or indiscretions of the individual concerned. "And thou shalt number seven Sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven Sabbaths of years, shall be unto thee forty and nine years.—And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land, unto all the inhabitants thereof; it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possessions, and ye shall return every man unto his family."

It will doubtless be observed, that similar laws were occasionally introduced among the Romans; and that, consequently, this is but a common instance of agrarianism. But here the objector is mistaken: there is no general resemblance, much less parity, in the respective instances. The Roman law was, at least, but a temporary expedient for special purposes. The Hebrew, on the contrary, was one of early and perpetual institution, and was never suspended when its application was practicable. The Roman agrarian law seized upon the immense possessions of the affluent, and distributed them only among citizens, while it left every servant and menial in the commonwealth, to all the wretchedness of poverty and oppression. At the same time, its operation was both oppressive and unjust—in its entire disregard of the rights of the rich. On the contrary, the law of the jubilee was instituted long before any Hebrew came into possession of a single foot of territory. Their inheritance was also to be equally divided, in the first instance, among the individuals of the whole nation, except a single family. And in every purchase of either land or slaves, the purchaser was previously instructed to graduate the price by a careful estimate of the number of years to the jubilee. "According to the number of years after the jubilee, thou shalt buy of thy neighbor, and according unto the number of years of the fruits he shall sell unto thee—according to the multitude of years, thou shalt increase the price thereof; and according to the fewness of years, thou shalt diminish the price of it." In this case, neither party was wronged; while every bond-servant, male and female, was restored to freedom, and every portionless family acquired competence.

In view of these peculiar and humane provisions of the Mosaic institutions, it is surprising that many honest Christians believe that the Law—in all its bearings, objects, and requirements—was abolished by the Gospel. And it is to be feared, that by so doing, they have contributed greatly to the general disgust entertained by unbelievers against the Old Testament, and especially against the Pentateuch. For, however we may concede that these regulations might with propriety be modified in some respects, when brought into universal application—still, it seems impossible to suppose that the Gospel could be designed to expunge them forever from the catalogue of human obligations. But whether this be so, or not, can not affect the argument with unbelievers. It remains for them to account for the existence of these requirements, on their own hypothesis, that Moses was no better than Mahommed, or that he was not inspired.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

WORK OUT YOUR OWN SALVATION.

In what does this salvation which we are to work out, consist? It consists in our deliverance from the oppressive sense of guilt, which is to be found in genuine penitence, and in a recognition of the forgiving character of Him with whom we have to do. And farther, it consists especially in our deliverance from the dominion or reign of evil propensities, and of whatever ignorance or errors lead to folly and wrong-doing; our deliverance from alienation and disaffection towards God, from undue attachment to the service of mammon, from base compliances to the customs of the world. This is our salvation. From these and similar evils, we are to work out our own deliverance. Not until we have complied with this injunction can we know the noble capacities of our nature, or taste the richness of that enjoyment, for which we are finally destined, and amply furnished.

How then shall we accomplish this momentous task—how reach our destined goal? That it is not without effort, not without persevering effort, experience as well as Scripture teacheth us.—There is no resting place for the aspirant after Christ-like perfection; no cessation from labor. Like Paul, he must forget the things that are behind—the attainments already made—and press eagerly forward after still greater perfection.—We may be aware of the necessity of this persevering effort after farther attainments, and we may desire, resolve, and re-resolve, to make the requisite exertions, and yet find all these resolutions but of little permanence and little avail. Our righteousness will be as the morning cloud and the early dew, if our strength is not obtained from the proper source. Whence then are we to obtain that strength which will give effect to our resolutions, and prevent us from sinking into the grave, no more near to salvation than before we resolved, and re-resolved? Can this requisite aid and support be found more effectually in any other way, than in placing ourselves as if constantly in the presence of God, whom we view as a Father, taking the most affectionate interest in the progress of our task? In such a presence, can we neglect what will secure His smile and approbation? Let elder Christians answer us, and point the way. S. S.

THE RECORD.

Associations.—The Chatahochee Association of Universalists, met in Lafayette, Alabama, December 3d and 4th. It embraces the counties of Muscogee, Talbot, Harris, Merriweather, Coweta and Troup, in Georgia; and of Russel and Chambers, in Alabama. Efforts were made by opposers to prevent an attendance of the people; but the meetings were large. The cause is prosperous in that region.

The Somerset Association met somewhere and at sometime [probably, New-Portland, and on December 19th,] in Maine. L. P. Rand, Moderator, H. Barret, Clerk. Passed resolutions of condolence on the death of Rev. J. P. Harris. Four sermons were preached and a meeting-house dedicated. Eight preachers were present, and meetings were large. Adjourned to such time and place as the committee may appoint.

Societies.—New societies were formed in Lafayette, and in West Point, ten miles from Lafayette, Indiana. in December—and one in Swanzey, Mass., in November.

Meeting-houses.—A stone meeting-house, 44 by 57 feet, handsomely built and finished by Dr. Crosby, at an expense of about 8000 dollars, was dedicated in Akron, O., on November 22d. Sermon by Br. Loring, pastor. The new house in Nashau, N. H., was dedicated on January 1st. Sermon by Br. T. Whittemore. The new house, 40 miles S. W. of Macon city, Geo., was dedicated December 16th. The house built by the second Universalist society in Lowell. Mass., was dedicated on November 14th. The house in Sterling, Mass., was dedicated on the 21st of same month. One in Ferrisburg, Maine, and a union house in Royalton, Mass., were dedicated the same month. The house in Winthrop, Me., was dedicated on December 25th. Sermon by Br. C. Gardner. The Universalist society in Charlton, Mass., have purchased the old meeting-house in the centre of the town, and intend tearing it down and building a new one on the site. The town build the basement of stone for a town hall, over which the society build a house worth $3500. The house in Meriden, N. H., was dedicated January 23d. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou.

Ordinations.—Br. J. S. Barry was ordained in West Amesbury, Mass., November 14th. Br. B. B. Bunker, in Hampstead, N. H., November 22d. Sermon by Br. M. Ballou.

Installations.—Br. Loring was installed pastor of the society in Akron, Ohio, November 22d. Sermon by Br. S. A. Davis. Br. Z. Cook, late of Geneva, N. Y., was installed in Danbury, Conn., December 25th; and Br. S. C. Bulkeley, late of Danbury, was installed at Newmarket (Lamprey River), N. H., December 26th. Sermon by Br. R. O. Williams. Br. D. D. Smith was installed as assistant pastor, to Father Jones, in Gloucester, Mass., December 20th. Sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner.

Items.—Br. Taylor, of Lynn, Mass., late a convert from the Christians, and present pastor of the second Universalist society there, has signified his intention of uniting with the Unitarians, as being best acquainted with that body, and not seeing any difference of opinion between them and Universalists sufficient to prevent him.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

A C, Fayetteville, for D W and O S—Rev S M, Benton, for J A—H J P, Marshall, (Mich) for self, J W C, J T, V S A, J B C, A W B, E S B and A S—P M, Gorham, for L G—P M, Wadsworth, (O) for J S—P M, Williamstown, for self, J J and J C—P M, Coopersrown, for C W, Z G, M S and C T—O M D, Randolph, (O) for W R—C E W, Erie, (Pa) for self and A H—S E, Rochester—E S B, Plattville, (W T)—P M, Rochester, (Mich) for H D C—W W, Norfolk, (Va)—T F, Brimfield, (Mass) for self and A J—P M, Barkhamsville, (Va) for R W—C B, Roscoe, (Ills) for J S, A G and J P S—N T, Blissfield, (Mich) for self, H C P, R P, I R, H B, and J T—C B F, Constantine, (Mich) for self and W L S—P M, North Norwich, for self and E G—D B Jr, Milan, for self and E G—H L C, Vermont—P M, Alexander, for E K and B K—A T, Mottville, for S C W, D W, N K, P S, J W, W C and H E—P M, Middleport, for L S and D W—S C, Pamelia 4 Corners, for J L and J M—S S, Manheim—W H, Orion, (Mich) for self, J B and E B—J B, Green River, (Ills) for self and S P—A N C, Mineral Point, (W T) for self, T and J, and W F—P M, Suffolk C H, for C V, W R, and B R—S A G, West Chazy, for W A Jr, W A and J A.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A LETTER TO A FRIEND.

FRIEND JAMES:—Your favor of the 7th has been received. You request information as to the truth of a rumor, that has recently reached your ear. You ask, "Is the report true that you have become a Universalist? Can it be, that you have abandoned the cause of truth and religion, and embraced sentiments, universally regarded as erroneous, and absurd in the extreme, condemned both by reason and revelation? For the purpose of ascertaining the truth of this matter, I address you this note; for I have regarded the report as a mere "idle tale," and unworthy of credence. Will you therefore comply with my request without delay, and if you have imbibed the sentiments of Universalists, state the reasons that have induced you to take this step?"

You are well aware, my friend, that for a few years past, I have been connected with the Presbyterian church. I subscribed to the creed of that denomination, not because I had examined it, and compared its doctrines with the Scriptures of truth, but because I was taught that without "repentance" and "a change of heart," I should be unhappy in this world, and suffer indescribable anguish in the world to come. I was taught too, that if God had dealt justly with me, instead of permitting me to live upon his bounties and partake of the riches of his goodness, he would have cast me off forever, and given me my portion with hypocrites and unbelievers, in a world where misery is without alleviation.

I did not stop to inquire, whether such an idea was consistent with the character of an infinitely wise and benevolent God. But tortured with the awful thought of enduring a miserable hereafter, and fearful that I should "sin away my day of grace," I resolved to take the "safe side," and if possible, "make my calling and election sure." Thus I thought I was "converted," and like all "young converts," I was, for a season, very zealous in promulgating my sentiments and warning my friends to "flee from the wrath to come."—But about two years ago, my confidence in the truth of the doctrines, which I professed to believe, was first shaken, in consequence of hearing objections urged against them, which I was unable to answer. This led me to serious reflection on the subject, and the more I reflected, the less beauty, harmony and consistency, could I see in the popular system of theology. Yet I durst not disbelieve it, because it had so many advocates, and could all these be in error? My mind was harassed and tormented beyond endurance, till at length I resolved to "search the Scriptures," and investigate the all-important subject of religion for myself. This I have done, and the result of my investigation has been, a renunciation of the doctrines of Partialism, especially of that awful, that soul-chilling, peace-destroying doctrine of endless hell torments, and a firm conviction of the truth of the doctrine of God's impartial grace. It is true, then, that I have become a Universalist; but I assure you, I have not abandoned the cause of "truth and religion," for I have just embraced it. With your request, I most cheerfully comply, and in return, I ask you to weigh my reasons in the balance of Scripture truth, with candor and without prejudice.

1. I renounced the doctrine of endless misery because I could see no reason in it. Man is a frail, finite creature, and as an effect can not be greater than its cause, it follows that all his actions must be finite. Now ask yourself, seriously, does a finite offence require an infinite penalty? It is contended, that for every sin we commit, we deserve to suffer endless torture. Now there is no man in the universe, that "sinneth not." All, therefore, deserve to suffer this infinite penalty; ergo, all will suffer it. Not a soul can be saved; for it is in vain for us to hope or expect exemption from deserved punishment. "God will by no means clear the guilty."

This doctrine is not taught in Scripture. The sacred Volume, in a multitude of instances, teaches the doctrine of just punishment for sin; but in no place, does it intimate the endless continuance of that punishment. It tells us that "the wages of sin is death." Modern (self-styled) Orthodoxy, makes a little addition; "the wages of sin is eternal death." "The soul that sinneth, it shall die;" shall suffer endless hell torments, say the popular clergy. The Bible tells us that death shall be destroyed; that the time is coming, when there "shall be no more death." If this be the case, will there then be any eternal death? It tells us moreover that God will put an end to sin and transgression. When sin ceases, will not misery, the effect of sin, cease also? What then will become of the favorite doctrine of Orthodoxy, endless misery? Both reason and Scripture, are opposed to this monstrous dogma of never ending torture. It had its origin in heathenism; yet, like a tender plant, it is nourished by civilized nations; and even in this land of light and knowledge, it has full sway, an everlasting stigma upon the intelligence and good sense of the American people. But a star has arisen, continually increasing in brilliancy and effulgence, which is dispelling the dark clouds of ignorance and superstition, in which mankind have been so long enveloped, banishing from the breast of man, the despondency, which the brevity of his existence casts around him, and pointing him with an undeviating aim, towards the goal of immortal felicity. It is the star of Universalism!

3. It is not a comforting doctrine. It does not tend to soothe the sorrows, incident to man, while on his pilgrimage through this world. It grants no consolation to those that mourn the loss of friends; no hope to the soul, when about to leave its tabernacle of clay. But its legitimate conclusion is, to render its votaries unhappy; to rob them of all that is worth possessing; and to cause them to abhor their very existence. Witness their down cast looks and dejected mien. I can not better express the influence which this doctrine has on my own mind, than by the following lines—

> "While superstition with its wild control,
> Held its rude sceptre o'er my captive soul,
> Dark were my thoughts—no sacred peace I knew,
> I trembling thought of death—and judgment too."

The Gospel is "glad tidings." But is there any thing in this doctrine, that is calculaten to gladden? Can it then be a part of the Gospel?

4. This doctrine gives to God a character, which a Being, whose chief attributes are, love, justice, and mercy, can not possess. We believe that God is infinite in all his attributes; of course then, he knows all things. Now can it be, that God creates millions on millions of creatures, with the certain knowledge that they will be endlessly miserable? This sentiment, so abhorrent to reason and common sense, multitudes profess to believe. Is this idea consistent with the character of a God of love, who creates man for his pleasure; "who is good unto all, and whose tender mercies are over all his works?" The advocates of this sentiment must entertain singular ideas of love and mercy.

5. I have never known, or heard of, an individual, embracing this doctrine, after a careful, candid investigation; but it is always either by consequence of having it instilled into the youthful mind by proxy, or adopted in times of excitement, when reason is dethroned. On such occasions, there issues forth from the lips of the preacher, nothing but one continual stream of the deepest, darkest damnation. Instead of preaching repentance, as Christ preached it, "repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," the "revival" organ, tells his hearers to repent, in order to shield themselves from the flaming sword of God's justice, to escape the burning lava of a never ending hell. Thus, wrought up to the highest pitch of excitement, they take an imaginary tour to the regions of the damned, and roam through the "dark caverns of hell," where they behold their nearest and dearest friends and relatives, writhing in the hottest furnace of the Almighty's wrath, and sentenced to remain there forever. The fact is, this is the only way in which the Orthodox churches can gain members; for they seem themselves to be aware, that they can not convince men by reasonable means.

The above are the principal reasons, which have operated to produce this change, or rather enlargement, in my religious views. I have embraced the doctrine of a world's salvation, from a firm conviction of its truth. It is consistent with reason and revelation, and holds up the character of God in its true light. It represents him as a universal Father and Friend, pouring his blessings upon all, "even upon the evil and unthankful."

Had I not already extended my remarks much further than I had intended, I would enlarge somewhat on the proofs of the doctrine which I have embraced. The Bible tells us, that God wills the salvation of all mankind.—1 Timothy ii: 4. Christ came to do God's will.—John vi: 38. All men were given to Christ, and in John vi: 37, he says, "all that the Father giveth me, shall come to me, and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." If all are to come to Christ, and none are to be cast out; which is true, universal or partial salvation? Paul says, 2 Tim. iv: 10, that "God is the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe." Can he be the "Saviour of all men," if he consigns nine-tenths of the human family to never ending wo? David says, Psalms xxii: 37, "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before" him. "Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall (one) say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." Isa. xlv: 22–24. Will the millions that are to people the regions of never ending night, bow the knee, and declare, that in the Lord they have righteousness and strength? For further proof on this subject, I refer you to the Bible throughout.

The comfort and consolation, which I have derived from a belief in, and contemplation of, the glorious doctrine of universal redemption, I know not how to express. I am delivered from that slavish, tormenting fear, which ever haunts the believer in remediless wo; a doctrine which I sincerely hope, will speedily be destitute of advocates.

Against no denomination of Christians, in our country, does the tide of prejudice run so strongly, as against the Universalist. The step I have taken, was not taken in a moment; I weighed well the consequences. I was well aware, that I should not henceforth be wafted on the wings of popularity. I had reason to believe, that my motives would be impugned; and that the tie of friendship would, in many instances, be severed. "But none of these things move me." I resolved not to sacrifice peace of mind, for the sake of enjoying the favor of the multitude, and I can dispense with those, whose friendship I can enjoy, only on condition, that I believe a large portion of mankind will wail and gnash their teeth in hell! I close, with the earnest request, that you will examine this interesting subject carefully and candidly; for truth never can suffer by investigation, while on the other hand, error shrinks from it. Yours sincerely, JONATHAN M. DAY.

Macedon, Wayne county, January 15, 1839.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ELOQUENCE.

How thrilling is the strain of eloquence as it falls from the lips of the orator! What emotions of grandeur and sublimity does it excite! The mind, as if charmed by its magic spell, rises with it above the things of earth, soaring on eagle wings among the starry worlds, and from its exalted height, views the vast expanse of nature.—It carries us back to olden times, and displays before our mental vision the deeds of other years. It calls up before the imagination, the actions of heroes, whose ashes lie mingled with the common dust, forgotten and unknown. The rise and fall of empires, the ruins of mighty kingdoms, the blessings of peace, and the desolations of war, are depicted in their most glowing colors. Cities now mouldering in the dust, we behold in all their primeval splendor, adorned with the gorgeous palace, and the cloud-capt tower. It draws aside the thick curtain which hangs over the future, and portrays to the mind events not yet transpired. It chains in breathless silence, the listening and vast multitude; and sways the destinies of great and mighty nations.

Nature too has her eloquent voices as well as man. There is eloquence in the soft murmurs of the flowing brook, as it winds along among the hills and vales. There is eloquence in the sweet notes of the feathered songsters, as they chant in the wild wood and the groves. There is eloquence in the hum of the glittering insect, as it flutters in the sun-beams, or buzzes around the opening blossoms. There is eloquence in the soft breathings of the evening zephyrs, as they gently play a mournful dirge over the departed day. O, there is eloquence in a mother's tears, as she yearns over her wayward boy, or weeps over the tomb of a departed child. There is eloquence in the silvered locks of the aged sire, as he totters upon the verge of the grave. All nature is full of eloquence. The green fields, the shady forests, the blue ethereal vault of heaven, and the bright stars that glitter in night's sable darkness, speak to us in thrilling, though voiceless eloquence. A. F.

Richmond, Va.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

For the Magazine and Advocate

THE HAPPY FAMILY.

A Juvenile Tale.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

CHAPTER IV.

A journey—many pleasant things seen—the return home—an evening well spent.

The family had long been wanting to go on a journey to the extreme western part of the State. They had thought of setting off in Autumn, and so anxious were George and Adeline that they should, that they did nothing but talk of it all the way home from their morning ride. It was so pleasant, they said, and just the time for a journey. But Autumn passed, and Winter came and went; and still they were at home, engaged as usual in visiting the sick, aiding the poor, and in other deeds of charity and kindness. However, a time was set when they should start on their long ride; and on one bright, sunny morning in May, they entered their carriage—the whip cracked—the horses started off on a brisk trot, and they were on their way to visit many new places, and to see many fine things.

A few hours ride brought them to the pleasant village of C——, lying at the foot of a beautiful lake of the same name. Here they stopped a short time, seeing much to praise and admire, and then proceeded on to a small but neat little village, a few miles distant, where they dined.—George and Adeline thought it a very pretty place; but what most attracted their attention, were two large and elegant buildings made of small round stone. And then there was the church standing on the hill just back of the village—they thought it very pretty, but most admired its situation. Leaving this place, they passed through many pretty villages, and finally reached, before night-fall, the small, but beautiful city of R——, upwards of forty miles from their own pleasant village. They retired early to rest, as they were very much fatigued with their day's ride. The next day they were to spend in walking about the city, and viewing the many curiosities which it contains. They were up the next morning at an early hour, and after taking breakfast, started on their walk. They saw many fine things that day—much to admire and please. George and Adeline were very much delighted—to them it was a day of unmingled happiness and pleasure.

The next day saw the family again on their way to the city of B——, where they arrived the second evening after leaving R——. Here they found much more that was delightful and amusing. All was bustle and activity. Here they saw hundreds of families on their way to the far West. Steamboats continually departing, their cabins and decks crowded with men, women and children, going to settle in the wilds of that far country, beyond the lakes. Leaving this place, they went on a visit to the Falls of Niagara, that mighty wonder of Nature. Mr. and Mrs. Norton were both very much astonished, but George and Adeline were completely motionless from fear. Neither said a word for many minutes; and when they did speak, it was scarce above a whisper; so much were they awed, and so much did they feel their own littleness, when compared with the thundering Niagara.

"How grand!" said Mrs. Norton, breaking a long silence which had been maintained—"How very far beyond what my imagination had pictured!"

"Most grand and sublime indeed!" said Mr. Norton. "And how clearly is the omnipotence of our great Creator here shown forth. This is the place for humbling the pride of man; and many times while standing here, have I inwardly exclaimed—Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him; and the Son of man that thou visitest him!"

After tarrying at the falls some two or three days, and enjoying themselves with many pleasant walks and rambles, they set out for home, where they arrived in a few days, having been absent about two weeks. And George and Adeline were very glad to get home again. It is true, they had a fine journey—had seen much that was delightful and entertaining—but still, to them, there was "no place like home."

"Oh how glad I am that we have got back again," said George, as he entered the door of their own pretty dwelling.

"And I, too"—said Adeline. "For my part, I am clear tired out," and she threw herself on a sofa which stood in the hall.

Much had taken place in their little village and vicinity during the absence of the family—and much, too, that filled their hearts with sorrow.—Several little boys and girls of their acquaintance, had been drowned in a lake while out on a ride; and the old lady, whom they visited during their morning ride, had gone down to the grave. She died as she had lived, a Christian—cherishing, to the last, the faith of a world's salvation from sin and death, which enabled her to bear up patiently under all her affliction, and to triumph in the trying hour!

The evening after their arrival, the family seated themselves in the parlor, when George and Adeline read, each, a chapter from the Bible; Mr. Norton explaining those passages which they did not understand, as they went along. After this, they all knelt down in prayer, and then retired to rest.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1839.

THE CONFESSION OF FAITH.

It was remarked in a former article, that one charge which was urged against an individual who was expelled from a Presbyterian church in Auburn, was, denying "the future punishment of the wicked, as taught in the Confession of Faith." By "future punishment," in this case, limited punishment beyond the grave, followed by ultimate redemption, is not intended—in the Confession of Faith, it is the doctrine of endless misery.

The practice pursued by the Presbyterian churches, of excluding members, because they depart from the doctrine of the Confession, is, in a great many instances, a mere blinding and incorrect practice—for the simple reason, that a majority of Presbyterians do not believe the Confession of Faith, in some of its most essential particulars. And hence, it is mockery, to brand others as heretics for not believing it. And it is with not a little surprise, that the undersigned sees his Presbyterian brethren still clinging to that creed-book, when by their disbelief of parts of it, they practically judge it as having been weighed in the balances of scriptural truth, and found wanting.

It is a fact not to be denied, that many of the clergy who sustain the Confession of Faith, believe and preach, not only that Christ died for all, but that all men may be saved if they will. This point is earnestly set forth and urged upon the notice of the people, in all their protracted meetings. Dr. Beecher once said, while preaching in Auburn, that "the whole world may come in abreast if it will," to salvation. The amiable and talented Professor Halsey, of the Presbyterian Seminary in Auburn, remarked in a sermon, "a creature was never made just to be miserable—there is not a word in the Scriptures which intimates it." Now, it will be seen, that these facts are in direct opposition with the doctrine of election and reprobation. For, if the doctrine of election is true, some men were made on purpose for misery. And certainly, it would be mere mockery for a preacher to tell a congregation, that the whole world may be saved if it will, when the preacher believed that God had decreed from the foundation of his works, that the whole world should not be saved. Hence, when a preacher declares, that the world may be saved, I conclude, that, unless he believes one thing and preaches another, he can not admit the doctrine of election in its crude form; unless it can be shown, that a man whose ruin is sealed in the counsels of Heaven, has still a chance of escape. Yet, the very persons who preach and believe in free grace and salvation, still cling to the Confession of Faith, even when it teaches the strict doctrine of election and reprobation—as the following quotation proves. "By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others fore-ordained to everlasting death." "These angels and men, thus predestinated and fore-ordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definite that it can not be either increased or diminished." "Those of mankind that are predestinated unto life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath chosen in Christ, unto everlasting glory, out of his mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions, or causes moving him thereunto; and all to the praise of his glorious grace." "The rest of mankind, God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or witholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creatures, to pass by, and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice." Confession of Faith, amended edition, chapter 3, Sections 3, 4, 5, 7, on pp. 16, 17, 18, 19.

Let it be observed, that we are here taught, that a certain number were predestined to salvation, and a certain number foreordained to overlasting death; which numbers are so certain and definite, that they can be neither added to nor diminished. Now, can a person who is foreordained to endless wo, by any means whatever, be saved, and added to a number which God made so certain that it can not be added to? Certainly, it is impossible for the creature to set aside the foreordination of God. How then, can men pretend to believe a book containing such a notion, when they believe that all men may be saved if they will? It would be the plainest contradiction in the world, to affirm that all men may be saved, and attempt to make that idea consistent with the view that God had separated men into two parcels, one for salvation, the other for destruction, and rendered it impossible for a member of one parcel to be added to the number of the other parcel.

There is another fact attending the Confession of Faith, which is of importance. Many of the persons, who defend this creed-book, are unacquainted with much that it contains. For, when some of those who have been active in dealing with heretics in this village, were told that the Presbyterian church arrogates the power of retaining and remitting sins, the same as the Roman Catholics do, they denied it, until they were confronted with the following quotation, which compelled them to admit it. "The Lord Jesus, as king and head of his church, hath therein appointed a government in the hand of church-officers, distinct from the civil magistrate." "To these officers the keys of the kingdom of heaven are committed, by virtue whereof they have power respectively to retain and remit sins, to shut that kingdom against the impenitent, both by words and censures; and to open it unto penitent sinners, by the ministry of the Gospel, and by absolution from censures, as occasion shall require." Confession of Faith, amended edition, Chapter 30, Sections 1 and 2—Church Censures, pp. 129, 130. Setting aside the claim to remit or retain the sins of offenders; a power which our Saviour gave to his immediate disciples only; the denial of a passage in their creed-book, by those who are pledged to believe that book, shows that there is rottenness in spiritual Denmark.

The sum of all these considerations, then, is, that it is a very ridiculous thing for man to condemn a person for not believing a creed-book, when many of their own number do not believe an important item of its doctrine, and many others of them have never taken the pains of knowing what the book teaches. All of which inconsistency will flee away with increased light and research.

There is no necessity for their having a creed-book. God has opened the full fountain of salvation in the Bible, and why should men wish to turn away from that fountain, to drink from the confused waters of a creed-book. Let creeds be laid aside, and the voice of creed-makers be silent, when the Lord hath spoken in the Bible, and taught us to "search the Scriptures."

G. W. M.

CHRISTIAN TRAITS AND DUTIES....NO IV.

MORAL COURAGE.

Agreeably to the superiority of every thing moral, so moral courage is far superior to physical, or, perhaps it is more correct to say, animal courage. This is self-evident. The stag at bay, who gores the hounds, and defies the hunters, gives us an example of animal courage. So does the soldier who goes upon the forlorn hope, or who plants his standard on the enemy's ramparts, despite the bristling battery or the deadly cannon-fire. But, who does not see, that he who stands forth with a truth that contradicts a previous opinion of his thousand hearers, or condemns them in any practice—or the utterance of which may be fatal to his own influence, or property, or life—and yet, who, impelled by a deep conviction of his duty or the importance of the truth, does proclaim it—who, I say, does not see, that this act, flowing from a combination of superior faculties, is an exhibition of a superior courage to that of the soldier in the instance presented?

We grant that the qualities of moral and animal courage may be, and it is probable that they often are, joined in one individual, but we are now speaking of these qualities abstractly. So, then, a man of moral courage may be, perhaps, what is commonly termed a coward. A man of powerful intellect, and of elevated moral views and character, placed in the front rank of battle, a battle in which no great and just principle is involved, but which has been excited merely by the caprice or ambition of rulers, may tremble for his life, may even wish to turn and fly, and yet, I say, it may be a question whether such a man can possibly be called a coward. But let all this be as it may, we will say, that place that man—the man possessing moral courage—in the cause of truth, where right or principle is brought into action, and while he can stand, he will, like that valiant warrior of which we think we have sometimes heard, who stood single-handed against a host. Or take the leader in the battle's strife, who never shrunk from the volleying death, and this individual, and place them alone, alternately, at midnight, in a place of graves, and of superstitious terror, and if one should flee, which do you think would remain? The answer is obvious.

We would enforce the idea at this time, that the lofty daring and fearlessness which proceed from a proper perception and conviction of truth, principle and duty, and of the obligation to go according to these, is far superior to that courage which bears up the heart in the deadly conflict, or maintains the wall against the threatener and the bully. And this trait we say, with others, is illustrated in the character of Paul, and was especially manifested on Mar's Hill.

We say, then, that we talk much of his courage who forces the sword and the iron ranks of the foe, and who ——"Seeks the bubble reputation,

E'en at the cannon's mouth."

We talk much of his courage who braved the fierce heats of Egypt, and the stern rigor of Alpine snows; and unshrinkingly crossed the flame-swept bridge of Lodi. Men who have won laurels in blood and danger, like him alluded to, we style heroes, and the world hails them with plaudits, and gives them a name high in the archives of what it calls immortality. But, after all, there are those who, perhaps, while they labor among us, are even contemned and ridiculed, yet whose claims to the title "hero," are much stronger, or, at least, more noble, than those advanced by the warriors who are crowned with "the blushing honors" of a triumph. They win laurels also, but they are

"Gained in the issues of bloodless strife."

And we do not perceive their right to them, it may be, until gratitude wreathes them around their tombs. Yet they are enduring, far beyond the marble monument and the gilded trophy, and they will breathe undying fragrance, when the lofty cenotaph shall have crumbled. These are men of moral courage—heroes in the great field of philanthropic and religious action. Heroes, whose immediate reward, perchance, is not applause, nor riches, nor power, but sufferings, and chains, and death!

This moral courage is the true criterion of the man, and is that in which men are the most deficient. He who fears, when duty calls, to utter the truth before men, or to act agreeably to his convictions, is a worse coward than the one who steps beneath the rushing musket-ball, or runs from the serried bayonets of the foe. Indeed, there are some instances when it is really an act of courage to submit to be called a coward. The rashness of hot blood, or the fear of being branded "craven," may produce many of those acts which are styled "brave," while he who shudders or shrinks back from following others into what is termed "an affair of honor," for instance, is called a poltroon. The true essence of moral courage, is resistance to every wrong principle, and action upon the dictates of duty. George Washington, when he confessed to his father the injury which he had done with his hatchet, displayed moral courage, and evinced that spirit which he exhibited as the leader of a people struggling for the right, and which, had circumstances required, would have carried him upon the forlorn hope, or in front of ——"The battery's jaws of flame."

It is often and very appropriately said of the American Revolution, that it was "a time that tried men's souls"—not their manual dexterity alone, not alone their thews and sinews, but their deep principles of courage—their moral strength. The strongest weapons used by them against the tyranny of the British king, were, in reality, contained in the declaration of independence, and the minds which could cooly and deliberately present such motives for the taking up of arms, were minds of true courage. Those men were not rash. They did not step out into the arena of conflict with a great nation, for the purpose of exhibiting their prowess to the world, but they were actuated by principle, and had they been twice or only half as powerful as they were, who will say that this would have caused any difference in their acts! They would have paused from action, and only, when such a course would have been unnecessary, or else, a deed of rash infatuation, instead of wisdom.

It is in a time like that of the American Revolution, or the Reformation, or the first propagation of Christianity, that moral courage is brought to light. When men are exposed to persecutions, tortures and death, for opinion's sake, and yet unfalteringly cling to their convictions—when great and deep sacrifices must be made, and are made, unhesitatingly—then is it that you can discover who are truly courageous.

There is, we say, as in the case exhibited in our last number, a sublimity in the exhibition of this principle of moral courage. It is a sublime sight to see one man ready and able to proclaim the truth, standing up before congregated thousands, opposing him, prejudiced against him, ignorant of what he has to say. But with mighty truth in his heart and upon his lips, he need fear no weapon which may be used against him. It is of the moral sublime, to behold a powerful intellect protesting against error, and battering down its strong holds. At first, perchance, many who have come to listen, are prepared with a pleasant jest, or they give way to a contemptuous sneer, or in their hearts burn with rage against, or else pity, the deluded one. But as the teacher of the truth kindles with the increasing strength of his subject—as he pours out "thoughts that breathe, and words that burn"—as, one by one, the fragments of false systems topple and fall around him, and upon their ruins arises the beautiful and perfect fabric—the jest is checked, the sneer settles down, perchance, to a frown, anger softens to a milder feeling, or deepens to hatred, pity curdles to alarm, and the errorist finds himself defeated and driven back from his positions—So, although he who overturns error and builds up truth, may not work conviction, or succeed in producing a candid avowal of it, if wrought—although he may not disarm prejudice, or warm the heart of bigotry—but may produce even the contrary effects, or a worse form of these original evils, yet, he has produced an effect with his moral power, which, to him who looks on with the calm eye of candor and of reason, affords a view of the moral sublime, and, more than this, he may feel in the rich testimony of his own pure conscience, that cheering approbation which accompanies the possession of true and undaunted courage, exercised in the course of righteousness and of duty.

But, reader, let not moral courage be with you only a subject of theory, but strive to cultivate and practice it. This is an age for free inquiry, freedom of expression, and let not the man who has discovered a truth, or who has a word to say, of advice, opinion or suggestion, hold back from any impulse of moral cowardice. Let him profit by his privileges. Let him not be afraid of becoming unpopular, or of losing something of temporary interest. These test and bring out the principle of moral courage in our day, and not the sword, the faggot, nor the scaffold. He who fears to speak because great men or fashionable people, profess a contrary opinion from that which he holds—or because interest or custom appeals to him for silence, would hardly have borne testimony to the truth in the days of bloody and fiery persecution—he has not the spirit of an apostle Paul, or a Martin Luther. I ask, not in an uncharitable spirit, I trust, how many are they, standing among the different religious sects in our land, who dissent from many of their tenets and points of faith, and yet who are kept back from coming out and expressing that dissent merely on account of interest or popularity? Now, if there are any such, I must say, that they lack moral courage. It is beneath the dignity of man, with his freeborn and noble intellect, and all his lofty and glorious aspirations after truth, thus to go crouching and shackled through the world. I like the spirit displayed by the great Chillingworth, in his "Preface to the Author of 'Charity Maintained.'" "But I, for my part," says he, "unless I deceive myself, was, and still am so affected, as I have made profession, not willing, I confess, to take any thing upon trust, and to believe it without asking myself why, no, nor able to command myself (were I never so willing) to follow, like a sheep, every shepherd that should take upon him to guide me; or every flock, that should chose to go before me: but most apt and most willing to be led by reason to any way, or from it, and always submitting all other reasons to this one. God hath said so, therefore it is true."—I like, I say, this spirit, for it is generally accompanied by that degree of moral courage which leads to an open and honest avowal of opinion. He who has the courage to examine the opinions of others, and to dissent from error whenever he finds it, will be apt to come out and express boldly his sentiments.

Let us, then, not profess error because multitudes hold to it, but let us seek truth, even if we look for it unaccompanied by any, where it may burn, alone and holy, upon its altars. And having found it, let us proclaim it, fearless of man and his persecutions. Let us study the character of the great apostle, and copy that truly "Christian trait" of moral courage, which he exhibited as a soldier of the cross. E. H. C.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAW OF KINDNESS.....NO. II.

"Overcome evil with good."—Rom. xii: 21.

The first illustration of the effect of the law of kindness which will be adduced, is the conduct of Joseph and his brethren, as it eminently exhibits the superior power of "love your enemies," over "hate your enemies." On account of the dreams which prefigured the future exaltation of Joseph, his brethren looked upon him as their enemy. In the spirit of revenge, they plotted his murder; and though, by the intercession of one of their number, his life was spared, they sold him as a slave, no doubt with the hope that they should never again hear from the dreamer. All this was pure wickedness, and about as cunning a plan as revenge generally commands. But it did not command the desired object.—For when, through a train of circumstances, Joseph obtained the highest office under Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and his wicked brethren, through famine, were driven into Egypt to buy corn, he met them in all the fulness of the law of love. And his kindness so wrought upon them, so subdued their enmity, that they became entirely reconciled to him, and cheerfully submitted to his rule.—Joseph loved—his brethren hated. And it need scarcely be asked 'which party was most happy, and whose conduct resulted in the most good—his brethren trembling in the fear of conscious guilt; or Joseph, who could so disarm himself of revenge, as not only to cordially forgive their very many serious crimes, but also to crowd upon them the choicest tokens of his fraternal affection? In this instance, the exercise of the law of kindness was completely successful, and changed enemies, charged with a murderous spirit, into reconciled and affectionate friends.

By reading the history of Saul, king of Israel, it is evident that he was actuated by the most inveterate animosity against David, who afterwards filled the throne in Jerusalem. But notwithstanding his malignity, he was softened in a strange manner when the kindness of David met him in its full power. On one occasion, Saul heard that David was in the "wilderness of Engedi," and with an armed band he pursued him with the full purpose of murdering him. While engaged in this pursuit, Saul entered the cave where David and his followers had secreted themselves. As Saul was completely in his power, the followers of David advised him to kill the king, which, unquestionably, the law of retaliation would have justified. David, however, pursued a more magnanimous course, the result of which is given in the language of the Bible. "But Saul rose up out of the cave, and went on his way. David also arose afterward, and went out of the cave, and cried after Saul, saying, my lord the king. And when Saul looked behind him, David stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself. And David said to Saul, wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, behold, David seeketh thy hurt? Behold, this day thine eyes have seen how that the Lord hath delivered thee to-day into my hand in the cave: and some bade me kill thee; but mine eye spared thee; and I said, I will not put forth my hand against my lord; for he is the Lord's anointed. Moreover, my father, see, yea, see the skirt of thy robe in my hand: for in that I cut off the skirt of thy robe, and killed thee not, know thou and see that there is neither evil nor transgression in my hand, and I have not sinned against thee; yet thou huntest my soul to take it The Lord judge between me and thee, and the Lord avenge me of thee: but my hand shall not be upon thee. As saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked: but my hand shall not be upon thee. After whom is the king of Israel come out? after whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog, after a flea? The Lord therefore be judge, and judge between me and thee, and see, and plead my cause, and deliver me out of thy hand. And it came to pass when David had made an end of speaking these words unto Saul, that Saul said, Is this thy voice, my son David? And Saul lifted up his voice, and wept. And he said to David, thou art more righteous than I: for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil. And thou hast shewed this day how that thou hast dealt well with me; forasmuch as when the Lord had delivered me into thy hand, thou killedst me not. For if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away? wherefore the Lord reward thee good, for what thou hast done unto me this day."—1 Sam. xxiv: 7–19. In this case, the law of kindness produced an excellent result; for it robbed Saul of his murderous design, softened the iron purpose of his revenge, opened the fountain of his tears, and sent him home without any desire to accomplish the object for which he left it.

When Peter denied his Lord, and in his fear declared that he knew not the man, his bitter tears would never have flowed, nor his sorrow have been so pungent and complete, had not recollections of the kindness of his Lord, came thronging over his feelings, powerfully contrasting his base ingratitude with that love which had instructed and blessed him. Peter bowed under it—he could not withstand the good with which his evil was met—and he mourned his defection with sincere repentance, and was ever after true to his Saviour, even unto death.

After the venerable Evangelist John, had returned from his banishment to the isle of Patmos, he made it his duty to visit various churches, and to consult their prosperity and welfare. On one occasion, he observed an intelligent-looking man, who, after a time, became a member of one of the churches. But he soon became corrupt and intemperate through the influence of bad company, and at last fled to a band of robbers, of whom he was soon made captain. When John, to his great grief, heard these facts, he exposed himself in the haunts of the robbers, and when taken, said, "lead me to your captain." When the bandit saw John, he fled; but the apostle pursued him, saying, "my son, why flyest thou from thy father, unarmed and old?—fear not; as there yet remaineth hope of salvation—believe me, Christ hath sent me." Before the kind entreaties of John, the robber trembled and wept; and finally returned to his Christian companions and became an exemplary man.

In these instances we discover the power of kindness; and we find it more efficacious than the law of revenge—for if the law of revenge had been exercised in regard to them, the results would have been the direct opposite from what they were as brought about by the divine principle, "overcome evil with good."

G. W. M.

HONORING THE SON.

Br. M. H. Smith came to the aid of Br Whittemore in the controversy respecting the worship of Jesus, by publishing an article in the Trumpet, in December last. Br. Smith could not then be attended to, as I generally find "one at a time" quite enough to suit my combativeness; but lest he might deem me uncourteous for not noticing his remarks, I will now briefly state—

1st. The controversy was not, What do the Scriptures teach on the subject? but, do Universalists believe as Br. Whittemore represented to Mr. Roe? I felt bound, therefore, to pay no attention to the passages of Scripture quoted, further than as mere definitions of the terms used by my opponent—especially as I repeatedly informed him, that I believed those passages as firmly and as fully as he did.

2d. That Br. Whittemore had advanced the same views before, without contradiction, and even with the approbation of several hundred hearers, and of a ministering brother from New-York, does not prove that the denomination held those views, unless Br. M. H. S can prove that these hearers were the denomination, and that every uncontradicted statement of Br. Whittemore is believed by all Universalists.

3d. As to the text, John v: 23, "That all men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father"—if construed against me, it will prove that Jesus is to be worshipped as the Supreme God, and not as the mere Son and Agent of the Supreme Deity. This no Universalist believes, more than he supposes that the text, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect," implies that man must attain to divine, infinite and eternal perfection. God is to be honored according to his nature, station and character; even so is the Son to be honored—according to his nature, station and character—i. e. with the difference that really exists between Jesus and God. Probably Prof. Ware's last sermon, in his Sermons on the offices and character of Christ, which is based on John v: 23, gives as correct an exposition of this passage, according to my views, (and, I believe, the views of Universalists generally,) as any thing I could refer to at present. To that, therefore, I would at this time, refer all who desire to know my views on this subject. When I find leisure, I may furnish an essay on the subject for the consideration of our readers, and in compliance with the request of Br. Balfour—not to provoke controversy, but to furnish information.

4th. I have abstained from publishing the expressions of approbation on my position, which I have received from several brethren; because I deemed the controversy to be between myself and Br. Whittemore, and did not deem it advisable to divert either party from the main point. If any one is dissatisfied with the concessions made by Br. Whittemore—thinks the discussion has terminated on the wrong side—I am now ready to hear, and perhaps to reply to, what he may offer. I know that I have not misrepresented the views of my lay and ministering brethren in this region, so far as I have heard any expression of their opinions, and believe that my course has met with their general approbation.

A. B. G.

We have a few hundred copies of the Register and Almanac still on hand. Those who are not supplied, and can not get them otherwise, would do well to order them by mail. The postage on them is 1 1-2 cents per copy under 100 miles, 2 1-2 over 100 miles.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. Smith, in Middleville—Br. D. R. Biddlecom, at Parker's Settlement—Br. Kibbe, at Knoxville—Br. Gage, at Babcock's Hill, in the east schoolhouse through the day, and near Br. Babcock's in the evening.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. Smith, in Salisbury.

I am requested by Br. Delong, to state, that there will be a Universalist Conference in the village of Oran, on the last Wednesday and Thursday, the 27th and 28th of February. Ministering brethren are invited to attend. G. W. M.

A Conference of Universalist clergymen will be held at the Universalist meeting-house in Victor, on the last Saturday and Sunday in the present month. Ministering brethren affectionately invited to attend.

T. J. Whitcomb.

The Western N. Y. Conference of Universalists, will be holden in the Universalist meeting-house at Chili, Monroe county, on the third Wednesday and following Thursday inst. Ministering brethren and friends are earnestly invited to attend. Important business comes before the Conference at the approaching session.

POETRY.

THE RECONCILIATION.

Some time ago it was proposed to put an end to the petty disputes between two rival factions in Ireland, by getting the leaders of them to meet and embrace in their chapels, and promise to forgive and forget: the occurrence that suggested the following lines, took place at the altar of a little mountain chapel in Clare.—The Diamond.

An ould man he knelt at the altar,
His enemy's hand to take;
And at first his faint voice did falter,
And his feeble hands did shake:
For his only brave boy—his glory—
Had been stretched at the old man's feet,
A corpse, all so pale and gory,
By the hand that he now must greet.

The ould man he soon stopt speaking,
And rage that had not gone by,
From under his brows came breaking
Up into his enemy's eye:
And now his hands were not shaking,
But clenched, o'er his heart were crossed,
And he looked a fierce look, to be taking
Revenge for the boy he had lost.

But the ould man he looked around him,
And thought of the place he was in;
And thought of the vow that had bound him;
And thought that revenge was sin.
And then,—crying tears like a woman—
"Your hand!" he said, aye, "that hand!
And I do forgive you, foeman,
For the sake of our bleeding land!"

STANZAS.

Death had been there since last we met,
And left its silent trace!
There was no cheek with sorrow wet;
There was no outward mourning—yet
There was a vacant place!

I saw her room—the very same;
Her harp stood mutely there;
Untouched her books—her drawing frame—
Her Robin to the window came
To seek its morning fare!

The gleam of sunshine on the wall
To me was deepest gloom;
No joy was in that Robin's call,
For where was she—the soul of all?
Cold—cold, within the silent tomb.

ON A SUNBEAM

Playing on a mass of snow.

Mark in yon beam, the world's destructive guile—
It melts us into ruin with a smile.

[From the Olive Branch.]

DECEPTION.

"Let no man deceive himself."—PAUL.

A more valuable exhortation perhaps can not be found in the whole range of personal advice given by Paul in all his writings, than the words which head this article. There is much to be feared from the deception of others; but still more from ourselves. We are not so often taken in by our intercourse with the world, as we flatter and deceive ourselves. There are various ways in which mankind are deceived, a few of which we propose to mention.

1st. A man may deceive himself, by making extraordinary exertions to appear what he is not, when he shines like the distant burnings, only to destroy. It is often the case that the very means used to make the appearance, destroys the reality. Thus many make themselves poor by trying to appear rich; they have sought the shadow for the substance, and in this way have deceived themselves.

2d. A man may be deceived in barter, in his exchanges with the mercantile world—he purchases, but is deceived in his goods; he obtains, but the moth and rust hath corrupted it; he finds himself greatly disappointed in his expectations—and what he thought to be something, he finds to be nothing.

3d. In obtaining riches. Here is a stone where too many alas, stumble. They have taken riches for happiness, and possession for enjoyment: consequently having sacrificed health, care, and rational comfort for the obtaining of riches, supposing it to be the climax of human enjoyments; and here they have deceived themselves. Many in "making haste to be rich," have not been "found innocent." They have toiled through many inconveniences to obtain that which must be surely lost again. Instead of being content with what they have, they have aimed at too much, and in some cases lost the whole.

4th. In religion. Here the mass of mankind have undoubtedly deceived themselves. We do not pretend to judge, but all are witnesses that the majority is in theory wrong in religious principles. The most absurd and ridiculous acts have been performed, and long and tedious journies have been made, and all out of mistaken notions of religion. It is a general thing that people are more scrupulous about the theory than the practice—more anxious to know the truth than to follow its dictates—a greater desire to learn than to perform, and thus they deceive themselves by overlooking plain duty and plain precepts. It is safe in most cases to judge by Pope's rule, "He can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

5th In duty. Under trying circumstances, it is hard to tell what to do, to do right. While many ways are lawful but few are expedient, while one says this is right, another perhaps will say it is wrong; while the ways of man are before the Lord, and he pondereth all his goings, it is absolutely necessary to do as duty is made plain to him, and submit his cause, as all must, to him that judgeth righteously. But few do this in most cases, and therefore deceive themselves by trying some new way or mode in order to evade the just demerits of such a course. Let each one, therefore, as he values his own interest, deceive not "himself."

[From the Lady's Book.]

CONTEMPLATION.

It was twilight, the most perfect calm seemed to pervade all nature; the sun had just set, and his departing rays lingered on the distant hills, as if he felt reluctant to give place to the softer and more gentle influence of his sister moon. At length star after star appeared in the dark vault, till the whole firmament was in a glow. Such a night found me walking alone and solitary, along the outskirts of the beautiful village of ———. But though alone, I felt no loneliness, for the subjects for contemplation were numerous.

While gazing on the planets, the idea presented itself, which I thought a very beautiful one, as well as in perfect keeping with the harmony of God's works; that they were inhabited, as well as our own fair earth, but with beings of a far superior order, who have never sinned against their Creator, but who are holy, pure, and altogether lovely.

And why might not this be the case? We can not, we must not suppose that the All-Wise Creator formed so many unnumbered worlds, and launched them into the immensity of space, giving them an impetus proportioned to their size, so that they retain their place, and without the least confusion, each in its respective orbit; that he created all these merely to give their uncertain light to our little globe, a spot in the universe, less than a drop in the ocean, when compared with the millions which surround it.

This, in my opinion, would be incompatible with his goodness and wisdom. Every spot on which we cast our eyes teems with life; the very air we breathe, and every drop of water, is filled with living creatures; and, therefore, judging from analogy, it is most natural to suppose that all the systems in the universe, of which we form so small a part, are in like manner inhabited. Of this, however, for an all-wise purpose, nothing is revealed to us. But we may be assured, that what we do not know now, we shall know hereafter, and the clouds that now obstruct the mind's eye, on this, as well as other subjects, shall then be dispersed, and all shall be made as the noon-day sun.

SOCIAL INTERCOURSE.

Without friends what is man? A solitary oak, upon a sterile rock, symmetrical indeed in its form, beautiful and exquisitely finished, outrivaling the most lauded perfection of art in gracefulness and grandeur, but over which decay has shaken her black wing, and left its leaves blighted—its limbs contract as they die—its roots, rottenness, and its bloom, death—a scathed, lifeless monument of its pristine beauty. When the rebuffs of adversity are rushing us earthward, when the clouds look black above, and the muttering thunder of misfortune growls along the sky, when our frame is palsied by the skeleton hand of disease, or our senses whirled in the mad-room chaos of insanity, when our hearts are torn by the recent separation of some beloved object, while our tears are yet flowing upon the fresh turf of departed innocence—in that time it is the office of friendship to shield us from portentious storm, to quicken the fainting pulses of our sickly frame, to bring back the wandering star of mind within the attraction of sympathetic kindness—the "oil and balm" of peace into the yet festering wound, and deliver the aching heart from the object of its bleeding affection.

SOCIAL MEETINGS.—If a religious society would prosper, in the fulness and interest of its meetings for public worship, nothing is clearer to our mind than that the people must manifest an engagedness and activity in the cause. As for a preacher, he may possess the talents of an angel, and preach his head bare and his heart dry, and if he does not find a corresponding zeal on the part of the society, his labors will be quite in vain. And if they are in vain, ten to one the society will complain of him, and condemn him as the cause of its misfortune, when, in fact, the society should blame itself alone.

When Cyrus had taken captive the wife of Tigranes, he asked him what he would give for her redemption. "All that I have, and my own life with it," was the reply; upon which the conqueror gratuitously restored her. All commending Cyrus, Tigranes asked his wife what she thought of him, "I did not," said she, "look at him."

"Not look at him! on whom then did you look?"

"At the generous man who offered his own life to redeem me from slavery."

A pious mind will want no assistance to apply this interesting anecdote.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, January 28th, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. ALBERT MILLER, to Miss MARGARET D. CLARK, both of Mohawk village.

Same place, January 29th, by the same, Mr. EDSON RICE, of Whitesborough, to Miss HARRIET CABOT, of New-Hartford.

In this city, January 30th, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. AURELIUS BENEDICT, to Miss ELIZA PRIEST, both of Waterville, N. Y.

DEATHS.

At Paris Furnace, January 8th, MORRIS LUCE, an interesting son of Horace and Mary Luce, aged 8 years. Many are the tears of sympathy shed in affliction for the loss of one, in whom even community felt a kindling of love. And the fond parents—who but parents can feel the breaking of cherished hopes! May God enable them more and more, to experience the consolation of that faith which teaches them, that though the place once occupied by their child, is now vacant, he fills a higher, a happier station, where they shall again be permitted to meet him, to part no more forever. The star which shone so brightly here, has only been transplanted to a cloudless sky, to mingle its brightness with the glory of the Eternal. A. R. B.

In New-Hartford, on January 28th, Mrs JOANNA SMITH, relict of Shadrach Smith, aged 78 years. Nearly four years ago, this aged mother in Israel had a fall, followed by a shock of palsy on one side, which, with a severe nervous irritation in the stomach, confined her till her death, sometimes with much pain, and latterly deprived her of reason. The torch of mind was however relumed just before her decease. Her constant prayer during her long and painful illness, was, that God would enable her to bear resignedly his will, and to wait with patience the time of her departure; for she was anxious to depart and be with Christ.

Mrs. Smith was tried in the purifying furnace of affliction, and came forth as pure gold from the refiner's fire. Ever cheerful—ever humble and devout, hers was a lot to need, and a soul to receive and rejoice in, the great salvation. It worked in her heart by love—it soothed her sorrows—it strengthened her soul—it made her resigned to all afflictions, and enabled her piously to praise and thank her heavenly Father in all situations and conditions—for she believed that whether he gave the sunshine or the storm, in all he was the same kind and loving Parent of vast humanity. In this faith she lived an active life—an example to all around her;—and in this faith she died a peaceful death—an encouragement to all to trust in God, and have everlasting strength.

She has left numerous descendants, among whom is her grand son, Rev. C. S. Brown, of Upper Lisle. Her funeral was attended by the writer, on the 30th, who discoursed, at her request, from Isaiah lx: 19, 20, to a numerous congregation of mourners and sympathising friends, assembled in the Universalist meeting-house in New Hartford.

A. B. GROSH.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within four months; $2.00 if not paid within four months; or $2.50 if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis; and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞To City subscribers who receive their papers by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00 if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME X. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1839. NUMBER 7.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Utica, January 18, 1839.

Dear Brother:—At a late meeting of the Trustees of the First Universalist Society of this city, the undersigned were appointed a committee to solicit a copy of your inaugural discourse, delivered before said society, for publication.—And the committee being satisfied that its publication would not only be highly gratifying to the society, but beneficial to the public generally, take the greatest pleasure in the performance of their duty, and beg leave to express their earnest desire that the request may be granted. Affectionately yours,

A. WHITE,
W. D. BROADWAY,
O. HUTCHINSON, } Committee.

Rev. T. D. COOK,
Pastor of the First Universalist Society, Utica.

ANSWER.

Dear Brethren—Your note, requesting a copy of my Inaugural Sermon, for publication, is now before me. It gives me pleasure to be able to comply with your solicitations in behalf of the Trustees of the First Universalist Society in Utica.

One word—This discourse was designed "for the meridian of" Utica. It is not therefore probable that it will be regarded in the same light abroad, as it was here. This, however, is the business of those who have requested its publication. A copy is at your disposal. That it may do good is the prayer of,

Your servant, T. D. COOK.

A. White, W. D. Broadway, O. Hutchinson, Committee, etc.

INAUGURAL SERMON.

Delivered before the First Universalist Society in the city of Utica, N. Y., January 6th, P. M., 1839.

BY REV. T. D. COOK.

"I ask, therefore, for what intent ye have sent for me?"—ACTS x: 29.

Curiosity often begets a desire in the human heart to know something of the future—to raise the veil, woven by the hand of mercy, that shuts out from our view the circumstances which will attend our course in subsequent life—that we may see whether weal or wo awaits us. It induces a desire for the possession of prescience, and mourns over its inability to confer the power. Particularly is this the case, when we enter upon any new undertaking, the result of which is extremely doubtful. It is then that Hope, the blessed guardian of our peace, whispers in strains of encouragement, to our half despairing minds—paints bright scenes of success, beyond all rational expectation, on the page of the future, for the feasting of our mental vision, and bids us in all our weakness, march forward to eminence and respectability.

But her charm is soon broken. Doubts arise; and the course marked out for us to pursue, is overhung with dismal clouds, portending evil, disappointment, and blighted expectations! How dark the way! Our indiscretions, which flow from ignorance and inexperience, begin to alienate the affections of our professed friends from us; tired of our unprofitable labors, they turn from us in disgust, pitying our weakness, or reproaching us with our folly and presumption; and we are left to mourn, in loneliness, over the wreck of our sanguine hopes, and ardent desires. Prudent fear suggests many queries, well calculated to excite the most painful apprehensions in our souls: among the many servants of our Master, how few have proved themselves successful ministers of his Gospel? How many have been left to mourn over the cold ingratitude of nominal friends, who, regardless of the dictates of that charity which thinketh no evil, have proved themselves enemies to the cause of Christ—traitors to the interests of his faithful servants, and a curse to kindred humanity! How many, who have well nigh immolated themselves on the altar of improvement—who have spent days of toil, and sleepless nights of reflection, in searching for the hidden stores of knowledge, have been forsaken, and thrust out of the field—forced to lay down their sickles, in full view of the whitening harvest, merely because the endowments of nature were imperfect; or because, in the estimation of some erring soul, whose boasted greatness was the God of his affections, their physical organization was measurably defective! their speech was not music!

But enough.—Fears and doubts, if indulged in the absence of the soothing influence of hope, might distract the mind of the naturally diffident; discourage all ambition, and thus prove a serious injury, not only to themselves, but also to the world of mankind. For records of the past furnish sufficient evidence of the fact, that many who might have proved themselves the benefactors of the world, both statesmen and philosophers, have, in obedience to the voice of native diffidence, shrunk from the public gaze with an instinctive dread; have refused to let their light shine where it was needed, because the saddening and sickening influence of doubt and fear, (doubt of success, and fear of disappointment,) stifled the aspirations of a laudable ambition.

While, then, it is certain that curiosity, which prompts us to try to look into the affairs of futurity—to discover the result of any new undertaking—can not be gratified, we will endeavor to be content—to let hope encourage, and doubt and fear moderate our expectations of success, in the important experiment which we are about to make.

These remarks have been made for the purpose of acquainting the hearer, in a gentle manner, with the feelings of the speaker, as he addresses this society, for the first time, in capacity of pastor. By them, the former will learn that the latter has some, nay, considerable anxiety about his future course in the ministry of Jesus Christ—whether or not, success will crown the efforts which he designs to make, for the upbuilding of that sacred cause, whose interests, on the altar of God, he has sworn to defend. And while hope promises success, his fears excite the most gloomy forebodings. But having accepted an invitation to become the pastor of this society—an invitation with which, through its proper organs, the Trustees, I have been honored—having taken my leave of a society to which I have ministered in all faithfulness during the past year, and one, too, that is endeared to me by ten thousand pleasing recollections—having, in short, come at your "call," I may be allowed to repeat the language of my text, and say, "I ask, therefore, for what intent ye have sent for me?"

To answer this question, it is not deemed necessary on the present occasion, to consider the connexion in which it is found. For, although we might draw an instructive lesson from the context, we have another course in our minds to pursue.

As a religious society, professing the doctrine, and to be the followers of our Lord Jesus Christ, I should do injustice to your motives—the motives which induced you to send for me—to suppose that you desire me, now that I am among you, to become an instrument in your hands, by which you can disseminate the seeds of vice and error in the world. Therefore, in reply to the inquiry contained in the text, I must be allowed to answer negatively, and to particularize:

1st. You did not send for me to encourage theft. You will not, therefore, expect that this vice will be passed over in silence by me; and that the thief will sit under the sound of my voice, without being reminded of his iniquity, and requested to flee from it—flee to Jesus as the only hope of his salvation. Nor,

2d. To countenance slander. Of course, you will not be disappointed, if the slanderer, whose tongue is "set on fire of hell," is not permitted to pass without an assurance from the Word of God, that his iniquitous course will meet with just and merited retribution. This fact, you will confidently expect to be impressed upon the mind of every hearer; and that those who would blow the poisonous breath of slander, on the fair and untarnished reputation of a neighbor, will be admonished to pause, and to reflect upon the ungodly cruelty which they are about to exercise towards a fellow-being—upon the heinous crime they are about to commit.

3d. Lying. This practice, Christians have always regarded as unfavorable to the welfare of community; tending to destroy our confidence in one another; and to sever the holy ties of ardent and devoted friendship. They always speak of the liar as an unsafe and unprofitable companion, whose pretended friendship is generally an evil; whose words, whether true or not, fall upon the ear of his acquaintance like falsehoods, and whose lips corrupt every truth which his heart prompts him to speak. They are bound to look upon his positive assertions with suspicion; his oaths with doubt, and upon himself as a nuisance, a pest, an absolute curse to society. This being his character, you, as a body of Christians, have not sent for me, for the purpose of encouraging the liar in the evil of his ways, through my services.

4th. Fraud. This seems the eldest child of falsehood—of course the grandchild of the devil, who is the father of lies. You will, therefore, undoubtedly expect me to urge all who would enjoy the peaceful quiet of a clear conscience, and the approval of a high and holy Heaven, to deal justly—to render to every man his due—to do unto others as they would have others do to them, in an exchange of circumstances: for you did not send for me, to induce a spirit of fraud among men.

5th. Extortion. This is another name for the worst species of fraud. The heartless, soulless, graceless, and godless miser, who seeks opportunities to grind the face of the poor; to devour widows' houses, and wrest the last penny from the skeleton hand of the ragged, cheerless child of poverty, cails loudly, by his actions, for admonitions sanctioned by the voice of God; and needs to be reminded of what St. James calls "pure religion, and undefiled." I can not, therefore, for a moment, suppose that you intended to have me regard this crime with indifference, or suffer those who are guilty of it, to pass unreproved, when you sent for me.

6th. Nor did you send for me, expecting that I would, in my public or private labors, look upon profanity with any degree of allowance. If I have rightly apprehended its true character, profanity is one of the lowest, meanest, most debasing, degrading, abject, and, withal, the most daring vice, that appears on this dark catalogue; or that is indulged in, by the helpless pensioners upon God's bounty. It may not be the worst—the most deleterious in its effects upon the interests of community; but as it is without one redeeming quality; without any thing in itself, to commend it to our favor, as it affords no enjoyment, neither mental nor physical, moral nor religious, I am left to conclude that you would have it opposed by me, with all my feeble powers, as the most disgusting and foolish of all vices.

7th. You all despise Intemperance—as Christians, it can not be otherwise with you. Of course you will feel disappointed, if, in my labors with you, I do not set forth in a clear light, the train of evils which have flowed from this deadly fountain. Of these, you will expect me to enumerate, besides others, the following—disgrace, poverty, wretchedness, and pauperism, coming upon the inebriate himself; wives sighing, broken-hearted; daughters overwhelmed with shame, and sons mortified at beholding the dissipation of parents. Fathers, shedding the tears of bitter regret, over the degrading drunkenness of once promising children, and mothers, bedewing the midnight pillow with tears of maternal anguish, in view of the same hapless sight. These are some of the fruits of intemperance. You can not desire me to countenance this vice—a vice which tends to debase, corrupt, and blight the social principles of the heart; to enervate and blunt the moral and religious sensibilities of man; to injure his mental and physical constitution, and, worst of all, to lead him to the commission of many other crimes. It is a fruitful source of iniquity. It transforms affectionate husbands, into fiends—fathers into tyrants, and mothers into furies! It inflames the baser passions; induces quarrels and dissentions, and, sometimes, nerves the arm of the midnight assassin for deeds of wickedness and blood! This vice you will desire me to oppose; and may you not be disappointed.

Am I not justified, then, in supposing that you, as a society, did not send for me, with the intention of making me an instrument in your hands, by which you could extend the reign and influence of vice? I need not thus inquire. To suppose the contrary, would be extremely ungenerous.

Nor can I, without offering an indignity to charity, suppose, that you sent for me, for the intent that I should connive at the errors, which, in times past, have rendered the city of our God a waste, howling wilderness. As a denomination, we have labored faithfully and incessantly, to arrest the progress of these pernicious errors in the church of Christ. Among the most prominent of these, we mention the following:

1st. We have attempted to expose the horrid deformity of that now almost exploded doctrine, election and reprobation. A few years only have rolled away, since this doctrine, in all its original purity and loveliness, was proclaimed to the world, to convince mankind of the exceeding goodness of God, and of his impartial love; to comfort the mourner, and to solace the distressed! And strange as it may now appear, thousands then, (so blinded were they by superstition!) acknowledged it a gracious revelation from God; a transcript of his loveliness and, as such, worthy of all acceptation! But it is seeking the shades of oblivion now; and in obedience to your desires, I shall labor to give it a proper direction.

2d. The denomination to which we have the honor to belong, has opposed the doctrine which teaches that our eternal destiny hangs suspended on our frailties and imperfections. For that denomination could never believe, that the Fountain of love would put into the hand of one of his offspring, an instrument, by which, he would bring upon himself endless wretchedness. And as members of this respectable body, you can not desire me to lend my aid to the upbuilding of this error—for this, you did not send for me.

3d. The doctrine of total depravity, which has long been held sacred; but which is a libel upon the character of the human species; and also upon that of the Author of all intelligences, has been ranked by us among the errors of the Christian world. Should I maintain this error, I should do an injury to the cause of my Master; and defeat the object you had in view, in sending for me.

4th. The doctrine which asserts the existence of a semi-omnipotent and demi-omniscient being, a personal devil, who was once an angel of light—prime minister of God in the courts above—expelled for exciting jealousies among his associate spirits, and rebellion to the government of God, has been duly opposed by us, as a denomination, as a sentiment which finds its greatest support in the wild imagination of the poet, and is perpetuated in the Christian church by the power of tradition.

5th. The noted doctrine of the Trinity, which has been the cause of so much bloodshed in the world, and which may date its origin at the council of Nice, we have opposed. This doctrine contradicts the plainest teachings of common sense—asserts that three are one, and one is three—a mystery—an absurdity, which defies the greatest stretch of intellect to solve, and is as unscriptural as it is absurd.

6th. The doctrine of vicarious atonement, is one that stands intimately connected with that of the Trinity, and is equally as repulsive in its aspect, to reason and humanity. It asserts that Adam sinned—by so doing, exposed himself, and all his unborn posterity to ceaseless torture; and on them this dreadful doom was about to be executed, when God the Son, was placed in their stead; and on him, the inflexible justice of God, the Father, sought satisfaction; found it there, and thus the guilty were delivered from deserved punishment! Horrible as appears this error, it is supported by most of the Protestant churches, in the 19th century.

7th. As Universalists, we have labored faithfully to oppose the unmerciful doctrine of endless misery; to show that it had no foundation in the Word of God; that it stands condemned by the voice of universal nature; by the fervent prayers of saints; by all the better principles of the human heart; by the promises and oath of Jehovah; by all his acknowledged attributes; by the mission of Jesus, and all his teachings. We have regarded it as one of the most fruitful sources of infidelity; as the foulest stain ever cast upon the Sacred pages; as a dogma which saps the foundation of our confidence in God; that begets a spirit of cruelty, malignity and revenge, in the bosom of man; and, finally, that devils alone can wish to be true.

Charity and brotherly-love, forbid that I should suppose you sent for me, intending at the same time, to have me give countenance to these errors, which, together, form a compound, that has, by some, been dignified with the inappropriate appellation, Orthodoxy!

Nor can I believe that you were unwise enough, to request me to settle among you, merely for the purpose of exposing these errors. You are too well acquainted with man's religious character, to imagine that he is converted, baptized into the spirit of Christ, as soon as he is made to feel his inability to defend his false opinions. Of this, he may be made sensible, without being induced to take one step towards the kingdom of heaven.

Allow me, then, to anticipate your reply to the interrogation contained in the text—"I ask, therefore, for what intent ye have sent for me?" and to say affirmatively,

1st. We sent for you, expecting that you would, for the gratification of our religious desires, set forth the character of God in a proper light, free from all those foul aspersions, which error and superstition have heaped upon it—that you would declare him to be a just God and a Saviour—a Father and Friend of all intelligences—that you would dwell with rapture upon that heavenly theme, his boundless, changeless, and immortal love—a theme on which all the heavenly host could exhaust their divine eloquence.

If this was your object in sending for me, I trust I shall not disappoint you; for I delight to dwell on the character of Him, in whom "we live, and move, and have our being." In contemplating his love, manifested to us in the gift of our existence—in the innumerable blessings, which, by his bountiful hand, are made to surround us; in the gift of his only begotten Son, our Saviour, and in our prospective redemption from sin, corruption, and all moral defilement, yes, in contemplating these glorious exhibitions of my Father's love, I have often wandered away from earth to heaven—my happified spirit has fancied herself clothed with immortality—a fit companion for angels and archangels, seraphs, and the spirits of the just made perfect; and in their midst, chanting the loud anthems of renovating and redeeming grace.

Nor have I neglected to speak of the different modifications of infinite Love. The wisdom, power, mercy, goodness, and justice of God, have all been matter of my public communications.—Deriving all their excellency from the essence of the divine nature, which is Love, each of these distinguishing attributes of the Deity, has been held forth by me, as a subject of religious exultation—as an element of that efficient grace, which will ultimately confer "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away," upon all the wanting children of humanity. These attributes have been considered. And I here take the opportunity to repel the charge, which is so frequently preferred against the denomination to which I have the honor to belong, as far as this charge concerns myself—viz., that its public advocates lull their hearers into a carnal security, by singing so often to them the charming song of Jehovah's love, while they refuse to speak of his other attributes, especially the attribute of justice. This charge is as false as the design of our disingenuous opposers is unfriendly. True, we declare that "God is love;" but we do not forget that he is just. We have confidence in his love, but our joy would not be "unspeakable and full of glory," did we not behold all his attributes, like so many guardian angels, hovering over us to shield us from all harm.

2d. You would reply to the query of your servant, propounded in the words of the text; we sent for you, for the intent, that you might preach to us Jesus Christ our Lord, who was "the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person"—that you might speak of him, as "the Christ, the Son of the living God"—as the triumphant Conqueror of sin, death and the devil—as the blessed "Saviour of the world"—as "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world"—as "the Lord of life and glory"—as "the Author and Finisher of our faith"—as the great "High Priest of our profession"—as "the second Adam," in whom all that died in the first, shall "be made alive"—as "the only name given under heaven among men, whereby we can be saved"—as the "faithful and true Witness"—as "the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls," and as the Beloved of the Father.

In this, we trust your object will be attained, in our services. For under all these holy characters, in times past, have we held forth to the admiring gaze of our hearers, the true Messiah—the "Shiloh"—"the Sun of Righteousness"—"the Prince of peace," and "the Saviour of sinners." We have pointed to him as he was wrapped in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger—as he was disputing in the temple, with doctors, at the tender age of twelve years—as he was baptized by John in Jordan—as he ascended from the rolling flood, and received the gift of the Holy Spirit, which, dove-like, rested upon him. We have traced with sacred awe, the interesting and instructive events of his life. In our minds, we have beheld him on the sacred mount, opening his hallowed lips in strains of heaven-born eloquence; and in that memorable sermon, which must stand as an everlasting monument to his memory, imparting the richest instruction to the children of men. We have seen him with Peter, James, and John, on the mount of transfiguration, with light, celestial light and glory, beaming in divine effulgence, from his heavenly countenance. We have followed him to the mansions of sorrow, and the humble dwellings of wretchedness and despair—at home alike in each—and beheld him there approaching the couch of disease, to plant the rose of health on the pallid cheek—to impart vigor to the feeble limbs, and strength to the paralyzed nerves. We have seen him calling the sleeping tenant of the tomb, from his cold and cheerless bed, to life and activity, by the omnific energies of his word; the morally dead from the graves of iniquity; the mourner from the dark scenes of wo, and the errorist from the dismal shades of a bewildering superstition. In every period of his active life, we have discovered an entire devotion of all his capacious faculties, to the interests of mankind. He "went about doing good." We have traced his footsteps from scenes of usefulness to the judgment hall of Pilate; heard his unjust and cruel sentence there; seen him buffeted, spit upon, derided, scoffed at, and finally, led to execution on Calvary! Here, we have seen him nailed to the cross—suspended by malignant foes, between heaven and earth, as unfit for either, and deserted by his timorous friends. We have heard his dying agonies mocked, while his voice, mingled with the execrations of his enemies, on the wings of prayer was ascending to the skies, laden with the humble petition, breathed forth in the accents of love, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!" I leave you to judge of my future course, by this brief outline of my past labors, as far as the preaching of Jesus is concerned.

3d. If you sent for me to proclaim unto you the Scriptural doctrine of rewards and punishments, as I trust you did, you will not complain if I state, in few words, my views of this doctrine—views which I have published to the world.

I have pointed the minds of my hearers to the "glory, honor, and peace," which God will certainly award to every man that doeth good; and to the "tribulation and anguish," the "indignation and wrath," which he will render "to every one that doeth evil," as sufficient inducements for them to walk in wisdom's ways, and to avoid the dark and dangerous paths of vice. In the language of the sacred oracles, I have declared, that "there is no peace to the wicked,' that 'though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished"—that they are "like the troubled sea, when its waters can not rest"—that God "will by no means clear the guilty"—that "he that knoweth his Master's will, and doeth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes"—that "the wages of sin is death," etc. To prove that these declarations of Scripture are truisms, I have appealed to facts—to the experience of mankind in all past ages.

Nor, on the other hand, have we been wanting in evidence to prove that the righteous, as well as the wicked and the sinner, are "recompensed in the earth"—that "wisdom is justified of her children"—that all her "paths are pleasantness and peace"—that "great peace have they that love the law" of God, etc. Nor is the voice of experience silent on this subject. It testifies that peace—substantial and enduring peace, is found only in the faithful discharge of every incumbent duty.

These, then, are the views which we have cherished and published to the world, concerning the doctrine in question—other than these we find not in the Record. We have never been able to learn, that God has promised any of his frail and erring children, immortal felicity, as a reward for their imperfect virtues here; or threatened them with endless wretchedness and wo, as a punishment, for their derelictions of duty.

4th. You will expect me to preach—for this was your intention when you sent for me—the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead—to prove that death is not an eternal sleep; but rather the "gate to endless joy"—that "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ, shall all be made alive"—that when "the earthly house of this tabernacle is dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens"—that though the dead is sown in corruption, dishonor, and weakness, a natural body; it will be raised in incorruption, glory and power, a spiritual body. And also,

5th. The doctrine of "the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."—This you designed me to preach; to point the mind to that period in the economy of divine grace, when sin shall be finished, transgression be brought to an end, tears be wiped from off all faces, and "every creature in heaven, on earth, under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, be heard saying, glory and honor, praise and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."

To meet these just and reasonable expectations, on the part of this society—to oppose every error in theory and in practice—to rebuke, reprove, and admonish, with all long-suffering, and to proclaim the truth as it is in Jesus—to "vindicate the ways of God to man"—the divine authenticity of his Word, and the honor of his divine government, will be my only object while among you—will be my meat and my drink.

To effect this, and render my services acceptable to you, as well as profitable, I shall need your counsels and your advice. More than once, since I pledged myself to become your servant, to take the pastoral care of your society, has my diffidence gained an unwarrantable ascendency over my ambition, and vetoed our negotiations! Even now, to many of you, it may appear like the height of presumption and folly in me, young and inexperienced as I am, to think of success in an experiment like this—to follow, in the pastoral duties of your society, such brethren as my worthy predecessors, whose justly appreciated talents, zeal, and piety, have secured for them a wide spreading popularity abroad, and a seeming idolatrous veneration at home! But however chimerical this step may appear in your servant, he can assure you that it is not the offspring of a blind conceit, which some may imagine he cherishes. An invitation from this respectable society, was unsought and unexpected by him. And when it was received, it was duly considered, as were also the personal solicitations of some cherished friends, before it was accepted. Since that time, his reflections have not always been of the most cheering character. A want of success has frequently met his mental gaze as he looked forward to the time set for his removal here. That time has come. He is before you; and God grant that his labors may be serviceable to you—that they may be the means, under the great Head of the church, of adding to your numbers; to your Christian virtues, and to your influence as a religious body!

To this end, he asks, not only your advice and your counsel, but he asks, what he hopes to receive—your co-operation in the great work of extending a knowledge of the Gospel. Do you ask how you can best co-operate with him in promoting the interests of truth, in this quarter of our Zion? He replies:

1st. Let every one, that would be serviceable to their fellow-beings, in this way, enter immediately upon the work of self-examination, to see whether he or she is guilty of any habitual vice—any sin of omission, or of commission, which tends to lessen his or her moral influence in community, and to disqualify the soul for religious enjoyment. Depend upon it, my hearers, a Christian deportment is the great moral lever, by which you must overturn the empire of error and superstition, and convert the world to God. As long as you refuse to exhibit this, so long will you do dis-service to Christianity, by professing it. It were better for you, for religion, and for the world, not to make any Christian profession, than to name the name of Christ and not depart from iniquity.

Allow, me, then, to urge upon your minds the necessity of self-examination. See whether your conduct comports with your profession. This seems a proper time to commence this task. A new year has just commenced. A new era in the history of your society now dawns upon you. And now, I ardently desire you to "shine as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life." "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation." And let it not pass unimproved.

2d. You can assist in disseminating the seeds of truth, by being punctual in your attendance upon the services of the sanctuary. You did not send for me to preach to a congregation of senseless, and inanimate worshippers—an audience of vacant seats! And you can spare me the necessity of performing this painful task, by repairing, on the Sabbath, to the house of God, to hear the Gospel of his grace dispensed.

If you would discourage your servant, and defeat the object for which you sent for him, desert this temple at the time appointed for public worship. Let every trifling circumstance—cold, heat, wind, or weeping skies, be framed into an excuse, and urged as a sufficient justification of your neglect—the neglect of a known, important duty—of a duty which you owe to God and man, and your desires will be realized. But if, on the other hand, you would aid him in the performance of his arduous task, with a soul filled with Christian love, meet him at "the consecrated hour," and listen to his instructions.

It is sometimes the case, that societies are composed, in part, of individuals whose devotional feelings can seldom be called into exercise, until after the sun has smiled on earth, in his meridian glory, or sunk, in majestic splendor, to kiss the horizon of the distant West! But, we trust, this society has connected with it, few afternoon or evening Christians—that we shall see its members on each returning Sabbath, offering their morning devotions to the Giver of all good.

3d. You can render yourself serviceable to the cause of Christ, by being "kindly affectioned one towards another, with brotherly love." Members of a religious society, like members of a family circle, should love one another—should cherish and foster those social principles of the heart, which God has implanted there, until soul is bound to soul, in the silken cords of Christian love—until the body compact presents a miniature representation of the society of the blessed above, free from discord and strife.

I have seen enough of society affairs, (though I have seen but little,) to convince me that dissensions and prosperity are seldom, if ever, found together. And it is not unfrequently the case, that even among Universalists, society dissensions originate in the most trifling circumstances; and, because the members are deficient in brotherly love, they are kept up, until the funeral obsequies of such unfortunate societies are performed! The little, petty feuds of the choir, in the country, sometimes end in a society commotion. One strives for the head—a second denies this right, and charges the first with vain presumption; while a third thinks both of the former have mistaken the place which their respective merits would assign them, and, as if entitled to this imaginary honor, seeks to be number one. What next? Why, number one is number one, indeed; for the disappointed aspirants, chagrined with defeat, desert the disagreeable company of their conqueror, and seek repose in another department of the congregation, or in the gloomy shades of Partialism!!

Thus the choir is ruined, and a spirit of ill-will begins to diffuse itself abroad among those with whom the belligerents stand connected in the social relations of life. But, we humbly trust, we fervently pray God, that here, in the city, the Eden of central New-York, where Universalism should be loved, we may not see an exhibition of such disgusting folly!

By cherishing the spirit of "brotherly love," you will become more intimately acquainted with each other.—You will not meet here from time to time, to exchange cold, formal compliments with each other; or, worse still, bow with an indifference that would cause misanthropy to blush, and then return to your respective homes. God forbid that Universalists should ever become living icebergs, for the sake of being called polite! Let them bow to and greet each other, as the truly pious sing, "with the spirit and with the understanding." Such politeness I admire, and I am always happiest when I am in the company of those who exhibit it—of those who love God, love truth, love holiness, and love one another—who are Christians.

May I confidently look for what I have here requested of this society? May I look for your counsel and your advice? May I rely upon you, as co-operators with me, to build up the cause of truth in this quarter of our Master's vineyard? Can I now have the satisfaction of believing, that you will all enter immediately upon the work of self-examination, to the end that you may all conform your lives to the requirements of the Gospel? that you will be punctual attendants on the services of the sanctuary? and that you will become "kindly affectioned one towards another with brotherly love"? Let me have the assurance that you will thus "strive together" with me, "for the faith of the Gospel," and I shall pursue the arduous task before me, with cheerfulness and delight.

But I weary your patience.—Praying almighty God to smile propitiously upon the connexion now formed between us, as pastor and people; that he may render it as lasting as it is useful; guide us in the pathway of duty; enable us to discharge with fidelity, the mutual obligations which, in future, we shall owe to each other, I submit the foregoing remarks for your prayerful consideration. AMEN.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THOUGHTS.

How dark, how drear the grave! I stand upon its verge! In it I see the iron chains of death, but they are broken! I behold its massive bars and ponderous bolts, but they are shivered. The spoiler of death has been there. He has broken its bands, subdued its power, and risen triumphant from the tomb. And shall I fear to follow him there? Ah no! it can not contain me long. At that bright morn, when the voice of God shall wake the mighty dead, then shall the Prince of Life, again burst the dark portals of the tomb, and set its slumbering captives free. Then shall a ransomed world go forth, forever free from death's chilling grasp, to bask in the sunshine of eternal glory. Then shall hearts, once in sin and error lost, shout the Redeemer's praise in strains that never die. From empires once in heathen darkness groping, shall go up the triumphant song—"O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

What bright visions of glory are these! What shining hopes and prospects do I see! The veil has been removed. The light of immortality is beaming upon me. By faith I scan the golden plains of eternal bliss. O let nought in this dark world deprive me of this hope—the hope of immortality. To it, prophets and apostles have testified, and by Calvary's bright Conqueror has it been confirmed. O, then, ever let me live a life like his, ever let me walk in virtue's path; and when I am gone—when I am laid in the dark grave—when the cold sod shall cover my ashes, let me leave behind a character, pure and unspotted with sin, like unto that of the glorious Son of God.

Richmond, Va. A. F.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

CHARITY.

Charity, as used in the Scriptures, is synonymous with love, and is translated from the same original word. Many modern people have an idea, that charity consists in bestowing, to the needy, those blessings of a bountiful Providence, of which they have been made the partakers.—This is a wrong idea, and an abuse of the term. Charity is the moving principle to action, and the act of benevolence—in bestowing to the necessities of the needy—is the effect. This is the fruit of charity. It must be obvious to every one, that unless the giver is actuated by love, (charity,) toward the receiver of his gifts, he would not bestow them; because he would not consider him an object of charity; or otherwise, he would have no disposition to give, even if he considered him needy.

Mankind always act from motive, and that motive has its cause and design. Its cause may be either good or bad, and its design, or object, will be the same as the cause which produced it.—Hatred, or dislike, will originate a desire to injure, and in accordance with this desire, will be the action. The desire to benefit will not be there, and the consequence is, an incapability to just action. On the other hand, love or respect, will make the mind desirous of promoting the benefit and prosperity of its object; and the consequence will be, that all its efforts will be directed to that end. It will be impossible to injure knowingly, because the desire to injure is not cherished.

Charity desires the welfare of enemies. It countenances no envious feelings towards any one. Its principles are none other, than those of love to God and man; and this principle will remain, when "tongues shall cease, and knowledge shall vanish away." It is an every-day robe, and one that will not "wax old," but will always appear new. It is a garment, which, "the more 'tis worn, the more 'twill shine." It teaches us to share in the joys and sorrows of others; "to rejoice with those who rejoice, and to weep with those who weep; to be kind and affectionate one to another, and to please every one his neighbor for his good." In few words, it is the inseparable companion of all those hopes and joys, which lighten the pathway of man through this world of sorrow, and point him to that haven of immortal felicity above. It dispels those fears and griefs, which would make us "go mourning all our days," and raises us from degradation and misery, to that station which nature, and nature's God designed us to occupy. It sheds the light of heaven around us, fills our souls with songs of praise and thanksgiving, and moves our lips to speak them. It assimilates man to his Maker, thereby enabling him to enjoy through faith those promises, whose fulfilment will invigorate him when he shall know, by participation, the joys of that upper and better world, where sin and sorrow can never blast his songs of triumph over death, nor disturb his praises to him who raised him to the joys of immortality. It will make him kind and forgiving—will cause him in his prosperity to remember the poor, and induce him to dispense blessings around him, in imitation of his Father in heaven, "who maketh his sun to shine on the evil and on the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust." S. J.

Queensbury, N. Y.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SHORT SERMONS—NO. II.

BY A LAY PREACHER.

"As we said before, so say I now again, if any man preach any other Gospel unto you than that ye had received, let him be accursed." GALATIANS i: 9.

This text presents to the mind the following subjects of inquiry—First, What was the Gospel which Paul preached? and, Second, From what authority did he preach it?

There is now, and has been ever since the days of the apostles, a great dispute about what the Gospel is. Mankind have appeared unwilling to take the Word of God as evidence to prove the fact, in this case; but have gone about to frame evidence that would better comport with their own notions on this subject. It appears to me, nevertheless, that a candid inquirer after truth, would be much more likely to find it, in this case, by going to the Word of God, than by applying to the creeds of men. The evidence taken from the latter source, would be much more likely to be mixed up with contradictions, and to partake of the selfishness natural to earthly-mindedness, than to a congeniality with the Holy Scriptures. Now, if God be God, perfect in wisdom and goodness, there can be no reason to doubt his promises on this or any other subject; and, therefore, what we get from Him, may be relied upon with safety. What, then, do we obtain from God, on this subject? The first promise which we find applying to the case, is, that the "seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head"—that is, that the carnal-mindedness of man, should be crushed and destroyed. The next promise relating to this case, God makes to Abram, Gen. xii: 3—"That in him all the families of the earth should be blessed." And it would appear, too, that God intended that Abraham should not forget it, or misunderstand it, for He reiterates the promise to him twice, Gen. xviii: 18, and xxii: 18. And to keep it fresh in the minds of the Patriarchs, he repeats it to Isaac and Jacob, Gen. xxvi: 4, and xxviii: 14. That these promises allude to the Gospel, we shall now prove by the testimony of St. Paul. "And the Scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the Heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel to Abraham, saying, in thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."—Gal. iii: 8. Now, if any should say that these promises alluded only to those nations that existed during the life-times of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, or that they alluded to temporal blessings, in this world, I must be pardoned if I think their minds to be very obtuse, and their understandings very much in the dark. And those who do object to the nature and extent of these promised blessings, will be very apt to lead the candid to believe that they measure the goodness of God by their own feelings and limited views of benevolence.

In these promises, then, we discover the foundation upon which the Gospel stands. But what is it in reality? Let an angel from heaven answer the question: "And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." Luke ii: 10. If the creed of the Calvinists, which I quoted in my first sermon, be true, then the declaration of the angel of the Lord to the shepherds on the plain of Bethlehem, can not be true, because, if a certain number of the human family were, from all eternity, decreed to everlasting destruction, these tidings, proclaimed by the angel, could not be good news to such. It is not possible, in the nature of things, that any news relating to futurity, could administer consolation to these poor, eternity-condemned wretches! It must be astonishing to every candid reflecting mind, how such a notion could ever get into the head of a rational being.

This awful result to a part of mankind, is said, however, to have been brought to light by a discovery of the secret will of God. If this were the case, there must have been treachery against the Almighty, from some quarter; for I do not believe that the devil himself would like to be presented in such a light, to the wondering gaze of his subjects, (if he had any.) But when, and to whom, did God let this secret out, in which his confidence has been so greatly betrayed? Surely not to any of the ancient prophets, saints, or apostles. Nor do I believe that Jesus Christ, the beloved Son of God, knew any thing about it, for his candor and moral conduct was such, that there can be no ground to suspect him of hypocrisy. It must be, then, that John Calvin was the saint, who obtained this secret from his God. This supposition is strengthened by the conduct of this man, who, to imitate the examples of his God, burnt Servetus to ashes!

I again inquire, What is the Gospel? The answer may be summed up in a word, viz., LOVE—love in God for the children of his creation. If God ever created a rational being that he did not love, how can it be said that he is perfect in this attribute? The Scripture says, "God is love"—and in imitation of it, all are commanded to "love God." Is God a weak Sovereign, to give out commands that will never be obeyed? Or is God a capricious Sovereign, giving out commands which he knew would not be obeyed, that he might have an excuse for punishing a part of his children? Neither of these suppositions can apply to Deity. It would destroy his attributes of wisdom and goodness. But if God be such a tyrant as some represent him to be, it would, indeed, be impossible to love him. Love can never emanate from fear, alone. It is natural that we should fear to offend the Being we love; but we must first love such a being, before fear can naturally be conjoined with it. There would be a difference, too, in this kind of fear. One is voluntary, and the other arises through compulsion. One is connected with love, while the other is connected with hate. If, then, we obey a sovereign through fear alone, (which must be the case if this sovereign be a tyrant,) it can not be called love, such as the Scriptures require; because it comes from the head, and not from the heart. It would be a "galling yoke, and a heavy burthen." Love begets love; and it is easy and natural to love a sovereign Being whom we know "first loved us." And this is the "easy yoke, and light burthen," which our Saviour invites us to take. But,

Second: From whom did Paul receive this Gospel? The question is answered by Paul himself, in the 12th verse of the same chapter from which I have taken my text. He says that he did not get it from man, "but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." And if any are ignorant of the time, mode, and manner of his obtaining it, let them turn to the 9th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, and they will find the whole account.

But the question may be asked, did Paul believe the Gospel to be such as I have represented it to be? With me there is no doubt, and I think it can be proved from many, very many passages in the Acts of the Apostles, and from the Epistles of Paul. But as I am bound to be brief, I shall only select from the second chapter of Paul's first Epistle to Timothy. "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." In the above, we have, in the first place, the will of God, that all shall be saved; and in the second place, that Jesus gave himself for all; and unless some one can prove to me some method by which the will of God can be frustrated, and that it is not true that Jesus Christ died for all, I shall, for one, hold fast to that Gospel "preached by all God's holy prophets since the world began."

Sheshequin, Pa. J. K.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE HAPPY FAMILY.

A Juvenile Tale.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

CHAPTER V.

The ramble—interesting conversation—important resolutions—conclusion.

A short time after their journey, George and Adeline obtained permission of their parents, to take a ramble through the shady groves and in the green fields. They set out in the cool of the morning, and walked along by the side of the lake nearly half a mile, stopping now and then to pluck a flower, or to listen to the song of some bird of the wild-wood, or to gaze out upon the still waters before them, and watch the movements of the many little sails upon their bosom.

"What a pretty morning this is," said Adeline, as she and George were walking along hand in hand—"it is so cool, and so pleasant."

"I think we could not have had a better time for our walk," said George. "But hark! did you not hear that gun go off? Some naughty boy perhaps is shooting the pretty birds that sing so sweetly for us."

"Oh how cruel!" said Adeline. "I am sure I can not like any body that kills the pretty little birds."

"Father says it is very wicked;" returned George—"and I am sure I never should want to do any such thing."

"Charles Warren is always shooting the little red robins, and the sparrows. And it is very naughty in him to do so, isn't it George?—they never do us any harm."

"Yes:—and then he disobeys his father and mother, and swears, and tells wrong stories—father says he is a very bad boy."

"And his sister Mary is almost as bad as he is," said Adeline. "Mother told me she hoped I would never be like her."

"We ought not to be naughty children," returned George; "I am sure it would break our parents' hearts, if we were to act like Charles and Mary."

"And we never would be thought any thing of," said Adeline. "For my part, I mean to be always a good girl, that father and mother may always love me as they do now."

"And I," said George, "am determined never to kill the pretty little singing birds, nor lie, nor swear, as bad boys do. And then, when I get to be a man, all good people will respect me. So the little book said, that I read the other day."

George and Adeline had now rambled until they were tired, and their parents told them they must be gone but two hours; so they turned and walked towards home, conversing busily all the way back, and forming many good resolutions, as to their conduct through life.

We now pass over a number of years in the history of the happy family, and bring our tale to a close. George and Adeline continued to be good children. When they arrived at a suitable age, they were both sent to a very excellent school in the village of C——, where they learned very fast, and gained the love and good-will of their teachers, and their fellow-students. Mr. and Mrs. Norton are now both dead: they lived to a good old age, and then quietly fell asleep in the embraces of death. They did not fear to die. And if we live as they did, we shall not fear to die.—Death will come to us as > "A kind and gentle servant, who unlocks

> With noiseless hand, life's flower-encircled door,
> To show us those we love."

Adeline is the wife of a clergyman in one of our large cities, and is esteemed for her virtues, by a large circle of friends. George is now a member of Congress, and is universally esteemed for his goodness. He is great because he is good.

Young reader—Farewell!

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1839.

HEAVEN OUR HOME.

However much we may cherish this life; (and it is certainly a gift which demands our gratitude;) however fondly we may cling to the shattered fragments of time's [illegible] however we may love to linger, with the halo of memory's magic pencillings, around the scenes which have temporarily identified our hopes and joys with the frailties of earth; however vigorously the heart may send forth, from its warm fountain, the beating response, to the pleasing all tremendous recollection paints upon the vista of the past, or of gratitude for the pleasing sources of present enjoyment, there is one truth, which will follow or precede us, in all our joys, in all our hopes, in all our spiritual dreamings. This earth is not our abiding place.

There are those to whom this truth is extremely unwelcome. Their ambition is centered in the things that perish. The spiritual man is not suffered to raise its eye above the horizon of sensuality, lest it should discover the contrast between earthly and heavenly prospects. He feels that he lacks, but he heeds not what. Hence, he seeks to escape the "ringing sentence, thou shalt die," by rushing blindly into the feverish excitements of the present, leaving this truth to follow him [illegible] "dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." And follow him it will, until he shall prepare his heart to receive its friendly warnings, to investigate its nature, and to learn its duration. Until he shall pause in his career, listen to its teachings, and suffer himself to be guided by its universal sway. O, how many there are, who see the light of eternity beams in celestial beauty around them, know not that it affords one single ray for them!

Then again, to those who have been blinded by erroneous views of the government of our God, how painful is the thought. You may see it in the bitter scalding tears, which chase each other down their cheeks, in the [illegible] sigh, arising from them by the thought that they must part from those who are dear to them as the apple of their eye, and in the agonizing prayer, for the safety and salvation of those dear ones. My soul, come not thou into their secret. Let not the bitter cup of error be presented to my lips—free from the palsying influence of its loathsome waters, I can wait the mandate of my heavenly Father, and yield to the separation of body and spirit in peace.

It is clear, that the truth, that this earth is not our abiding place, should be constantly before us. And, I ask, is it not possible to contemplate this truth with joy?—God has endowed us with powers which can neither be satiated, nor their longings gratified with timely things; their flight can not be stopped short of eternity. They lift themselves above this earth-born tenement, and soar aloft into brighter regions, purer scenes, and loftier associations. They centre and concentrate in that which is imperishable. They emanate from unchangeable, boundless, and eternal love. Let these powers, then, have the supremacy over man, which belongs to them. Let them give character to his desires for all which is yet unattained. Let them guide him, by their gentle influence, into their proper sphere, and he will not turn from the contemplation of his eternal destiny. God will appear to him as a Father, who inhabiteth eternity. Heaven will seem to him like a home, the dwelling place of that Father.

Is there any thing repulsive in viewing the subject in this light? Can not the mind dwell upon it with delight—delight which flows from an unwavering confidence in him who appoints all things for good? Can we not endure a separation from the ties that connect us with earth, when we know that all which is pure, spiritual, and exalted, will follow us and be our companions in that "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens?"

Yes, there are associations, which, when viewing the unpourtrayed future in this manner, fling around us the light of hope, and chase away the pain of a last separation, by the assurance that we shall all meet again in heaven. We remember those who were dear to us, and the heart yearns to live over again the scenes of buoyant innocence, which flashed around our youthful pathway. But they have gone. Pa[illegible] on the current of [illegible]; disappeared in the dim distance whither we too are rapidly hastening. But have we utterly lost them? No. We shall meet them again, in that home which knows no parting. Youthfulness without its waywardness, pleasure without alloy, will there bloom to fade no more. Our friends will be there too. And the bliss of gratified hope will swell our souls with rapture. I am not disposed to agitate the question, "shall we know our friends in heaven?" but I believe that if we know our Redeemer in heaven, we shall also know the redeemed; and that if we know them, we shall recognize those, whose salvation was linked with our own.

And when affliction scatters the day-dreams of earthly happiness, and sorrow lays its heavy hand upon the spirit, and causes it to feel how dangerous it is to feed upon transitory things, how sweet it is to reflect that we have a home far beyond the power of sin and death.—A home where peace will be uninterrupted, and parting no more. Where God will be the visible object of our supreme and undisturbed adoration; and where saints and angels will join in the song of universal and impartial redemption.

Let the skeptic frown at the inroads which such a theory makes in the cold and comfortless delusion which he hugs to his bosom; let the bigot vent his valedictions upon us for disturbing the pleasure which fiend like, he enjoys, as he stands at a distance, and through the medium of selfishness, beholds his almost desolated, and solitary home of the future, while father and mother, brother and sister, are doomed to witness its doors closed upon them forever; but as for me, let me have the consolation of believing that I shall meet the purified [illegible] family of man, around the same throne, and listen to, and join in the same song, which shall be sung by the congregated millions of the universe, and I am prepared to yield my spirit at the mandate of my God, and depart to my home, my happy home. A. R. B

Br. WHISTON.—Several inquiries have been made whether Br. Whiston has left Cooperstown. No. He still remains in the pastoral charge of the society in that place. The mistake arose, probably, from reading in our paper that Br. Potter had removed to Cooperstown, and from forgetting that Br. P. could move there without Br. W.'s leaving. Br. Potter preaches at Sharon, and elsewhere in the vicinity of Cooperstown.

A. B. G.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAW OF KINDNESS....NO. III.

"Overcome evil with good."—Rom. xii: 21.

If we leave the Scriptures, and pore over the records of history and experience, we find the most illustrious examples to exhibit the influence of the law of kindness in opening the fountain of goodness in the heart. These instances are not mere anecdotes, the stale outbreakings of fallacy; but they are facts whose truth is beyond doubt. And, so little is the law of loving enemies practiced, that it becomes our duty to pile fact upon fact, until demonstration shall become so open and powerful, that to depart from it shall become blind and wilful resistance of truth. For, so sure as there is a God who rules in the universe, so sure as he has spoken to the world through the revelation of his will; so sure as Christ died for his foes, forgiving them the sin of his murder, so sure it is, that the law of kindness is the true governing principle between man and his fellows.

The first illustration to be presented under this head, is the case of the benevolent Howard. John Howard was born about the year 1727, in the village of Clapton, near London. From the year 1773 to 1790, the year in which he died, he spent his whole time in endeavoring to ameliorate the condition of prisoners of various characters. In this sublime employment, he chose to apply the fortune with which he was favored. And most nobly did he discharge his assumed duty. He personally visited and inspected nearly all the prisons and jails in England, Ireland and Scotland—and so well was he convinced that neglect, brutal treatment, filth and undue severity, only served to harden the heart of the offender, that, by his representations to government, a great reformation was effected in the houses of confinement and the treatment of prisoners. He visited the continent of Europe several times for the same object. He was the friend of the unfortunate. No matter how loathsome the dungeon or degraded and hardened its inhabitant, his voice of mercy was there heard, and his kindness was manifested, as the best means of subduing and winning the sinner—for his familiarity with, and his conduct towards victims of all degrees of wickedness, only served to convince him, that no person was so debased, or his feelings so callous, but that he could be reached and softened by kindness. Blows, chains, starvation and neglect, only turned the heart into iron, and froze the better feelings of human nature to their deepest fountain—but no sooner was the angel-voice of Howard heard, and his kindness felt, than the long-sealed feelings were opened, the dried-up sources of tears were filled, the waters of sorrow flowed, and the heart of sin became radiated with deep and undying love for his benevolent visiter. This kindness was the principle which ever actuated Howard; and so devoted was he to its dictates, and so earnest in the discharge of his God-like object, that he yielded up his life in Tartary, while on a tour of benevolence, where his bones now whiten to moulder into the dust of the grave.

John Howard constantly walked according to the law, "overcome evil with good." And, even if we leave out of the account the great blessings which accrued to others from his conduct, we find, in the respect and love which exists for his memory, how advantageous is the adoption of the divine law. For, wherever the name of John Howard is known, his memory is enshrined in the hearts and affections of thousands; while he is reverenced as one of those glorious stars in human life, who, in imitation of the "Saviour of the world," "went about doing good."

The next instance is that of Fenelon. Fenelon was a Roman Catholic, and Archbishop of Cambrai, in France. He was a man of the finest feelings, of the greatest benevolence, and he uniformly practiced the law, "overcome evil with good." He was kind and affable to the lowly, mild and courteous to the ignorant, philanthropic to the miserable, and ever gentle both to friend and foe. The consequence was, that he won all hearts. The peasantry loved him as their father—and long after his death, their tears would flow when they said, "there is the chair on which our good Archbishop used to sit in the midst of us; we shall see him no more!" His uniform mildness gained him respect and protection even from the foes of his country. His diocese was often the theatre of war—but the English, Germans and Dutch, even surpassed the inhabitants of Cambrai, in their veneration for him. At such times, he gathered the wretched in his palace, and entertained them—for his dwellings were safe, even when armies were burning towns around him. All loved him—and the reason was, he always walked according to the light of the principle, of overcoming evil with good.

The next illustration is that of Oberlin. John Frederic Oberlin was born in the city of Strasburgh, near the frontiers of France and Germany. At the age of 26, and in the year 1767, he became pastor of a parish in a region of country fifteen or twenty miles from Strasburg, whose inhabitants were semi-barbarians; their schools were nominal; many of their teachers could not read; the different villages could not communicate with each other from want of bridges and roads; their agriculture was of the rudest kind; while their language was almost unintelligible to refined ears. These evils were doubly entailed upon them by their invincible ignorance, the mother of superstition.

Among these people Oberlin settled; and his only means of defence, were, a heart overflowing with good will to them, and a disposition so cultivated in the school of Christ, as to constantly make the law, "overcome evil with good," his rule of action. And most nobly did those means serve him. When he exhibited a desire to make improvements among them, the people of his charge became enraged, and even waylaid him for his destruction. But, by throwing himself among them, unarmed and with a kind yet firm and collected manner, he disarmed their resentment. By uniformly pursuing a course of mild instruction, he obtained their confidence, until by his influence and example, they opened roads in succession between their villages and Strasburg, they reared more comfortable buildings, they adopted a better mode of cultivation, they built good school-houses, and obtained more experienced teachers. Very soon, by the directions of this extraordinary man, the barren wilderness began to smile with well cultivated fields, neat and convenient dwellings, while happiness entered every dwelling, and religion was found on every family altar.

All this change was accomplished by the law of kindness, connected with an ardent perseverance and a knowledge of human nature and its wants. And not only did he subdue all hearts around him, but his Christian conduct has obtained for him an honorable fame in all the nations where his name is known. When he died, which took place in 1826, the love of him was so universal and strong, that the inhabitants of the remotest village in his parish, though it rained in torents, did not fail to come and take the last look of their "dear father." His funeral procession was two miles in length; and so strongly had his benevolence and kindness penetrated all hearts, that tears flowed from both Catholic and Protestant eyes, while regret for his loss and respect for his memory, animated all minds alike.

The three instances introduced thus far, are from three denominations—Howard was a moderate Calvinist; Fenelon was a Roman Catholic; and Oberlin was, in belief, a Universalist. Yet, with one uniform law of kindness, they achieved the most splendid results—the prisoner was melted and subdued; the respect and protection of contending armies gained; and a semi-barbarous people changed into civilized inhabitants. Can any person, in view of these facts, doubt the efficacy of the divine precept, "love your enemies?"

G. W. M.

New Agents.—E. M. Fitch, P. M., Constantia—W. Holland, Mich.—James Bernard, Green River, Ills.

CHARITY.

Much has been said, and much has been written, about the essentials of Christianity. Sects have been proscribed, books burned, and individuals martyred, because, in the opinion of the dominant party, they denied, or possessed not, these essentials. Cities have been stormed—their houses torn down and plundered—their streets floated with the blood of their citizens—and their temples filled with the shrieks and agonizing cries of violated women and murdered orphans, because their ungodly enemies deemed them destitute of the essentials of Christianity. Bishops and churches have been anathematized with the most dreadful curses on their souls—individuals have been hunted with bloodhounds, by a soldiery more cruel than the brutes they employed, and dragged to tortures so vengeful and lingering that imagination can scarcely paint their horrors—provinces and countries have been desolated with fire and sword, and nations washed in rivers of blood—because the unhappy victims possessed not the essentials of Christianity, as held by their persecuting enemies.

Surely, then, it is an important inquiry, What are the essentials of Christianity? What can that be, the loss or absence of which, is deemed so great a demerit as to call down persecution, war, tortures and death in this life, and to merit unending, indescribable torments in the life to come?

Go to one, and he will tell you that the essential—the great essential of the Christian religion is an evidence of the soul renewed by divine and miraculous agency. Go to another, and he will talk of sins forgiven, and an evidence of acceptance with God. He has obtained a hope—he has got religion—he has, therefore, the essential of Christianity, and is secure of immortal bliss. Go to another, and he will tell you of a faith which is strong as adamant, and sound to the core—which believes all that should be believed, and rejects all that is false—and as salvation is by faith, he is sure of it, and therefore he possesses the great essential of Christianity. Another, believing that faith without works is dead, leads a moral life—is careful of all his ways, liberal to the poor, zealous in the church, and active in every good word and work—he is certain he possesses the great essential of the Christian religion. Another has great spiritual gifts—speaks only by divine inspiration—believes and learns by special revelation of God—sees visions, dreams dreams, and works wonders—predicts future events, and has divine ecstacies and trances—and is so happy that he can not bear that any one destitute of these qualifications should have any hopes even, of salvation here or hereafter. Surely—surely—this man, so highly blessed of God—so gifted—so distinguished above his fellows—surely he is possessed of the essentials of Christianity. And either or all of these, are willing to prove that they possess the very essential required. Let but any man in their power, dare to dispute their dicta—deny their perfection in Christian doctrine, practice, or grace, and how soon the strong power of their might will punish his presumptuous impiety.

And now, taking the text book of the Christian religion for our guide, let us see if these zealous professors of exclusive Christianity, possess what they claim. "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, (at the stake,) and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing. And now abideth faith, hope, and charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity."—1 Cor. 1-3, 13.

Here we see that not almsgiving, even—which is the common meaning of the word, charity—can profit a man, if he have not universal love.

Whatever, then, may be the other essentials of Christianity, this charity is one—and whatever may be their rank, this charity is the greatest. Without this, all the rest are vain—are absolutely nothing—with it, they are much, for charity is greatest. A. B. G.

IS CHRIST THE CAUSE OF SALVATION?

In reply to my exposures of his erroneous statements, and accusations of my motives and feelings on this subject, (contained in current vol., No. 3,) Br. Whittemore says, in the last Trumpet—

We have read the article from the pen of Br. Grosh, which appeared in the Magazine and Advocate of Jan. 18th. If we are such an unfair controversialist as he insinuates that we are, then certainly he can have no desire to pursue the controversy any farther with us; and if he really entertains such an opinion of us, we have no desire to pursue that, or any other controversy, with him.

Quite dignified, certainly, and more than enough to awaken pity for his wounded feelings. But after reading over my article again, I can find no insinuations—I stated facts as plainly as I could—I quoted Br. W.'s own language, and showed wherein he had quoted wrong—wherein he had stated facts amiss—and rebuked his conduct in all sincerity and fidelity. I esteem Br. W. highly his talents—his zeal—his devotion to the cause—his generally upright deportment—and his long-continued and highly useful labors as a preacher, an editor, an author and a publisher. I pray God that I may be enabled to follow him, at however an humble distance behind him, in these good works, and merit a portion of his well deserved and honest fame. But I thought, and yet think him wrong in the particulars I there pointed out, and believed them deserving of rebuke. I prayed then, and yet pray that it may lead to his avoidance of such things in future; and if so, my language which now offends him, will have done him good. Some medicines are sweet, but bitter ones are sometimes also necessary. If I had not thought so, I would have given him something more palatable—for he may rest assured that I felt and yet feel pained at the necessity which I believed called for all I said. I am however sustained by the hope that Br. W. will take a "second, sober thought" on the subject; and will then feel somewhat differently from what he now does.

As to the discussion, I regret its occurrence. I am not fond of such discussions. And as Br. W.'s articles first called for it, he is free, of course, to let it rest, or not, as he pleases. I am satisfied with it as it now is—of course, I have no desire to pursue it further—least of all, if he should again misquote language, and misrepresent facts, as he did in his last article, to which mine of January 18th, was a reply; for, in that case, I should feel most painfully obliged again to point out his failings, and to rebuke and exhort him again. So, let it rest for the present. A. B. G.

"A PEEP INTO THE STATE PRISON IN AUBURN, N. Y. By One who Knows."—A large pamphlet with this title, was put into my hands a week ago, with a request to read and notice it. A multiplicity of engagements has prevented me from reading it through, but enough has been read to enable me to say, that it is a detail of most flagrant cruelties committed by the Keepers on the unhappy and helpless convicts, which demands the immediate attention of the people, whose voice in the laws of the land, have placed these men under such keeping for reformation, and not for abuse. It also demands the immediate attention and efforts of the proper authorities, who have put such tyrannical, inhuman, and unchristian keepers over these poor men—keepers who, in their usage of the convicts, trample on the laws as boldly and recklessly, and often with far less excuse or palliation, as ever did those over whom they tyrannize.

For some months past, public indignation has been greatly excited in Auburn and its vicinity, by this subject—exposures have been made by one of the Inspectors and the late Physician of the establishment—men of irreproachable moral integrity and prudent humanity—but in vain. The tyrannical and brutal keepers were retained, and they retained the bigoted and negligent chaplain, and the system of illegal and unchristian oppression was kept in full force. Lately a Grand Jury of Cayuga county, has found three several indictments against the head keeper, and a hope is entertained that this hell upon earth of his, will be broken up by the removal of the head fiend and his satellites from office, and perhaps the incarceration of some of them in the cells over which they have presided.

But the illegal practices of the keepers, are not all that need reformation. There are some provisions in the existing laws, of which humanity and sound policy demand the speedy abolition. There are also provisions needed for the better education and spiritual consolation of these unfortunate men, according to their wants and several consciences, instead of leaving them to the infrequent instruction of a Sunday school and of one or two sermons a week—or to the ghostly advice of a clergyman who thinks he is doing God-service to prevent a heretic or Catholic from seeing the spiritual guide of his own choosing.

Corporal punishment, also, is a black stain upon the policy and humanity of a code expressly instituted for the upraising of the fallen, down-trodden, and degraded dignity of God's moral offspring. If retained at all, do not leave it to the discretion of an interested contractor and his mercenary overseer, or of a haughty, sinner-despising keeper, who will use it as a stimulus to get more work out of the poor convict, rather than to reform or subdue his evil propensities—whose interests, in short, are to increase the number of convicts, rather than to reform them.

The system of espionage is, also, a drawback on the efforts at reformation. To beget genuine reformation, a spirit of confidence in God and man, must first be generated in the convict's bosom, and this can never be produced by letting him know, every moment of his life, that he is under continual and secret distrust, and a mean spying out of his looks and motions. If a weak man, he sinks into a mere puppet—a slave; if a strong one, he becomes a hardened defier of God and man, or a wily, crafty hypocrite. Surely something can be done to remove these hindrances to the reformation of criminals. Remove these—give plenty of wholesome food, comfortable clothing, (things not granted at present,) and surround them with moral and intellectual light and good examples, and we may hope that our penitentiaries will cease to send forth men more hardened, more filled with hatred of their fellow-beings, than when they entered them.

But now, if this book may be believed—(and its statements are rendered very probable to the mind, by the statements of W. Lounsbury, Esq., Editor of the Cayuga Patriot, and lately one of the Inspectors of the Prison, and by the recent proceedings of the Grand Jury of that county—) the prisoners are surrounded with practical lessons of cruelty, malice, distrust, extortion, oppression, fraud, and passion, in the persons of their keepers and contractors—are compelled to lie for the benefit of their oppressors, who set them the example, and compel them to follow it; and are practised in making false labels on goods, etc., etc. My God! will the people and legislators of this enlightened State, endure these things any longer—this manufacturing and perfecting of men in villainy, at their expense—this conversion of a house of reformation into a practical school for the instruction of apt pupils in vice and villainy!

But enough—for I have not room for more at present. I hope this pamphlet will be read and its statements be pondered by the people, until they feel the necessity of demanding a thorough examination, not only of all charges against the keepers, etc., but of the entire system itself. May God grant it! A. B. G.

Messrs Cobb and Chapin, of South Cortland, are informed that we have received nothing on either of their subscriptions.

THE REGISTER AND ALMANAC FOR 1840.

In the course of next week we shall send out circulars to the Standing Clerks of Conventions and Associations, for statistical details for this work for 1840.—We hope they will be attended to—and if any such persons fail to receive a circular, I will esteem it a very great favor if they will notify me of the fact; for it is very important to the correctness of the work, that I should receive full information on each item from every such person.

I may as well remark here, that the calculations for the Almanac will be made for the southern, middle and western States, (three principal meridians being selected,) for those intended for those sections—and for the middle and eastern States, (three meridians,) for those intended for those sections. This will render the Almanac complete. The Register will contain some statistics additional to those contained in the number for the present year. In short, no pains will be spared to render it as full and correct as the nature of the work will permit.

The Companion, also, will be got up in good style, and filled with valuable and interesting matter. One table, alone, (exhibiting the Bible doctrine concerning hell, as disclosed not only in the original Scriptures, and in our common English version, but also as disclosed in the renderings of various modern versions—German, Spanish, French, etc.,) will be worth more than the entire price of the whole work. Yet it will not occupy one half of the Companion.

As we must print off the Companion first, we desire especially that those who want it, (either separately, or stitched with the Almanac,) would send in their orders early—the sooner the better—that we may know how many copies to print. Those who do not, must not complain if their late orders are not supplied. Send your orders in time. A. B. G.

REMOVALS.

Br. A. Williams has removed from Poolville, N. Y., to Chester, Vt., and desires all letters etc., directed to the latter place.

Also, Br. Woolley has removed from Cazenovia to Lebanon.

Br. Bazin—Send Expositor to Wm. Per Lee, P. M. North Norwich, Chenango county, N. Y.

Also, Transfer one copy of Br. A. William's Expositor to Rev. J. C. Eddy, Earlville, Madison county, and the other to Chester, Vt.

Br. Tompkins—Send Repository to Ezra Gorton, North Norwich, Chenango county, N. Y., credit him $2 00, and charge G. and H.

Also, credit Mrs. S. J. Phelps, Marshall, Calhoun county, Mich., $2.00, and charge G. and H.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br. T. J. SMITH, at Columbus—Br. A. WILLIAMS, at Burlington Flats.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. SMITH, in Salisbury—Br. A. G. CLARK, at Marathon—Br. O. WILCOX, at Evan's Mills at 10 A. M., and at Lockport at 2 P. M.

The fourth Conference of the Otsego Association of Universalists, will be holden in the Academy at Worcester, Otsego county, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in February.

O. WHISTON, Standing Clerk.

N. B. At the last meeting of the Otsego Association, a resolution was passed recommending that collections be taken for the purpose of defraying the expenses of delegates, appointed to attend the State Convention.—Will the ministering brethren within the bounds of this Association, see that the resolution is carried into effect?

O. WHISTON, Standing Clerk.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

Rev S G, Alexander, for self, J F, B E D and R G—P M, Canandaigua, for H C, W M G and A G—P M, Geddes, for J W and G B—P M, Sheshequin, for G K and JS—P M, North Adams—Rev J L, Boston, for self, A S, N M J, S N, P C, E F, L A, C G L, A F N, J M, J T and J B—P M, Hall's Corners—T H, Lodi, (Ills) for self and E C—E D G, Litchfield, for J L G—P M, Cabotville, (Mass) for B C—R R W, Monroeville, for M W, G H, L S, T H, H T, M S, R D L, W S, A S and C W—A M H, Newark, (O)—H B, Potter—Rev T C E, Fredonia—P M, Plymouth, (Mich) for N E—P M, Mondon, for J H, S G and J L—W G, Tucker's Cabin, (Ga) for self, O C J and N H—W M, Mt Meigs, (Ala) for self and A T—C B, Brownhelm, (O) for self and L D—P M, Franklin Mills, (O) for A O and A S C—J B, Walton—J K, Jonesboro', (Ala) for self and J S.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

"WHY SHOULD WE MOURN?"

Oh! why should we mourn, when the summons of death
Requires the frail mortal to yield up his breath?
Oh why, when our loved ones are called to depart,
Say, why then, should sorrow oppress the lone heart?

And why, when we view the pale corse of our friend,
Should we suffer dejection our bosoms to rend?
When we feel, when we know that a meeting above,
Shall be ours in the mansions of infinite Love? W. R.

[From the Repository.]

FANCY AND REALITY.

BY MISS N. THORNING.

Things fairer than the poet's dream
Amid his sunny bowers,
And brighter than the joyous gleam
Of fancy's wild and uncurbed stream,
Meet in this world of ours.

And not alone in fancy's power
A joyous influence lives,
For many a beauteous gem and flower,
To soothe a lone and weary hour,
The world around us gives.

There is a sweet and kindly beam
From a mild, loving eye;
And not e'en fancy's brightest dream,
Can match that pure and joyous gleam,
Like star, in Summer sky.

There is a sweet, confiding tone
Which falls upon the ear;
And to that voice the heart, though lone,
Leaps from its deep and trusting home,
To greet that tone so dear.

And there are hearts whose every thought,
Is linked and bound like ours;
By these, the gems by fairies wrought,
And flowers from fairy gardens brought,
Grow dim within our bowers.

And there are hearts to whom we cling
In scenes of joy and care,
And o'er whose love we need not fling
A coloring rich from fancy's wing,
To make the picture fair.

For truth is in that speaking eye,
And in that kindly tone,
And o'er that heart that's ever nigh,
Whose love it may not change or die,
The veil of truth is thrown.

Yes, there are things in real life,
Of fair and beauteous hue;
And there are scenes with beauty rife,
And hours, o'er which no cloud of strife,
Its darkening influence throw.

Yes, all have known of hours, whose light
Cast joy on all around;
The glorious sun seemed ne'er so bright,
Joy shone in every passing sight,
And breathed in every sound.

The strong realities of earth,
Which glad us on our way,
Are like the ocean's gems of worth,—
But as a wild stream gushing forth,
So sparkles fancy's ray.

[From the Union.]

SOCIETY SCHOOLS—ALBANY.

It is probably well known to Universalists, that the elementary schools, as well as the higher seminaries of learning in our country, are generally managed and taught by those who are directly or indirectly opposers, or open and avowed enemies of the doctrine of the restitution. At the same time, there is a pervading and undisguised sectarism inculcated in nearly every school book, in common use. And those are most decidedly puffed as standard works of special merit, which most emphatically and distinctly favor those views and doctrines which Universalists consider both erroneous and injurious. The greatest efforts are often made to force such books into popular acceptation and general use Nor are the district schools, which are instituted by the State, and to a great extent sustained by the public "common school fund," exempted from these efforts and general influences.

These efforts and influences are more or less successful—and precisely in the ratio of their success, they are unfavorable to the prosperity of Universalism.—The perpetual squinting, so to speak, of the masters and mistresses employed as teachers—the eternal round of nursery-tale "first books" for children, all spiced with the spirit and temper of what are called "evangelical doctrines"—or rather, the dogmas of popery re-baptized by modern new-measure sects, do exert, and were designed to exert a sectarian control over every child that attends school. It is one of the several steps and processes which have won from the families of nominal and professed Universalists so many of their children, to the arms of opposing sects. And which has filled the hearts of so many parents with anguish, and embittered their old age with the sense of the intolerance, unkindness and ingratitude of their children.

In our cities and large towns, this state of things is more common, more apparent, and more influential and injurious, than elsewhere. Parents commonly have less leisure, either to watch over the moral interests, or to superintend the education of their children. The things taught in school are seldom matters of investigation, if so be that the children generally make the expected progress in reading, writing and arithmetic, and are out of the way when business or company renders their noise and their presence inconvenient. Hence almost any person, male or female, whose orthodoxy can obtain a voucher, can establish a school. And then comes the tug—not of war, indeed, but of tact, and policy, and pretension. Every family within a given beat, is visited, and flattered, and coaxed to send their children.—Universalists are assured that nothing shall ever be said, or done, in any way calculated to impeach the purity of their faith, or to influence the opinions of their children. And all this—while the teacher is a bigot to the doctrines of an opposing creed—prays his prejudices and principles in the ears of his pupils, and obliges them to read, learn, and recite language and sentiments directly calculated and designed to impress every doctrine of his sect.

This is no fancied case—it is notoriously a fact of common occurrence. It is one which all but the blind can see—and which they even sometimes are made to feel, when their grown-up sons and daughters have learned to treat and contemn their parents as heretics, and to strut and figure as the petted members of some new-measure church.

In view of these facts, the members of the Universalist Society in the city of Albany, instituted in May last, a school of their own. It is controlled by and under the direction and instruction of a Universalist; and the children of Universalist families constitute the great majority of the pupils. Others may, and do send—but it is known and understood to be a Universalist school. It is established in the basement of the Universalist church—and here, from sixty to eighty children of both sexes, but in separate departments, receive a course of elementary instruction, unmingled and uncontaminated by the withering effects of a proud and monopolizing sectarism. Here the children of Universalist families, whether rich or poor, are brought together—become acquainted with, and interested in each other; and here every member of the Society finds a new bond of union, and takes a common interest in the prosperity of the institution. S. R. SMITH.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 3d inst., by Ira Chase, Esq., Mr. ANDREW JONES, of Frankfort, Herkimer county, to Miss CAROLINE ELIZABETH GILMORE, of the same place.

In Willow Creek Precinct, Ills., November 8th, by C. Bliss, Esq., Mr. WILLIAM CAMFIELD, of Newburgh, to Miss CAROLINE SAYRES, of the former place.

In Charleston, Ills., by Rev. Wm. Rounseville, Mr. JOB KNIGHT, to Miss OLIVE WHEELER, all of that place.

In Middlebury, January 28th, by Rev. Alanson Kelsey, Mr. SUMNER W. RICE, of Covington, to Miss BETSEY MOON, of the former place.

In New-Hartford, February 2d, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. WARREN DUNHAM, of this city, to Miss JULIA A. JOHNSON, of New Hartford.

DEATHS.

DEATH OF BR. HAYWARD.

Br. GROSH.—I am at a loss for words to communicate to you the sad intelligence of the sudden death of Rev. ISAAC HAYWARD, who departed this life, January 15th, after a confinement of 19 days, aged 49 years. He had been afflicted with Chronic Neuralgia, for some length of time, and at the time of his confinement, was attacked with an inflammatory fever, which terminated fatally, in consequence of congestion in the head.

Thus has fallen, in the meridian of life—in the midst of his usefulness, an able advocate, as well as a firm believer in the doctrine of impartial grace. Enjoying a high reputation in the medical profession, in which, for many years, he had been a successful practitioner, and possessing talents in an eminent degree, which were employed in the ministry of the reconciliation, and by the pure principles of moral rectitude, which induced his kindness and good will to all, he enjoyed the respect, and gained the esteem of his fellows, and died deeply lamented by those who knew him.

In this dispensation of Providence, the societies to which he ministered in word and deed, have lost an able and devoted minister of the better covenant; the denomination a firm pillar and bright ornament, and the world a friend and benefactor. His faith in a world's salvation remained unshaken to the last, and when asked by a friend, "if he had any doubts?" he replied "not one." Being conscious how his disease might terminate, a few days before his death, he arranged his affairs, and called up his family to receive his parting advice.

Three days before his exit, his disease settled in his head, and his senses forsook him. His remains were followed on the 18th, by a numerous concourse of sympathizing friends, to the union house at Burlington Flats, where a discourse was delivered, founded on the xl chapter of Isa., 6th verse, by the writer; assisted by Elders Cutler and Crandal, who so far deviated from the common practice of the Baptist church, as to speak with respect over the ashes of a Universalist.

We invoke the blessings of that Father who has caused us to mourn, to rest upon the friends and the societies to which he ministered, and especially on the widow and orphans of the deceased. May they find in his promises, balm for every wound, joy for every sorrow, and life eternal as an endless gift. T. J. SMITH.

Union and Trumpet please copy.

In Aurelius, Cayuga county, December 19th, of consumption, Br. JAMES GILDERSLEEVE, aged 43 years. Eighteen years since, Br. Gildersleeve was expelled from the Presbyterian church in Auburn, for believing the Restitution. But notwithstanding this, his piety and firmness of faith gained him the respect of all who knew him. And when, with Christian calmness, he sunk to the tomb, he died an honest man. May the Lord comfort his afflicted family.

In Auburn, January 22d, of old age, Br. S. DAVIS, aged 89 years. He was a settler in Cayuga county, when there was but one house in Auburn. He was esteemed as a good man and a kind neighbor. And he went down to the tomb, full in the faith of the Restitution. May consolation be poured upon his family.

In Auburn, January 27th, of inflammation in the bowels, WM. A. CHATTERTON, aged 12 years. For one so young, he endured his sickness with extraordinary patience, telling his friends not to mourn for him, for he was willing to die, because he should be better off. And he is better off—he is in a land where no pain or death shall be felt, but where joys shall for evermore be given him. May God comfort the bereaved family. G. W. M.

In Charleston, Ills., September 23d, Mrs. RHODA RANDALL, consort of Valentine Randall, aged 47 years. The deceased has left a large family to mourn their loss. Although they do not mourn as those who have no hope; for they look forward to the time when Christ "shall subdue all things to himself," and "God shall be all in all." Funeral services on the 24th, by Rev. Mr. Warner, (Methodist,) from Hebrews ix: 27.

Also, in Charleston, Ills., Oct. 13th, LEVI GOODRICH, aged 33 years; formerly of St. Lawrence county, N. Y. In the death of Br. Goodrich, the benign influence of the Gospel was fully shown. Although his companion was suffering from the same disease with himself—although he knew he must shortly depart and leave his wife and little ones—he could meet the precursor of the tomb with a smile of triumph, and calmly bid adieu to the scenes of earth with the joyous anticipation of an existence where humanity should be redeemed from sin, and a world rejoice in the favor of God. Sermon by W. R.

In Charleston, Ills., Dec. 11th, CHAUNCEY N. RANDALL, aged 25 years. Although a member of no sect, our deceased Br. was a Universalist in faith and practice. Possessing a contemplative mind he clearly saw that the popular creeds of the day were opposed to Scripture and reason, and consequently, he rejected them for the Gospel doctrine that "God will have all men to be saved"—that death shall be swallowed up in victory. Sermon by W. R.

In Charleston, Ills., January 6th, Mrs. E. COOLEY, aged 26 years. She has left a husband with six small children to mourn her departure. May the choicest blessings of Heaven rest upon them, and may they realize that there is a friend above who will never leave or forsake them. Her funeral was attended on the 7th, by Rev. N. C. Clark, (Congregationalist,) and by request of the bereaved husband, another discourse was delivered by the writer on the following Sabbath, from Eccl. xii: 7. WM. ROUNSEVILLE.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE
IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,
By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within four months; $2.00 if not paid within four months; or $2.50 if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis; and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞To City subscribers who receive their papers by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00 if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME X. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1839. NUMBER 8.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER NINETEEN.

BY S. R. SMITH.

It will not be doubted, that one of the most extraordinary traits of human character, is its tendency to superstition. And however we may be told that superstition is the index, as it is the never-failing concomitant of ignorance, it is, nevertheless, an ignorance which has very generally prevailed in all ages, and among all classes of mankind. By superstition, is here meant the belief in diabolical spirits, ghosts, and hobgoblins, and the consequent apprehension of their witcheries and sorceries. All of which, the skeptic or unbeliever will probably admit to be wholly unworthy of the serious regard or respect of reasonable and enlightened men. So far, then, all are agreed—and it remains that we apply this admission to the comparative conduct of the sacred writers and Gentile philosophers, with a view to ascertain their respective claims to consistency, reason, and sound philosophy.

Now, there is throughout the Bible, a constant series of facts, which conclusively prove, that the sacred penmen regarded these popular superstitions not only with disapprobation, but as utterly repugnant to the purity of religion and morality. And they are particularly explicit in the avowal of their own opinions, as well as definite in the expression of the views which they would have others entertain respecting this subject. Thus giving to their productions the appearance of some solicitude, lest they might at some period be misunderstood. They are no less distinguished for their opinions relating to this subject, than for many other things by which they were so signally set apart from the rest of mankind. And in this, as in others, their views and principles are shown to be of a higher origin than can be consistently claimed for the productions of any other class of writers. It proves that they were inspired, or were infinitely sounder thinkers, as well as better moralists, than any other part of the world could boast. A few examples will illustrate and prove what is here assumed.

In the Pentateuch—a part of the Bible which unbelievers hold in particular and profound detestation—Moses says, "There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire, or that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizzard, or a necromancer.....For these nations which thou shalt possess, hearkened unto observers of times, and unto diviners; but as for thee, the Lord thy God hath not suffered thee so to do." Again, in reference to the same subject, he says, "Regard not them that have familiar spirits, neither seek after wizzards, to be defiled by them."

The language of these prohibitions, is too plain to admit of misapprehension. And they embody and establish several facts which the skeptic will do well to notice. One of these is, that the Canaanitish nations were addicted to a most loathsome, gross, and degrading superstition, which encouraged a set of pretenders, jugglers, soothsayers, and diviners, and which also embraced among its consequences, the inhuman practice of sacrificing children to Moloch, the fire-god. This catalogue of witches, wizzards, necromancers, and consequently, the whole machinery of demons, ghosts, and vampires, are plainly of Heathen origin.

Another important fact is, that the Hebrews were forbidden, in the most express and comprehensive terms, to show any countenance or favor towards these pretensions. They were not permitted to adopt any of these opinions or practices, nor might they suffer those who did, to live among them. No part of this formidable system of superstition, can even remotely be attributed to the Mosaic dispensation. So far from this, the language above quoted, shows, that the Israelites were required to consider it as utterly false and infamous, alike unworthy of men, and offensive to Heaven.

Another equally interesting and important fact is, that the Hebrews were taught to regard this system of demonology and jugglery, not only as false and fabulous, but as matter of positive moral defilement. Nor was this a subject of empty speculation alone—it was carried into practice. And during many ages, except in times of general and notorious apostacy, they are not chargeable with the folly and impiety of believing in, or countenancing witchcraft, or of suffering the terrors of demoniacal visitation.

That we are correct in relation to this matter, is further shown by the manner in which the Hebrew writers speak of what they call their wicked kings. Thus, of Manasseh, it is said, that "he made his son to pass through the fire, and observed times, and used enchantments, and dealt with familiar spirits and wizzards." And all this was done under such aggravations of guilt, as to induce the further remark, that he seduced the people to "do more evil than did the nations whom the Lord destroyed before the children of Israel." There is no possibility of mistaking the meaning of this quotation. And it shows that the acknowledged rule of action and sentiment among the Hebrews, in all ages, was the same in relation to superstition. What Moses had established, was authoritative in this, as in other particulars, and except during seasons of undoubted apostacy, was never for a moment called in question.

The prophets, in a variety of ways, speak of the superstitions of the Heathens. Sometimes they seriously rebuke their nation for inclining to their adoption—at others, they treat the subject of prognostication and witchcraft, with playful irony, or bitter sarcasm and contempt; but always in a manner that clearly shows that they rejected every part of the entire system of demonology. Jeremiah writes—"Thus saith the Lord, learn not the way of the Heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the Heathen are dismayed at them." Isaiah says, that the Lord had forsaken his people, because they were "soothsayers like the Philistines"—and he rebukes them in no very measured terms, for their idolatry. "Their land is full of idols; they worship the work of their own hands, that which their own fingers have made..... And the mean man boweth down, and the great man humbleth himself." On another occasion he taunts the idolators in this style—"Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizzards that peep, and that mutter—should not a people seek unto their god?" The high and low stand openly rebuked, in these instances; while the whole system of divination is contemptuously exploded.

But it is not necessary to multiply quotations.—It is indisputable that the institutions of Moses constituted the only acknowledged rule of faith and practice among the Hebrews, at all times, and under all circumstances, when they can be supposed to act upon their own peculiar principles. Accordingly we may expect to find—just what we do find every where scattered throughout the sacred writings—allusions more or less distinct, to the identical prohibitions of witchcraft and demonology, under consideration. And in every instance of such reference by the prophets, it is done in perfect accordance with the maxims of their great Lawgiver. Kings, in several instances, acted upon this authority, and expelled or put to death the pretenders to what is termed a familiar spirit, or a spirit of divination. And the fooleries and abominations of superstition, in all its forms, are held up for the nation's abhorrence, in contrast with the substantial truths and useful instructions of the oracles of God.

To these remarks it will probably be objected, that, in defiance of the institutions of Moses, the power and authority of kings, and the remonstrances and rebukes of the prophets, the Hebrews, at different periods, appear to have fallen into the common error respecting the belief of invisible spirits, and finally to have universally sunk into a faith in ghosts, witches, and demons.

All this is cheerfully admitted—but neither the facts nor their admission, affect the position assumed and proved, that the Hebrew institutions disavowed and reprobated the whole scheme of idolatry and superstition. On the contrary, it serves more fully and conclusively to show, that the whole nation had eventually departed from their own acknowledged principles; and, at the same time, to exhibit in stronger light, and to hold up to higher admiration, the extraordinary men who taught them to reject the whole system of demonology, and to regard its instruments and abettors, as the corruptors and enemies of mankind. Nothing can be more marvellous, than the character which is thus unequivocally confirmed to their great Lawgiver, their prophets, and the wisest and best of their kings!

But the unbeliever is concerned to know, by what means the Hebrews came to believe in all the Pagan superstitions—and, especially, why this belief became so much more identical with the last ages of their national existence. The reasons, and the process by which this was effected, were both easy and natural. The Hebrews, for some five hundred years previous to the Christian era, were successively tributary to the Chaldeans, Greeks, and Romans; whose mythological systems were substantially one and the same. For, setting aside the consideration of the particular deities which they worshipped, and some minor peculiarities in the prevailing systems of philosophy, neither of which is involved in the present instance, they entertained the same general views of matter and spirit, and spiritual existences, and the same notions concerning the state of the dead. Among them all, the belief in ghosts and in demoniacal possessions, appears to have been universal. And it was perfectly natural for the Hebrews, in their necessary intercourse with them, to imbibe, to a greater or lesser extent, the views and principles of their conquerors. And that they did imbibe them, there is abundant evidence.

The Chaldeans supposed the existence of different grades of spiritual beings—"gods, demons, heroes." And besides these, the oriental nations generally, "and among the rest, the Chaldeans, admitted the existence of certain evil spirits, clothed in a vehicle of grosser matter; and in subduing or counteracting these, they placed a great part of the efficacy of their religious incantations." The great oracle of the oriental world, Zoroaster, maintained that there are "various orders of spiritual beings, gods or demons, which are more or less perfect, as they are at a greater or lesser distance in the course of emanation from the eternal fountain of intelligence."

It was plainly from Babylon, that the Hebrews brought the rudiments of that system of demonology, which was gradually incorporated with their own, and which, in the process of a few ages, was perfected under other influences, in its power over the public mind. Here, Heathenism first fixed, deeply and permanently, its hold upon the recipients of revelation, and inspired the faith of infernal agency in the production of human ills. And here, the belief in "certain evil spirits, clothed in grosser matter," successfully induced the Israelites to adopt the further opinion, that they were gross enough to be seen. Hence evil demons and sturdy ghosts, were as common as other visitors—always viewed as the messengers of evil, and the necessary associates of darkness and misfortune.

Socrates, the father of the Greek moral philosophy, and the patron-saint of modern unbelievers, was a believer in, and promoter of the doctrine of familiar spirits, or demons. And it is not a little remarkable, that, with the admiration of his many noble virtues and excellences, which amounts almost to idolatry, skeptics appear not to perceive that he entertained views respecting demons and auguries, for which they affect to despise some weak and superstitious Christians. Is it indeed so, that the faults of a favorite are sanctified by what are esteemed his better and more amiable qualities; and that these very qualities are rendered despicable, and false, and hateful, by the contaminating influence of similar faults in those against whom, and whose opinions, we have imbibed a prejudice? So it appears, in this case. For Socrates "believed the divine origin of dreams and omens, and publicly declared that he was accompanied by a demon or invisible conductor, whose frequent interposition stopped him from the commission of evil, and the guilt of misconduct." A good demon is no doubt intended in this instance, because his influence resulted in preventing the commission of evil. But it is very evident that he would, for the same reason, ascribe the evil actions of wicked men to the machinations of malignant demons. The authority for these statements, will, it is hoped, be entirely satisfactory, as it is derived from Heathen writers, among whom are Diodorus and Plato.

The most distinguished disciple of Socrates was Plato, who evidently imbibed the superstitions of his master. He maintained that the "souls of men were formed from the remainder of the rational soul of the world, which had previously given existence to the invisible gods and demons." He also maintained the doctrine of "ideal forms, and the pre-existence of the human mind."* The same general opinions were, with trifling modifications, universally adopted by the multitude of philosophers, who subsequently flourished in the Heathen world. To multiply instances, is only to repeat what has been already quoted, and which, none will dispute, exhibits the sentiments of those to whom these superstitions are ascribed. It is, therefore, an established truth, that the whole race of Pagan philosophers believed and taught what an apostle calls "the doctrine of devils;" and that the most eminent among them, like the most ignorant and superstitious, maintained that mankind were the subjects of their visitation, and of their beneficent or diabolical influences.

In view, therefore, of the universal prevalence of this general system of demonology among the Heathens, and also of the further fact, that the Hebrews were for ages the tributaries of those very nations whose pre-eminence in arms and arts, secured the transmission of their mythology to other times, as well as its general adoption during their triumphs—we must cease to wonder that the institutions of Moses were corrupted by exotic superstitions. Where the Law was silent, the Hebrew would feel at liberty to innovate—where its injunctions were absolute, ingenuity would contrive evasions. And the inducements to do both, were urgent and perpetual, in view of the captivating splendor of a popular philosophy, and in the natural desire of pleasing their conquerors.

From these considerations, the inference is plain, not to say unavoidable, that the system of demonology, with all its parts and appendages, with all its supposed possessions and real terrors, is of Heathen origin. And, as if to render this conclusion so obvious, as to exclude all possibility of mistake, the proof is abundant and clear, that while Heathenism cherished and promoted, by its most refined philosophy, all the grossness of superstition, the Hebrew institutions rejected the whole as fabulous and absurd.

It will probably be objected in this place, that, however clear the proof may be, that the Mosaic institution rejected and forbade the system of demonology and witchcraft, it is quite obvious that it is recognized and approved by Christianity—that many of the reputed miracles of Christ, were professedly wrought in the expulsion of demons, which implies their admission by the great Founder of the Christian system; and that there are reasons for believing that his followers were of the same opinion.

The plausibility of this objection, has misled many, though its unsoundness must be apparent to every careful reader of the New Testament.* The instances in which the miraculous powers of Jesus are said to have been exerted in the expulsion of demons, are plainly cases of lunacy or madness, palsy, blindness, epilepsy, and a few other diseases. Of this, any one can satisfy himself, by carefully observing the description of the respective cases. Take, for instance, the man among the tombs, the person who was occasionally thrown into the fire or water, and another who is expressly said to have "a demon, and is lunatic," and it is believed that none can mistake the facts. These instances not only show, that demoniacal possession was ascribed to the plainest cases of disease, but they enhance the value, and demonstrate the certainty of the miracles. For they leave no room for cavil respecting the apparent removal of what the skeptic might otherwise call imaginary diseases. Nor, in either case, do they furnish any evidence that our Saviour entertained the least confidence in, or designed to give the popular opinion any encouragement.

It is too evident to need the labor of argument or proof, that the whole fabric of demonology rests upon the doctrine of the existence of different grades of spiritual beings, some good and others evil, and upon the supposed pre-existence of souls. For, certainly, if it were not believed that these existed, it could not be supposed that they could possess and and torment, as well as occasionally visit and alarm mankind. And we have seen, that the philosophers believed in the emanation of successive eons, or spiritual beings, good and bad, from the supreme mind, before that of human souls. Now, this doctrine is very expressly disavowed by our Saviour. This appears from his answer to the question of his disciples—"Who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" Than which, nothing can more distinctly convey the idea of his having existed and acted in some previous state, and that his present misfortune was the result of former wickedness in himself or his parents. Let it be remembered, then, that Jesus positively denies that the blindness of the person referred to, was either the result of sin, or of any supposed pre-existence—"neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents, that he was born blind." His silence in other cases, can not, therefore, be construed into their admission—it only proves that he did not, in all cases, choose to meet and repel the superstitions of his countrymen. But we shall see that his disciples rebuked this lying spirit of Heathen creation, with all the firmness and decision which the subject demanded.

It is well known, that the Heathens believed their deities to be superhuman spirits, and that they were present in some mysterious manner, with the images by which they were represented. The idol and the god were, therefore, supposed to be identical. And to reject the one, was to deny and reject the other. This is accordingly done by the apostle Paul, in the following distinct and intelligible manner:—"As concerning, therefore, the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God, but one." It is difficult to conceive of terms which would convey the idea of an utter rejection of the system of demonology, more distinctly and in a more comprehensive manner, than is done in this quotation. Nor is this all; the apostle appears to speak in the name of the whole Christian community—"we know"—and in a subsequent instance, in relation to the same general subject, "to us"—terms that imply the well-known prevalence of the same common views. Whatever, then, the opinions of Christians may have become in the general corruption of the dark ages, it is sufficiently clear, that primitive Christianity was exempt from the charge of a superstitious belief in the existence or power of infernal spirits.

Again—it is notorious that the system or doctrine of emanation, maintained by Plato, either directly or indirectly, led to the belief of a succession of eons, or spiritual existences, whose natures gradually receded from the perfections of the "soul of the world," in an infinitely descending series. In this way, certain Platonists peopled the atmosphere with myriads of invisible demons. Some of the first Gentile Christians were converts from this system of speculative philosophy, and were evidently very anxious to introduce their views into the Christian church. How well they succeeded, we need not inquire; since the whole machinery of saintship or intercessory mediators of the Papal church, and the ghosts and witches of the Protestant, are very obviously derived from the modifications of this very opinion.

No attentive reader of the New Testament, can have failed to remark, that the apostles labored to induce the Christian congregations, to repel every attempt to palm upon them these fabulous notions of a vain philosophy. They use a language, too, in relation to this subject, which scarcely admits of mistake, and which never has been misunderstood by ecclesiastical writers of tolerable candor and intelligence.* Thus, the apostle, in writing to the Galatians, enumerated "idolatry and witchcraft" as kindred parts of the same system, and which are to be avoided as among the works of the flesh, and hindrances to an entrance into the kingdom of God, or the Gospel. He assures Timothy, that the church would in time apostatize from the simplicity of the faith, by "giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines concerning demons." A fact, that abundantly and clearly proves that these were not then considered legitimate parts of Christianity. And again, he admonishes him not to "give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions rather than godly edifying." Nothing can more appropriately designate the popular theory of the emanation of the eons, than the language of this passage. The same view is further urged by this apostle, in his directions to Titus to "avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law," assuring him that they were "unprofitable and vain." Here, as in the former instance, by genealogies, those respecting the derivation of the eons, are intended, as those of the Jewish law were never matters of question in relation to the circumstances of the Gentiles, nor were they supposed of any importance to the Gospel minister.

From these examples—and they can be multiplied to the heart's content of any one—it is put beyond reasonable doubt, that the writers of the New Testament, like those of the Old, rejected the entire system of demonology. And, indeed, we could not expect to find, in an improved system of morals and religion, standing as the Gospel plainly and avowedly does, in the most intimate connexion with the Hebrew economy, the admission of principles and doctrines from the Heathens, which were so distinctly prohibited by the legal dispensation. The accordance of the several parts of the whole system of revealed religion, might have been safely and certainly argued without an appeal to instances. But the instances given, leave no ground of cavil; for they prove beyond question,

*Enfield's History of Philosophy, and Lempriere's Classical Dictionary, for these extracts.

*Lardner on cases of Demoniacs—4to ed. England.

*See Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History—Priestley's History Christian Church, and others.

that both the Jewish and Christian dispensations maintain, in this respect, the same principles, and reject, as unworthy of faith or confidence, and equally foolish and injurious, absurd and wicked, the doctrine of demonology, and all its concomitants.

If, therefore, the Hebrews and Christians, when best obeying their respective institutions, were free from those superstitions which constitute the common subjects of vulgar credulity, why are they called superstitious? Was the unbeliever ignorant of the fact, that what he calls, and rightly calls superstition, is the exclusive production of his proud systems of philosophy inspired by the mere light of nature? If he was ignorant of this, why has he ventured to be so confident, when the means of correct information are easily obtained? But if he was not ignorant of it, how can he excuse himself for charging upon the Bible an influence which it has not, but which attaches exclusively to his own favorite views? And if the sacred writers must be called superstitious, what name is befitting the gross and contemptible credulity of the philosophers who fabricated the doctrines of ghosts and diabolical spirits, and who were themselves the dupes and slaves of their own terrors and silly hallucinations?

We must now be permitted to ask the unbeliever to assign a competent reason, if he can, for the facts which have here been presented for his consideration. Why, with the universal example of mankind before him, should the Hebrew Lawgiver have departed so widely from the superstitions of the whole world? Why were the prophets and the whole nation, when best obeying and illustrating the spirit of their institutions, entirely exempt from all belief in, or fear of, the various and multiplied demons, ghosts, and spiritual powers which haunted the Heathens from time immemorial? Why did the apostles and primitive Christians, with the exception of certain would-be philosophers among the Gentile converts, reject with contempt and abhorrence, the "endless genealogies," "old wives' fables," "idolatry, witchcraft," and "doctrines of demons," that constituted the superstitions of the rest of mankind? These are problems which infidelity never has solved, and never can solve without abandoning its principles and pretensions. It possesses no means of accounting for these facts, on its own hypothesis! For it assumes that the light of nature is, and always was, sufficient for the guidance of man, in all cases—but it is compelled to admit, that this very light led men into superstitions which the sacred writers rejected, and which unbelievers now affect to despise. It assumes that Socrates, Plato, and other Heathens, were more consistent men, and more profound philosophers, than Moses or Christ—but it is forced to acknowledge that these admired philosophers were absurd enough to be grossly superstitious and idolatrous, from which the Patriarchs and the Master of Christians are entirely exempt. It assumes that the Mosaic and Christian dispensations are the foster-parents of all the fanaticism and superstition of the world—while the fact stands proved by the prohibitions and rebukes which both have uttered against the philosophical theories of the Heathens, that they are, and ever have been entirely exempt from such imputation!

And how can infidelity maintain its position, and make—what it must do—all these concessions? How can it consider a few philosophers as the only miracles of mind and moral excellence—how regard the Bible as the exclusive instrument of superstition, while the latter rejects, and the former maintains the system of demonology? It can not, we repeat, maintain its position, and account for these facts, on its own principles. It must cease to regard Socrates as the most illustrious specimen of human wisdom—or it must admit that the sacred writers were inspired. Take your choice, gentlemen unbelievers, for, in either case, you admit what in your estimation amounts to a miracle! And the admission of either, will annihilate forever the charms and the parade of Heathen philosophy, and place the Bible where it ought to be—high in the estimation of all mankind. But the most obvious and reasonable conclusion is, that because the sacred writers were not superstitious, therefore they were inspired.

[From the Berean.]

OBITUARY.

With the deepest feelings of sorrow and regret, we announce to our friends the departure of Rev. NATHAN WADSWORTH, Editor of the Berean, from the scenes of active life. He died at Troy, Lincoln county, Mo., on the 17th of January, and had he lived till the 19th of the present month, would have been 31 years of age. His health for the last two years of his life was extremely precarious—such as is ever the case with those suffering under the wasting influence of consumption—which retarded and circumscribed his labors far within the limits of his inclinations. Believing that a work was given him to do here on earth, and knowing that his time to depart could not be far distant, his energies, both of body and mind, were ever employed in his Maker's service, to their utmost extent. The field of his labors will show what he has accomplished, and it is consoling to know that his last hours were blessed with a consciousness that he had "fought the good fight"—that his labor had not been in vain. But he is gone from among us, and we are left to mourn his early departure—to regret that the unsparing hand of disease has laid in the dust the frail tenement of a spirit whose aspirations were so strongly set forth in an active and well spent life. His memory needs no highwrought eulogy to impress upon the readers of the Berean the loss they have met in his death. With the most appalling difficulties to encounter, he laid the foundation for future usefulness in the spread of the Gospel, and with unsparing zeal, and untiring effort of body and mind, combatted for the truth against the densely congregated opponents by whom he was surrounded. O! that he had lived to reap the reward of his toils and privations, and which seemed almost within his reach, but it was the will of his Father to call him hence, to reap his reward in a purer and happier sphere. He is gone; and the remembrance of his many virtues, linked with the purest friendship, causes the heart of the writer to mourn, but not without hope. O! blessed hope! that reaches within the vail, what, without thee, would life be worth to the lonely widow thus parted from all that was nearest and dearest in her hallowed affections? Naught this world can give could heal the wound—naught save our blessed faith in the Gospel bestowed by Him, who is indeed a God of infinite mercy and purest love. To Him she may turn in the desolation of her heart, and find sweet, sweet consolation in the hope of a re-union in heaven, where there shall be no more separation, but joy unspeakable and full of glory shall be hers, forever and ever. F. C. MESSINGER.

THE BEREAN.

As there will, undoubtedly, be some anxiety felt in regard to the publication of the Berean hereafter, we will briefly state that arrangements are now in progress to continue it under the editorial management of a gentleman well qualified for the respon ible station. As it may be a month or more before our expectations in this particular can be realized, the gentleman adverted to being at this time in the East, we would crave the indulgence of our patrons in matters of editorial labor until our expected aid arrives. F. C. MESSINGER.

EDITORIAL ITEMS.

LETTER FROM MR. CAMPBELL.

At too late a period for publication in this number, we received a letter from Mr. Campbell—an outpouring of wrath. It will appear in our next—the last letter of the discussion, which, however tedious to many of our readers, and distasteful to us on account of the temper and spirit manifested all along by Mr. C., has nevertheless been a means of much extending a knowledge of Universalism in the South West and West, and of gaining to us not a few valuable and esteemed converts from among our opposers.

As soon as possible, the room occupied by each party will be ascertained, and the room to be occupied by each in the concluding letter, agreed on, when our readers will have "the conclusion of the whole matter"—the review and summing up of the controversy, by each of the disputants. A. B. G.

BR. SKINNER'S JOURNAL.

The first letter written by Mr. Skinner after his arrival in St. Croix, but the last received from him, will be laid before our readers in our next. It will be found interesting, and pleasing, as it conveys an assurance of increasing health, which is confirmed by later accounts. A. B. G.

TOWN MEETINGS.

If our subscribers who have not yet settled for the paper, would prepare themselves for settling with their respective agents at the approaching Town Elections they would in many instances save the agents the trouble of riding some miles to call on them. Will they please bear it in mind? G. and H.

CONFERENCE AT ORAN.

Br. T. D. Cook will attend the Conference at Oran, and attend to any business for the Magazine and Advocate. He will also be prepared to supply our friends with the Register and Almanac, Voice to Youth, Hymn Books, and some other books. G. and H.

A new union meeting-house has been built by the Baptists, Methodists, and Universalists, in Tylersville, South Rutland, Jefferson county, and dedicated, but when, report says not. We expect to hear more from that vicinity soon. A correspondent writes us that the Quarterly Conference of the Black River Association, was a first rate meeting, and well attended. "Our cause," says he, "is steadily, though moderately progressing Lukewarmness is our most formidable foe." We hope our zealous friends will be able to wake them out of this lethargy.

Br. Potter writes that the cause is improving in its prospects, in that vicinity. The friends are anxious for the preached word in Fly Creek, Richfield Springs, Barlington, Middlefield Centre, Van Hornsville, and in Fort Plain. A. R. B.

Mr. J. W., Geddes, is informed, that Br. Sanderson never accounted to us for vol. 9 for any of the Geddes subscribers, and that we had no other intention in sending his bill, than to apprize him of that fact. We see no reason why he should be dissatisfied with us, and shall continue his paper, presuming that Br. Sanderson will account to us for vol. 9.

Br. G. Sanderson's residence is "Towanda, Pa."—Those disposed to blame us for any neglect of his, before the Herald was united with the Magazine, will please make their grievances known to him.

REMOVAL.—Br. Alfred Peck has removed from Pittsburg, Pa., to Westfield, Medina county, Ohio, where he labors a part of the time. Letters and papers intended for him, should be directed to the latter place.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.—Collection at Clinton, on last Sunday, $25.51. The collection in this city will be taken up next Sunday afternoon. A. B. G.

Br. Bazin—Send Expositor to Rev. P. Morse, Henderson, Jefferson county, and Rev. Wm. H. Griswold, Clinton, Oneida county, N. Y. They have each paid us $2. Also, send No. 1 of vol. 2 to Rev. O. Wilcox, Fowler, St. Lawrence county. He never received it.

We have also received $2 each. of Rev. S. Goff, Alexander, Genesee county, John S. Avery, Frankfort, Herkimer county, and L. E. Harrington, Akron, Erie county, N. Y.

Br. Tompkins—Send Repository to Mr. Cowdry, Mecca, Trumbull county, O., S. L. Knight, Fayetteville, Onondaga county, and Miss Matilda J. Hall, Geneva, N. Y. Credit the two former each $2, and charge G. and H. Also, credit Ezra Gordon, North Norwich, $2 for current vol., Isaac Earl, Van Buren, Onondaga county, current and next vol's., $4, and John Sherwin, Governeur, St. Lawrence county, Miss Sophia Healey, Oppenheim, Herkimer county, Rhoda Warner, S. H. Morse, Henderson, Jefferson county, N. Y., and L. A. Veet, Fowler, O., each $2, and charge G. and H.

Br. Price—Send Union to James Raymond, Edwards, St. Lawrence county. Credit him $2, and charge G. and H. Also, credit Rev. O. Wilcox, Fowler, $2.50, and charge G. and H.

Br. Price—Send back numbers to Elisha G. (instead of F. R.) Stephens, Hornelsville, Steuben county.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

AN EXPOSITION OF SCRIPTURE.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

"Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling."—PHIL. ii: 12.

Reader, here is an injunction that merits some attention: not because there is any thing incomprehensible, unintelligible, or mysterious in it; but because tradition, popular tradition, has perverted and most cruelly tortured its primitive meaning. However, not to trouble you with a tiresome exordium, I will offer only a remark or two relative to the common view of the passage, and then present you with "mine opinion."

1. You know that the text has generally been understood as teaching the doctrines of immortal salvation and damnation—man's free agency in choosing which destiny he pleased, and the full efficacy of good works in escaping the latter, and securing the former. And it may be proper to remark here, that this understanding of the matter, is founded upon the supposition, that Paul was addressing unbelievers—sinners, who were on the road, and exposed, to eternal death.

2. But to make a long matter short: Was Paul addressing unholy and sinful characters? "I have always thought so," says the reader. Then you have always thought wrong. To demonstrate this assertion, just read the whole verse. Here it is. "Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out," etc. Is such the language of Paul to vile and licentious unbelievers? Not at all. He was addressing true believers—his faithful brethren in the truth, as above proved. This matter being amicably settled, the features of the subject are at once changed, you see, from black to white—from frowns to smiles—from terror to peace.

3. It being settled therefore, that Paul was addressing believers—saints—it may next be inquired, What was the salvation which they were to "work out?" It was certainly a salvation which they had, for it is called their "own." And further; it was a salvation which they were to work out, not a salvation which they were to work themselves into at some future period. In a word, it was that special salvation which every true believer had received, "through sanctification of the spirit, and belief of the truth," and in which he "rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory." Jesus says to a certain individual, "thy faith hath saved thee;" and Paul says to his brethren, "salvation is come unto the Gentiles." Jesus says to another individual, "this day is salvation come unto this house." These testimonies are sufficient to show, that the salvation which those believers had received, and were to work out, was constituted of the doctrinal and practical principles of that Gospel in which they stood, surrounded by an unbelieving and persecuting world.

4. In what manner were they to work out this salvation, or the ennobling and happifying principles constituting the salvation which they had received, and which was therefore their "own"? Simply by continuing to act upon these excellent principles, being governed by the same pure motives, and cherishing the holy disposition, which were exhibited by the merciful Redeemer—going on, exemplifying, illustrating and enforcing the glorious truths of the Gospel, by the exercise of charity, mercy and peace, among mankind. This is the way they were to "work out" their "own salvation." A confirmation of this truth, may be seen in Paul's letter to the Hebrews, "Therefore, leaving the first principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God." Here the same sentiment embraced in the text, is enforced.

5. But what is meant by "fear and trembling"? Nothing more nor less, than that humility, self-abasement, and virtuous diffidence, which every true Christian feels, when going forward in the discharge of his religious obligations, and realizing his responsibilities, his imperfections, the difficulties he is compelled to encounter, and the dangers to which he is exposed of being led astray. It is perfectly consistent to "work out," or illustrate and exemplify the principles of the Gospel "with fear and trembling." This is the manner in which salvation, or the principles of Gospel truth, was worked out, by the primitive disciples. What does Paul say to his Corinthian brethren, in reference to the feelings that agitated his mind, while he labored among them? Hear him, "I was with you in fear and trembling." Hear him again, where, in his second letter to the same brethren, he is highly commending their sincerity, zeal and faithfulness, and speaking of the effect which his private representation of them had had upon the mind of Titus—"And his inward affection is more abundant toward you, whilst he remembers the obedience of you all, how with fear and trembling ye received him." Once more: Paul says to his Ephesian brethren, "be obedient with fear and trembling." But the testimony adduced, is more than sufficient to establish the view which I have taken of this matter of fear and trembling; and also to show, that it was not the apprehension of death and hell—wrath and endless wo, which caused fear and trembling among the primitive Christians, while they were engaged in working out, or illustrating in their lives and conduct, their "own salvation." But I have done. I had intended to gratify the expressed wish of my esteemed brother—the Editor—by writing a short article. But I have disappointed both him and myself, and in another sense, perhaps, the reader. I'll try again anon.

That's right! try often. A. B. G.

For the Magazine and Advocate

"EVIL PURSUETH SINNERS."

BY REV. WM. ROUNSVILLE.

If there is a truth plainly revealed in the Volume of inspiration, it is the doctrine that every one "shall receive for that which he hath done." And yet, there are various opinions entertained upon this subject.—While some believe, that "God will by no means clear the guilty," others hold that a way has been devised by which the transgressor may escape the penalty of the broken law. This idea, probably, arose from the fact, that, according to the generally received opinion, some method must be instituted to avert the conclusion that God had designed the endless perdition of all the human race. For none can deny, that if endless wo be the penalty of the law, and all have transgressed that law, every individual should receive this horrid punishment. But this would go farther than any would be disposed to follow—of course a plan must be formed whereby some could escape the punishment they deserved.—Hence arose the belief, that the justice of God could be satisfied by the infliction of a certain amount of pain upon an innocent individual; while the guilty transgressor was permitted to escape. Thus, after having founded their creed upon error, it became necessary to form the superstructure of the same material, to preserve proportion and appearances.

How much trouble would have been avoided, had the doctrine obtained, that "evil pursueth sinners"—had the words of the wise man been regarded as truth, that the wicked shall be recompensed in the earth. Let us follow truth instead of the creeds and commandments of men. Reader, which do you follow?

For the Magazine and Advocate.

JESUS THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"Then spake Jesus again unto them, saying, I am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life."—JOHN viii: 12.

Jesus is distinguished in a great variety of ways in the Scriptures; but we know of no title given to him, more appropriate and striking, than the one contained in the above passage. And we have thought that if we could sketch a few of its beauties, we might interest the reader, and perhaps persuade him to study the excellencies of the brightest and purest Character that has ever been displayed before mortal eyes. It is worthy of remark, that Jesus communicated both moral and natural light. He not only opened the natural eye, but he also opened the eyes of the understanding. He had command over both the natural and moral world. He could make the mind and the body whole. No disease, either of body or mind, was too inveterate for him to remove. And it is remarkable that he never refused to do either even to the vilest of our race.

But in what sense is the Redeemer the light of the world? There are several qualities in light, which may all be applied to Jesus and his mission. 1. It is not in the power of light to create; it can only show us plainly what already exists. 2. Light is wonderfully adapted to the human eye. 3. Light is inexhaustible; otherwise we should live in constant fear of eternal night. 4. Light is impartial; having no favorite to bless. Now Jesus is the light of the moral world, as the sun is the light of the natural world. Man can no more do without Jesus, than he can do without the light of day. As natural light follows in the track of the sun, so does moral light follow in the path of Jesus. "Without me," said the great Saviour, "ye can do nothing." All systems of religion, where Jesus is not taken for a guide, must sooner or later come to nought.

1. Jesus did not come to create truth. He came to reveal what had been true from all eternity. No being can create truth. Man might as well attempt the creation of a God, as to think of bringing the simplest truth into being. "She is not of created things, and is therefore exempt from their destiny. God's well-beloved daughter knows neither age nor decay. Before the work of creation began, she was with the Father of all things; and when time shall have ceased to be, she will stand before his throne, and still bask in the living light of the ineffable presence." Jesus came to shed light on the character of God. He revealed him to the world as a Father. Man now can repose the utmost confidence in God; for he feels that he is his best friend. Jesus presented human duty in a clearer light than was ever seen before. A great many systems of moral philosophy have been presented to the world, but the system of Jesus excels them all. It is comprehensive and exactly adapted to the mind. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Can any thing be more excellent? These two commands of God are binding on every moral being throughout the universe, and the time can never arrive when man will cease to be amenable to these laws. But we must not dwell here, as other traits in Jesus demand our attention.

2. Jesus adapted the truths which he taught, to the human understanding, as natural light is adapted to the eye of man. That is, he communicated truth in such a single and plain manner, that the lowest mind could comprehend him.—His usual form was by parables, the most pleasing medium through which truth can be presented. Hence, when he taught, the multitudes thronged to hear him. Jesus "knew what was in man," and, therefore, he was well qualified to reach his heart. Truth never appeared in such a lovely form before. It won the affections, and man paid homage to the great moral teacher sent from heaven. In a word, there was every thing so grand in doctrine and so delightful in manner, that the people might well exclaim, "Surely, never man spake like this man!"

3. The moral light of Jesus is inexhaustible. Though our earth were crowded with inhabitants, there would be natural light enough for them all. The sun was designed for the whole of our globe, and it shines alike upon the palace of the rich, and the humble cottage of the poor. So God designed the moral light of heaven for all, and all will ultimately enjoy the beams of the Sun of Righteouness. As the morning flower turns to receive the rays of the sun, so will the mind, in due time, turn to Jesus to receive that light which he brought from heaven.

4. Jesus, as a moral light, is impartial. He has no favorites: all are alike objects of his grace. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, not to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved." "It is a light thing," said Jehovah, speaking through the medium of his prophet, "to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and restore the preserved of Israel; I will give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the ends of the earth." Can such language mean any thing less than the happiness of the whole world? It would be derogatory both to the character of Jehovah and his Son, to suppose that any thing short of the salvation of the world, was intended in the Gospel plan. Indeed, the comparison would be lost, which Jesus designed to draw between himself and the natural light of day. As well contend that the sun was not made for all, as to assert that Jesus was not sent to be the Saviour of the world.

But let us turn to the great moral truth connected with our subject, by Jesus himself. "He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." A more beautiful and delicate expression was never dropped before. It seems to contain a world of meaning. It presents a truth that should be engraven on every heart. Jesus is the true "light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Yet many seem to love darkness rather than light.—Thousands follow their own devices in preference to the precepts of the great Redeemer. But by following Jesus, we may understand walking according to his example.

In him we discover humility. Behold him at the Last Supper, washing the feet of his disciples, thereby teaching them a great moral lesson. "Ye call me Master and Lord, and ye say well; for so I am. If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye ought also to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done to you. If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." Now we must follow our Saviour in this virtue, the noblest that can adorn the human character. If we do this, we shall not walk in darkness, but we shall have the clear light of truth shining in our path. He that walketh in pride is in darkness; he knows not whither he goeth.

In Jesus we discover great benevolence; a benevolence every way adequate to the wants of man. It was untiring and inexhaustible in its very nature. He went about doing good. Disease in every form presented itself, and he removed it by a word. There was no affliction too great for him to console; no wound too deep for him to cure. The blind received their sight, the deaf heard, and even the dead heard his voice and came forth. Finally, he closed his eventful life by the most striking manifestation of love ever presented. He even prayed for his enemies in that inimitable prayer, the spirit of which, we should all aim to breathe: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

There are many other interesting traits in Jesus; but we must leave them, as our article has already exceeded the limits which we designed. We trust the reader will be guided by this light sent from heaven, and if he will be led by it, he will find himself in the true path to happiness, and will have the light of life."

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SHORT SERMONS—NO. III.

BY A LAY PREACHER.

"I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago, (whether in the body I can not tell; or whether out of the body I can not tell: God knoweth;) such an one caught up to the third heaven."—2 Cor. xii: 2.

The passage of Scripture which I have taken for a motto to the following discourse, will undoubtedly surprise all who may read it: indeed, I never heard it preached from, nor do I remember that I ever heard it quoted in a sermon.—Nevertheless, if I am not greatly mistaken, it will open a field for inquiry, that may, in the end, reconcile the jarring opinions which so many professed Christians have entertained respecting the punishment for sin in a future state of existence.

That sin, not only merits, but will receive, adequate punishment, no believer in Christianity denies. But the great questions are, What shall be the nature of this punishment, and where shall it be received? Some believe that the punishment for sin will be administered in the same state of existence where it is committed—because, if not so, the very instigator of sin, the earthly part of man, will escape a just retribution of reward. Others believe that punishment for sin committed in this world will be received in a future state of existence—where a place of fire and brimstone is prepared to plunge the spirit of the sinner into, where he must lie weltering in the lava of molten brimstone as long as God exists. In this postulate, the punishment appears evidently to be out of all manner of proportion to the crime; and must have sprang from the head, and not the heart, of its first contriver and advocate. It must appear to all reflecting minds to be impossible for any human being to realize a belief in this horrid doctrine. If they could, it would seem, that they must loathe the very food that sustains them—that sleep could not be refreshing—that the horrors presented to their minds, would alienate them from all joy, all comfort, and all happiness, in this world. Moreover, it would be impossible to love a Being, whose nature was allied to such cruelty. But thanks be to God, this is not the character of our heavenly Father. "God is love," therefore this horrid doctrine is not founded in truth.

The outward belief in this dreadful doctrine, no doubt originated in the mind of the believer, from the supposition, that the sinner enjoyed more happiness in this world, than did the professor of righteousness; and not being able to look into the sinner's heart, and forgetting to look into his own, he could not bear the idea of going to heaven in such company. We will not suppose that self-righteousness had any thing to do in making up this conclusion, but merely ask, How this righteous man could conceive of such an infinite difference between his situation and the supposed sinner? He, according to his own showing, to be wafted to the realms of eternal felicity, and the sinner to be plunged into never ending misery and wo!

Now, in order to satisfy our limitarian brethren that there is a reasonable and rational difference of situation, and of happiness, in the world to come, between the more and the less righteous, in this world, I now present them with a system that will do away all jealousies on this subject, if they will but consult their hearts, as well as their heads—a system that will reconcile the justice of God, with his goodness.

I now return to my motto for further light on the subject. I shall take it for granted, that no one will deny that Paul, himself, was the man taken up to the third "third heaven;" because, whether it was him, or some one else, can make no difference in the object I have in view—as Paul "knew a man," etc. Paul then says, that he was "caught up to the third heaven." Now if there be a third heaven, there must be a first, and a second heaven. And if there be three heavens beyond our earthly abode, they are all undoubtedly calculated for a particular use, because an infinitely wise and good Being would never make any thing without a purpose. For what use, then, are these heavens? In answering this inquiry, we can obtain but little aid from the Scriptures. Indeed, directly, not any—we must draw from inference, to form our conclusions.

I believe it is admitted by all sects of Christians, that happiness, in a future state of existence at least, comes to the participant, from his true knowledge of God, and Jesus Christ. How then can we better dispose of the millions on millions, of the human race, that leave this world with but a very imperfect knowledge of God, and not the least knowledge, at all, of Jesus Christ, than to place them in the first heaven, as the alphabet to this knowledge. Here they might be taught the first rudiments of that knowledge so necessary to their induction into a place of greater happiness, which they may find in the second heaven. And by still perfecting themselves in this knowledge, they might at last be admitted into the third heaven, where their happiness would be complete.

Knowledge is progressive in relation to matters of a heavenly nature, as well as in the sciences. And if to know God, and Jesus Christ, and him crucified, be necessary to our happiness in a future state of existence, it must be learned some where. If it can be taught no where except in this world, then a majority of the human family must be plunged into remediless wo, because they did not learn that which they had no means to learn, and never heard of. Such a notion as this would not only impeach the justice of God, but it would destroy his goodness also. But we have a sure warrant against this alternative. The Scriptures declare, that "all shall know the Lord, from the least unto the greatest." They also declare, "that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

Now it would be impossible to confess all this, without first obtaining a knowledge of it. And if they do not get this knowledge, in this world, what better place can be devised for obtaining it, than in the heavens I have been speaking of, and which the Scriptures point out? Those most ignorant of this knowledge, we will suppose commence their lessons in the first heaven, instructed by preceptors, or ministering angels, from the second—those in the second heaven, from the third, until the fulness of times, when all shall be united into one band of brothers, and ministering angels, before the throne of God, in the third heaven.

It may reasonably be supposed that some obtain such a knowledge of God, and of Christ, and him crucified, in this world, as, at death, to go immediately to the second heaven; but it is greatly to be doubted whether any are so perfected in this knowledge, before the spirit leaves the body, as to be admitted at once into the third heaven. No doubt the ancient prophets, and the immediate disciples and apostles of our Saviour, and many Christians in the early days of Christianity, had obtained the necessary knowledge for admittance into the highest heaven. But in these days, where shall we find the proper candidates?

But lest my readers should want more evidence of there being more heavens than one, I will now refer them to the tenth chapter and fourteenth verse of Deuteronomy, and 1 Kings vii: 27.—the heaven of heavens here spoken of, I suppose to be the third and highest heaven. I adopt this system then, for the following reasons:

1. Because it places the great Creator of all things, in the light of a kind and benevolent Father in relation to the human family.

2. Because the plan is not repugnant to common sense, and sound reason.

3. Because it does away all necessity of punishment in a future state of existence—unless the want of more knowledge, and consequently, more happiness, may be considered punishment.

4. Because it gives such who merit higher rewards than others, the certainty of obtaining them when they leave this world. And this ought to satisfy the most fastidious of Limitarians, who feel a repugnance in going to heaven in company with those they consider wicked.

I have long been anxious to see brought about more rational and consistent views on this subject, on the part of our Limitarian brethren. Is not God our Father—the Father of us all—and why should there be so much discord in the great family of man—especially in relation to the character of our great Father?—He has enough for all his children. Why then should one part of the family try to thrust another part out of their inheritance? This violent part of the family should know, that heaven can not be taken by storm—that God, our Father, is perfectly independent—without variableness, or shadow of changing. They can not alter his purposes. If the zeal of this violent party, is "a zeal according to knowledge," no doubt our Father in heaven will reward them for it, and place them in a higher heaven than the less energetic of his children can claim. In our "Father's house there are many mansions;" and no doubt we shall all find rooms suited to our several capacities, furnished in such style, as the knowledge we have acquired may allow us to understand.

But lest this discourse should lose the characteristic of a "short sermon," I now conclude.

Sheshequin, Pa. J. K.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1839.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. III.

GEHENNA.

On the South side of Jerusalem, at the foot of Mount Zion, which there formed an abrupt precipice, is a valley, in ancient times denominated the "valley of the son of Hinnom," originally belonging to the son of Hinnom Speaking of the lot of the tribe of Judah, it is said, "And the border went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom, unto the south side of the Jebusite; which is Jerusalem."—Josh. xv: 8. In the directions which God gave to the prophet Jeremiah, he said, "And go forth unto the valley of the son of Hinnom, which is by the entry of the east gate, and proclaim there the words that I shall tell thee."—xix: 2. These quotations decide the situation of the valley—it was on the south side of the city, and was commanded by a high precipice, so that the inhabitants of Jerusalem were as well and familiarly acquainted with it, as the dwellers of Auburn are with the State Prison.

It appears from Moses, whose instruction anticipated the coming of future evil upon his people, that the Jews were prone to idolatry, by turning from the Lord who had brought them from Egypt. Hence it was said, "Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Moloch, he shall surely be put to death; the people of the land shall stone him with stones."—Lev. xx: 2. But notwithstanding this prophetical warning, the Jews did turn away from the worship of the true God, to bow to an idol, and not only to bow to an idol, but to offer human sacrifices to it. Hence it is said, "And they have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my heart."—Jer. vii: 31. In stating the crimes of king Ahaz, the following is given—"Moreover, he burnt incense in the valley of the son of Hinnom, and burnt his children in the fire, after the abomination of the Heathen, whom the Lord had cast out before the children of Israel."—2 Chron. xxviii: 3. Of Manassch it was also said, "And he caused his children to pass through the fire in the valley of the son of Hinnom."—2 Chron. xxxiii: 6. The god Moloch, to whom they offered such horrible sacrifices, was a brazen figure. "If we may credit the Rabbins," says Professor M. Stuart, "the head of the idol was like that of an ox; while the rest of the body resembled that of a man. It was hollow within; and being heated by fire, children were laid into its arms and were there literally roasted alive."—Ex. Essays, p. 140. Dr. Campbell says, that a particular part of the valley was called Tophet, from Toph, a drum, used to drown the cries of the burning infants.—Diss. 6, Part 2, Sec. 1.

When the good king Josiah came to the throne in Jerusalem, horror-struck with such abominations, he put an end to the idolatry. "And he defiled Tophet, which is in the valley of the children of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Moloch."—2 Kings xxiii: 10. M. Stuart says—"After these sacrifices (of children to idols) had ceased, the place was desecrated and made one of loathing and horror. The pious king Josiah caused it to be polluted, i. e., he caused to be carried there the filth of the city of Jerusalem. It would seem, that the custom of desecrating this place, thus happily begun, was continued in after ages down to the period when our Saviour was on earth. Perpetual fires were kept up, in order to consume the offal which was deposited there. And as the same offal would breed worms, (for so all putrifying meat of course does,) hence came the expression, 'where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched.'"—Ex. Essays, p. 141. The valley was more especially made a place of loathing and horror among the Jews, because criminals were executed in it. The manner of the execution was thus—"They set the malefactor in a dunghill up to the knees; and they put a towel about his neck, and one pulled one way, and another the opposite, till, by thus strangling him, they forced him to open his mouth. They then poured boiling lead into his mouth, which went down into his belly, and so burnt his bowels. Tal. in Sanhedrin, per. 7." Lightfoot; quoted by Dr. A. Clarke, end of Matt. 5th chapter.

Among the original Greek of the New Testament, there is found the word gehenna, which is translated in our common Version by the English word hell, and occurs twelve times only. In this examination, it is important that we know the source from whence gehenna is derived, for on that depends the whole subject.—Campbell says, that gehenna is a compound of two Hebrew words, ge hinnom, the valley of Hinnom, a place near Jerusalem.—Dis. 6, Part 2, Sec. 1—that is, its derivation is from the very valley of Hinnom which we have been describing. So says Clarke—so says Stuart—and so say many commentators who were true men in defence of endless misery. We have thus far learned, that gehenna, in its original import, is the valley of Hinnom; that this valley was on the south of Jerusalem; that the Jews formerly burn their children to idols in it; that Josiah, to prevent such worship, made it the receptacle of all the filth of the city; that to consume this filth, a fire was kept continually burning; that it was burning in the time of our Lord; and that its smoke could be seen by all the inhabitants of Jerusalem. We can now discover why the prophet connected fire with the valley of Hinnom, when he said—"For Tophet is ordained of old; for the king it is prepared, he hath made it deep and large; the pile thereof is fire and much wood; the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it."—Isa. xxx: 33.

We now approach the important fact, that believers in ceaseless wo, contend that gehenna in the time of Christ, was used to designate a place of future, endless torment. But the interesting question arises, When did this change take place?—when was gehenna taken from its literal signification, and applied to a place of pain beyond the grave? Is it said that this change took place between the last prophet, Malachi, and the time of Christ? We answer; that this could not be, since the word does not occur in the apocryphal books which relate to that period; nor is it found in the works of Josephus. Am I told that it is used in the Jewish Targums to denote future wo? I answer, that a gentleman* well qualified for the duty, has examined these works, and he has found the word used in that sense only in the Targum of Jonathan Ben Uzziel. But even its usage in that Targum proves nothing; for, so far from its being clear that this work was written in the time of our Saviour, its age is doubtful; for Dr. Jahn puts it at the end of the third century, and others, as late as the eighth century. Even admitting all that is wished to be proved from it, its authority would be exceedingly doubtful, since our Saviour expressly warned his disciples, in a number of instances, against the traditions and doctrines of the Pharisees and Sadducees.

Is it said that this alteration is countenanced by the Old Testament writers? I answer, that so far from their giving any countenance to such alteration, they do positively refer to the valley of Hinnom, for an emblem of the earthly calamities which were to fall upon the Jews as a nation. This we shall show. Jeremiah, speaking of the valley of the son of Hinnom, says—"Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that it shall no more be called Tophet, nor the valley of the son of Hinnom, but the valley of slaughter; for they shall bury in Tophet till there shall be no place. And the carcasses of this people shall be meat for the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of the earth, and none shall fray them away."—Jer. vii: 32, 33. It appears to me, that this prophecy refers to the ultimate destruction of the Jewish people, simply from the fact, that Josephus, in his account of the Roman and Jewish war, records its complete fulfilment. In the 5th book, chaps. 12 and 13 of his Jewish War, we are taught, that notwithstanding the abhorrence with which the Jews viewed the valley of Hinnom, yet, in the siege of the city, multitudes of dead bodies were cast over the walls into the valley—thus, according to the prophet, the valley of slaughter was the burial place of many of their dead. But the survivors were soon incompetent, from famine, to perform even the service of throwing the dead over the walls, and they were left on the spot where they breathed their last, until 600 000 encumbered the air and ground. So that they literally were food for the fowls of heaven and beasts of the earth, in the exact fulfilment of the prophet's language last cited.

There is another instance still more obvious in its application, if possible. God said to Jeremiah, "Go forth unto the valley of the son of Hinnom, which is by the entry of the east gate, and proclaim there the words that I shall tell thee." "Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that this place shall no more be called Tophet, nor the valley of the son of Hinnom, but the valley of slaughter. And I will make void the counsel of Judah and Jerusalem in this place; and I will cause them to fall by the sword before their enemies, and by the hand of them that seek their lives; and their carcasses will I give to be meat for the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of the earth. And I will cause them to eat the flesh of their sons and the flesh of their daughters, and they shall eat every one of the flesh of his friend in the siege and straitness wherewith their enemies, and they that seek their lives, shall straiten them." Jer. xix: 2, 6, 7, 9. In this instance, the valley of Hinnom is so obviously used as an emblem of the calamities which fell upon the Jews, that it needs no comment.

As it is clear, then, that the valley of Hinnom is used by the prophets to denote temporal destruction, as we have no proof that it was changed to mean endless misery; so we take the position, that in eleven out of the twelve instances where it occurs in the New Testament, its strict reference is to the impending judgments which were then hanging over the Jews. We will give a few reasons which confirm that position; reasons which we deem important to a right view of the subject.

1. Gehenna was addressed to Jews, and to Jews only; for it was never addressed to the Gentiles. This is a singular fact, if gehenna is the representative of a place of future torment. And what is more singular still, our Saviour only spoke it twice to the unbelieving, wicked Jews, those who were his murderers, and whom, we certainly think, he would have frequently threatened with the fire of Gehenna, if it means endless wo. In the other nine instances, it was addressed to the disciples, for the purpose of warning them against apostacy.

2. Gehenna was used by our Lord eleven times, and by James once; beside them, none of the New Testament writers use it. John the Baptist never used it;

* Rev. Hosea Ballou, 2d, of Roxbury, Mass.

John the Evangelist never used it, either in his Gospel, Epistles, or Revelation; Peter never alludes to it; nor does the apostle Paul refer to it in all his writings.—Now, if gehenna means endless misery, how is it that these persons never mentioned it in their preaching?—In the light of the common notions, this fact can never be made to agree with consistency. But consider that gehenna drew its power from a valley well known to the Jews, that its application was confined wholly to them; and we at once discover the reason why the apostles did not use it, and why it was not preached to the Gentiles.

C. W. M.

[To be continued.]

HONESTY, THE BEST POLICY.

It is a sentiment universally responded to, among enlightened people, and by all denominations, that an honest, upright course of conduct, and that alone, can secure to man, that which all are seeking, respectability and happiness. However much men may disagree in relation to the religious faith necessary to establish such a character, the character itself is, by precept at least, urged as an indispensable requisite to the enjoyment of peace. And we are by no means sorry that such is the case. For we firmly believe it to be true in every particular. Let it continue to be taught. Let the young man learn that a course of dishonesty and meanness, can never contribute to his real enjoyment; but that, on the contrary, it will certainly blast his prospects, corrupt his mind, and render him an object of contempt to the virtuous portion of community. And let the more advanced in life, know that while it infuses into his soul the corroding poison of blasted expectations, there is, at the same time, nothing which so outrages and libels the character of humanity, as dishonesty. I say, let this sentiment be instilled into the youthful mind, and let it grow with his growth, and strengthen with his strength, so that he may be able, under all circumstances, to resist with firmness and decision, every inducement which would tempt him from his integrity, whether that inducement be the deceitful invitations of corruption, wealth, or worldly fame; until he shall feel that to gain the world at the expense of honesty, will be but a shadow in comparison to the sacrifice which he has made.

But can this important truth be taught in no other way than that of precept? Is it true that this is a subject merely theoretical in its nature—one that will not admit of practical illustration? Must it be said, that many times those very persons who are most eager to secure to themselves the character of honest men, are the last to give any substantial encouragement to it in others? Alas! if we are guided by the customs and practices of the age, the answer must be a mortifying—a painful one.

Perhaps I shall be charged with misanthropy, for indulging in opinions so derogatory to the character of my fellow-beings. So be it. I am reckless of the charge, so long as I have stubborn facts to support my assertions. But let me caution the reader not to judge of my disposition, until he has carefully examined the conventionalities of the age. I am not disposed to predicate my estimation of mankind, upon their darkest qualities only, nor to indulge in utter hatred towards them, because some of them err. I behold in them, many redeeming qualities, which teach me that even the worst possess that which might raise them from degradation, and which will ultimately be the ruling principle of the soul. With such views and feelings, the charge of misanthropy would be unjust; and as such, let those prefer it who can feel honest in so doing.—But I have commenced this article, with the view of pointing out wherein men's practices are inconsistent with their precepts, in relation to one particular subject.

A parent teaches his child, that, to be respected among his fellow-beings, to be useful in the world, to enjoy life as it is his privilege to do, he must be honest. And his precepts are confirmed by the united voice of all who are interested in his welfare. The youth naturally and justly concludes, that an opposite course will lead to opposite results. And these contemplations, these teachings, form a principle of action in his mind, which, could they be cherished through life, would present an almost impenetrable barrier against the temptation to sin. But, alas, he has adopted a faith which is every where spoken against. Those who have pretended to be his friends, now class him with the most abandoned and vile wretches in community. Every thing that is mean and disgraceful, is charged, without distinction, upon all who are of his faith. And what are the consequences? Why, he remembers what those who now condemn him, have taught him. He remembers how often these very men have told him, that in order to secure their respect, he must be honest. This he has endeavored to do. And he now sees wherein they have falsified their words, by rendering hatred where respect was due. Thus, irritated by disappointment, he becomes indifferent to his conduct, concludes that the lessons which have been taught him are false, and abandons himself to iniquity; foolishly dreaming, that he may as well indulge his evil propensities, as to endure unjust censure for them.

I plead nothing in extenuation of this conduct. It betrays an unfortunate and criminal weakness. But let those beware, who thus use this weakness, in accomplishing the ruin of a brother.

But I have another example to present. In addition to the expectations already alluded to, which are excited in the mind of the youth, he is taught that honesty alone will ensure him success in business. And it is true, that success can not always follow the dishonest man. The retributions of justice will sooner or later fall upon his head. But how is this truth sustained in society? The young man commences his career in life, fully impressed with the importance of pure principles, and fully determined that no other principle shall govern his conduct. With an unimpeachable character, he goes out into the world, dependent, and resignedly dependent, upon his own exertions. But how is he received?—Obloquy and reproach are heaped upon his character, by the proud and haughty. With but a scanty employment, he is compelled to struggle with the most distressing poverty. How little does this comport with the aspirations of a pure heart! He looks around him, and discovers men of disgraceful character, occupying stations of trust and confidence.

He discovers men of good standing in society, retaining in their employ, those whose midnight revels, would shame the barbarian, and dishonor a brute.—This is the encouragement he receives for his honesty. Did I say it is all the encouragement? No, if he would follow these objects of favoritism to their secret haunts, if he could see the sin-debased mind within them, and scan the deep and withering throes of self-condemnation, and the harrowings of a guilty conscience, he would go to his home of poverty, more than ever convinced that honesty is the best policy. If he could realize the moral condition of those who purchase their gratification at the expense of another's ruin, who wink at, and encourage vice, who bribe a fellow-being from his integrity to do jobs for them, which they are ashamed to do for themselves, he would never covet their situation, even though they roll in wealth. But these things he can not see. He only observes what is public. And that leads him to suspect that the wise and virtuous are not the objects of respect and love, and he falls from the proud eminence of integrity, into the dark gulf of iniquity. Here is his crime. It is for not continuing in his uprightness, in spite of the hollowness of the pretenders around him. It is for not feeling, that though there are those who preach morality, while they strengthen the hands of the immoral by their examples, they are unworthy of his contemplations. What then must be the crime of those who encourage vice, by giving to the unprincipled that which belongs to the virtuous? Let the improvement of future ages answer.—From them only can we expect a just answer. For a reformation in this respect, can not be expected, until men learn that it is their duty, not only to instruct the rising generation in righteousness, but also to sustain those that they instruct.

Is it asked, how this reformation is to be effected? I reply: Let the mechanic see that he does not foster and encourage the determined criminal, to the exclusion of more honest men. Let the merchant be careful that he does not minister to the vice and extravagance of the vicious, while the noble minded and the trusty are suffering for want of employment. Let the most influential see that they do not smile upon the mean and unworthy, nor pass the worthy by with contempt. Not that I would recommend proscriptive measures. But I would suggest, that frequently the honest and praiseworthy are compelled to give place to those who would be more honest, if they were less trusted, and do better for themselves and for community, if they were kept in the station where they belong, and where they could have less means to be vicious. I would have the encouragement and the respectability which belongs to man, determined, not by vicious and corrupt favoritism, but by a moral test. If this were the case, many who are worthy of the confidence of society, but who receive it not, and those who enjoy confidence which they are unworthy of, would exchange places, and those who are successfully taught to be honest, would discover that the precept and example of their teachers accompany each other. So mote it be.

A. R. B.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. E. E. Guild, in the school-house near P. Hanson's, in Meredith, at 10 A. M., and in the Cade school-house in Davenport, at 1 P. M.—Br. J. French, at South Champion.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in March, by Br. J. French, at Tylersville, South Rutland—Br. E. E. Guild, at Richmondville, at 11 A. M.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in March, by Br. E. E. Guild, in the school-house in the Houghtailing Settlement, in Davenport, at 10 o'clock, A. M., and at the Cade school-house at 1 P. M.—Br. J. French, at Denmark—Br. Delong, at Tully, forenoon, afternoon and evening.

Br. E. E. Guild, will preach on the evenings of February 25th, in the Christian meeting-house at Laurens village—March 5th, at Decatur—7th, at Colliersville—11th and 12th, at the Cade school-house. See Sunday notices.

Union please copy.

The third Quarterly Conference of the Black River Association of Universalists, will be attended at Antwerp, on the last Wednesday and Thursday, 27th and 28th of this month. Ministering brethren are particularly requested to attend. P. Morse, Standing Clerk.

A Quarterly Conference will be held in Massena, on the fourth Saturday and following Sunday in the present month. Ministering brethren invited to attend—Brs. Briggs and Wilcox in particular.

E. A. Garfield.

There will be a Conference held in Columbus Centre, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in March.—Ministering brethren, by the request of our friends, are particularly invited to give their attendance.

T. J. Smith.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

P M, Crary, (Mich) for self and W M—D H P, Oppenheim for S H—P M, Borodino, (Mich) for A B and H F—Rev O A, Geneva, for P P, T S and J G—A B Q, Schenectady, for self Mrs L and W C—Rev N S, Ann Arbor, (Mich) for H S, D S, E H U, E G, W W W, L McD, I D, S C, S K J, R B, J S, E A W, P W, N G and J C McG—J R, Albany, for self and J B—P M, Canal, for A D and C C C—Rev P M, Henderson—Rev J F, Denmark, for self, L P, E H, J A S, S S and L P—L B R, South Adams, (Mass)—P M, Moyatrose, (Pa) for U N and S G—P M, Fayetteville, for S L K—T R H, Norwich, (Ct)—P M, Clarendon, for J K, S W and J A S—P M, Harpersfield, (O) for D S—P M, Nelson, for Mrs B and S C J—E G, North Norwich, for self, C P, S W, E W C, N O W, A B, H N, A C, D J, G W B and A A—Rev S R S, Albany, for S A H and J C—Mrs H, Appling—P M, Oswego, for S I, G S, G C, J L, J P Jr, and G B—F P, Elba, for self, M S and S H—Rev W H W, Watertown, for N M H, H J S, N W S, J E M, J W, D H and J C—O D D, East Richfield—I P, Geneva, for D S, E McD, J M S and N R—P M, Clockville, for S P and M S—A H P, Hunter, for S G and A R B—P M, Champion S Road, for N R, W T, E P, D S, J D, D O D, S L D, O H D, J S B and M L—P M, North Smithfield, (Pa) for W S P—A V, Lafayette, for self and A P—P M, Union village, for A V O—S G A, Onondaga, for self, S H, E J. E L and C H W.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SONG OF DEVOTION.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Why, when love's voice falters,
Why, when bright smiles flee,
Why, when the fond eye alters,
Do I turn to gaze on Thee?

Because thy smile ne'er saddens,
And I meet no cold reply,
And my drooping spirit gladdens
In the soft glance of thine eye.

Why, when a rude laugh greets me,
And light words flow too free;
Why, when a mock smile meets me,
Do I turn and yearn for Thee?

Because thy glance is holy,
And thy words are true and deep,
And I can kneel me lowly,
Nor blush to sweetly weep.

But not to weep in sadness,
Do I lonely bend my knee—
My life will e'er be gladness,
While I can trust in Thee.

"She had lost her mother; her father had long been dead; she was young and friendless!"—The Diamond.

LINES SUGGESTED ON READING THE ABOVE.

Thou art gone—thou art gone! and hast left me alone,
O'er the world's uncongenial desert to roam;
Not a smile—not a kind welcome word have I known,
Since with thee, oh! my mother, I lost, too, my home!
O'! what—what is left me my sadness to smother,
Now thou—thou art gone, oh! my mother—my mother!

Bright days—joyous days—there may yet be in store
For the sad, and the wretched, the half broken hearted;
But I, once so happy, can be so no more,
Since all that endeared me to life are departed!
Some tell me to "look for a friend in another;"
But where shall I find one like thee—oh! my mother?

Yet hope—one bright hope—e'en to me is still left,
'Tis all I can look to, my sadness to cheer;
Of all comfort but this, I, alas! am bereft,
To me of all others, by far the most dear;
For the thoughts which can cheer, which my sorrows can smother,
Is, that soon I must join thee, my mother, dear mother!

THE WIFE OF A LITERARY MAN.

A woman fit to be the wife of a literary man, must indeed be a woman; she must combine in her character all those pleasing attributes which we often find described, but so rarely met with in real life. She must be neither selfish in feeling, vain, prodigal nor passionate. She must be one who will not marry where she can not respect, and, when she has consented to lay aside her virgin honors, one who will love her husband with a devotion which shall waive every other consideration, but that of duty to her God. She must be even more than this; she must be self-sacrificing in disposition, and be willing to endure much loneliness; and also learn, if she has not already, to have a fondness for her husband's pursuits, in which case she will receive a return which will be dearer far than all the world can offer. A man of literary pursuits sins against himself and the woman he marries, if he takes one who is but a votary of fashion—whose empire is the drawing room, and not in the seclusions of domestic life. And if he marry a literary pedant, he will be still more unfortunate, unless the pedantry be that of a young, active, and inquiring mind, which is pleased with its first essay into the regions of learning. She should not resemble the first wife of Milton, whom the poet married from sudden fancy. Unable to endure his literary habits, and finding his house too solitary for her romping disposition, she beat his nephews, and conveyed herself away at the expiration of the honey-moon! Nor like the wife of Bishop Cooper, who, jealous of his books, consigned the labors of many years to the flames. Nor like the wife of Sir Henry Seville, whose affection was so strong as to cause her frequently to destroy his most valuable manuscripts; because they monopolized so much of his attention. Neither should she resemble in character Mrs. Barclay, who made both herself and husband ridiculous, by her great public admiration of his abilities, she considering him little less than a demigod. She should either be like the lady of Dacier, who was his equal in erudition, and his superior in taste, but whose good sense caused her to respect and give place to her husband at all times and on all occasions, and whose love for him kept her from the slightest feeling of presumption because she was his equal in mind—or as the wife of Wieland, a domestic woman, who, though not much given to study, was of a calm, even temperament, and always soothed instead of exciting her husband's irritable disposition. A literary man, in choosing a wife, should not look so much for shining abilities, as for a clear, discriminating judgment, and a warm and affectionate heart. A combination of these qualities, if he be not an unreasonable, cross-grained tyrant, will be sure to bring domestic felicity.

[From the Ladys' Book.]

LOST TIME.

A FRAGMENT.

How beautifully and how truly, has it been said that "blessings brighten as they take their flight," and in nothing is this truth more conspicuous than in the matter of education. Whilst enjoying the privilege of the means of cultivating our minds, how frequently do we slight these means, or at least but partially and imperfectly improve them. We are too apt to imagine that in after years, by application and industry, we may atone for the neglect of our youth; but how mistaken is this idea! When we have become emancipated from the duties and pleasures of the school room, other duties devolve upon us, society has its claims upon our time, and little leisure remains for the improvement of our minds. And if we find it difficult to add to our attainment, how much more so will it be to acquire that knowledge of which we should have been possessed before? After the means of improvement are in a great measure beyond our reach, how much is their importance augmented, and the duties of our station as scholars appear far less irksome, and the pleasures much heightened when we know those days are passed! When we arrive at more mature years, how do our neglected advantages and misspent moments rise up in fearful array, and how sincerely and earnestly do we wish we could recall those days, and how differently we think we should act were it in our power to live them over again! But, no doubt, if such a thing were possible, the same thoughtlessness and carelessness would mark our conduct. We are too prone to slight present advantages, in the vain hope of making future reparation for it. This has been the experience of almost every one; and let it serve a useful purpose by being a warning to us; and by thus avoiding a similar course of conduct, we shall also escape its consequences.

MARRIAGES.

In Salisbury, February 5th, at the residence of N. Dibble, Esq., by Rev. M. B. Smith, Mr. JOHN BLISS, son of Capt. Wm. Bliss, to Miss ANN ELIZA DIBBLE.

Also, at same place, on the 6th inst., by the same, Mr. EDWIN TUTTLE, to Miss HANNAH DIBBLE, all of Salisbury.

DEATHS.

At Crow Meadow, Ills., September 19th, Mr. ERASTUS RANSOM, son of Robert and Lucy Ransom, of Fenner, Madison county, N. Y., aged 23 years.

The deceased was a young man of high intellectual endowments, amiable disposition, and better still, he possessed a reputation and character based on the imperishable principles of truth, integrity, and moral rectitude—a treasure, compared with which, all the gaudy mazes of worldly grandeur, sink into insignificance. His loss is severely felt by a large circle of relatives and acquaintances. May the God of all consolation, sanctify this dispensation of his providence to the benefit of all who feel the affliction. A sermon on the occasion, was delivered at his father's, December 16th, by Rev. J. C. Eddy, from Ps. xvii: 15. "I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness."

At the residence of Mr. R. Gilmore, New-Hartford, A. FERDINAND, youngest son of Addison R. and Harriet Gilmore, of Syracuse, aged 3 years. The bereaved parents were on a visit to their relatives and friends, when thus called to mourn the departure of a loved one. Their child was attacked with the croup, on the 29th ult., (his birth day,) and being of a strong and robust constitution, his sufferings were very severe, until the evening of February 4th, when death released the struggling captive, and God called its spirit home to himself. His sufferings were endured with a firmness, and a yielding to the wishes of those who ministered unto him, remarkable for one of his age.

Thus was cut down in the bloom of health and beauty, one who was the pride and hope, not only of his parents, and grand parents, and an extensive circle of relatives, among whom is the writer, to all of whom he was deeply endeared, but of all who had witnessed the uncommon energy of his expanding mind. How mournfully different is the reality, from the anticipation which gladdened the hearts of the parents, when they started on their journey of filial and social love. May God strengthen the mourners, and enable them, by faith, to behold the time when they shall meet the lost one, in the mansions of eternal bliss, to part no more forever.

A. R. B.

In Hamilton, December 27th, EUNICE C., daughter of Charles P. and Sarah Conger, aged 6 months and 22 days.

"SONGS OF ZION."

Just published and for sale at the "Trumpet" office, No. 40, Cornhill, (Up stairs,) the NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY, entitled, "SONGS OF ZION; OR THE CAMBRIDGE COLLECTION OF SACRED MUSIC; designed for the Church, for the Social Meetings of Christians, and for Family Worship; comprising a rich variety of the most popular tunes, anthems, etc., with many pieces from various authors, never before published, written expressly for this work; arranged with a figured bass for the Organ and Piano Forte. To which is prefixed a Familiar Introduction to the art of Singing, designed for the aid of those who are entirely unacquainted with the science of music; the Instruction being reduced to great plainness and simplicity." By THOMAS WHITTEMORE. Fifth Edition, enlarged and revised, containing eight additional pages of original anthems, for Temperance Celebrations, without any increase of price. Persons acquainted with the science of harmony are requested to call and examine this work.

This book contains upwards of three hundred tunes, of a great variety of metres. In addition to these, there are upwards of 100 pages of Anthems.

It has upwards of 350 pages of the size of the "Boston Academy's Collection;" and will be sold at the same price. The author pledges himself to the public, that neither pains nor expense have been spared to render this work correct, in its scientific, and elegant in its mechanical execution.

This work is very particularly recommended in cases where different denominations of Christians unite in "Union Singing Schools." On the great theme of praise all Christians agree; we can all unite our hearts and voices in celebrating the praises of God and the Redeemer, and the glories of eternity. In a great number of cases, the whole hymn is put upon the same page with the tune, which will be very convenient in singing these tunes as voluntaries. There are many most excellent hymns inserted entire, which appear in no hymn book in common use.

Boston, September 29, 1838.

UNIVERSALIST UNION.

This publication, as its title imports, is in defence of the final Restitution—in other words, the ultimate holiness and happiness of all men. A portion of it is devoted to miscellany of strict moral tendency. No efforts are spared to make it an instructive and interesting periodical—a welcome visiter in the domestic circle.

The publication of a highly interesting series of original articles, under the title—"JOURNAL OF A PHYSICIAN"—has just been commenced in its columns, and will be continued weekly throughout the present volume, and completed with it. They contain, "Observations on men and things, during several years peregrinations through Poland, Russia, Germany, France," etc., and are from the pen of an eminent European Physician. This work alone, though occupying but about one-eighth of the paper, it is believed, will be deemed worth the entire subscription.

The Union is a large super royal sheet, published weekly, and is now issued in two forms—Quarto and Octavo. Terms, $2 per annum for the Quarto, and $2 50 for the Octavo. The first No. of the 4th Vol. was issued November 10, 1838. The numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Specimen numbers also may be had on application at the Publishing Office, No. 130, Fulton-st., between Broadway and Nassau, New-York, to which place all communications and letters on business should be addressed.

☞ Universalist clergymen are respectfully requested, if agreeable to their feelings, to name the commencement of the Foreign Correspondence to their congregations. There may be those who would like to secure the volume on that account, who would not otherwise obtain information of it.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within four months; $2.00 if not paid within four months; or $2.50 if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis; and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞To City subscribers who receive their papers by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00 if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME X. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, MARCH 1, 1839. NUMBER 9.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Mileneal Harbinger.

Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.—No. 38.

Greenville, S. C., December 24, 1838.

Mr. SKINNER:

Sir—Yours of the 19th ult. found me here on the 22d instant. I had not leisure to examine it till this morning. It is, if possible, still more perfect in its kind than any of its predecessors.—Nothing but the solemnity of a covenant to publish twenty letters from you, on condition of your publishing twenty letters from me on the merits of Universalism, could have induced me to pollute so much paper with such a tissue of misrepresentation, falsehood, vulgarity, and abuse. Your letters are a disgrace to the religious controversy of the age. True, indeed, independent of my agreement to discuss this question with you, (on a fallacious representation of your character, however,) I think your language and style afford a peculiar occasion for the display of Christian meekness and patience on the part of any lover of truth, who would undertake or condescend to debate with you on any religious question. The vials of your indignation, already drained out, and the frenzied ebullitions of the exasperated demon of Universalism, do, indeed, abundantly prove how deeply the arrows of truth have penetrated the champion of benevolent Restorationism, insomuch that his creed and his spirit form one of the strongest contrasts in nature, and mutually divorced, are in opposite directions seeking the antagonist extremes of the universe.

2. Much of your present communication is beneath criticism. Wholly destitute of argument, it affords nothing for reason or logic to do. It is an offering most acceptable to the broken and disheartened spirit of a mortified party, that prefers absolute scepticism to everlasting punishment: for any thing is preferable to "the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels," to the man destitute of a well-grounded hope of heaven.

3. You seem duly aware of the fact, that your brethren, both the preachers and the proselytes, need all the unction and wine of no-hell'ism to animate their hopes of heaven; and, therefore, I presume it is that you so faithfully labor for their consolation. But, Sir, why can you not do this without so constantly and so artfully misrepresenting me? Your first paragraph represents me as violating an agreement to "furnish you with a letter in manuscript each mail" to hasten the termination of the discussion, and as unnecessarily delaying my letters, as if "determined to prevent the closing of the discussion the present year, because, forsooth, it would oblige you." Now, Sir, did you not know when you wrote this, that you yourself were the cause of all this delay!—that you made it impossible to finish the controversy this year, or for me to write out my replies as you proposed! Yes, Sir, you did know it: you wrote me a slip in your paper of October, stating that you, being absent from Utica, had delayed some three weeks in furnishing the first manuscript letter, and Mr. William Arny, of my office, informed you under date of October 31st, that several copies of my letter No. 34 had been mailed to you four weeks before that date, and that your manuscript No. 35 came to hand only on the eve of my departure to the South, and that I had taken it with me to answer it on the first opportunity which occurred. Again—Mr. Arny, on the 20th of August, in reply to your note of the 3d of that month, by my request, urged you to hasten your letters; and on the 19th of September wrote you again, stating that a month had transpired since your proposal to furnish a letter per each return mail from me, without a single word from you! Now, Sir, with all these facts before you, how could you fabricate such a paragraph as your No. 1? Such morality requires such divinity as you preach!!

4. As this is all the original or new matter in your present epistle, I might here lay down my pen or proceed to my closing epistle; but, for the sake of some new readers, I shall make one or two additional notices. Counting one by one, I have found one hundred and seven assertions in the single communication before me, a majority of which are grossly false, and the balance gratuitous or wholly irrelevant. The whole of these, multiplied by 10, would not prove any tenet, nor disprove any proposition in the world. You admit and deny, and then deny and admit the same things under different forms of speech—and sometimes almost the same forms. You believe in a devil or satan; but then it is a good angel, a Peter, or a deacon's wife. You believe in a daimon or a daimonion; but then it is lunacy or epilepsy. You believe in many devils; but then they are the witches of old Salem in Massachusetts. And as for ho satanas, the satan, the devil, he is a phantom, and his fall is an old wife's fable!

5. One of your brother Editors of the West says the miracles of Christ were not supernatural, and are only splendid metaphors, (lies I trow;) and with you, his good brother, the devil and his angels, their fall and expulsion from heaven—the temptation and fall of Adam and Eve—and the incarnation of THE WORD, and his death for our sins, etc., etc., are all old wive's fables!! Your devil is a personification of vice—an impersonal phantom—a part of human nature. Your devils or demons, are lunacy and epilepsy. Mary, of Magdala, had seven epilepsies in her at one time; and Jesus dispossessed a legion of lunacies out of an unfortunate epileptic; and they possessed a herd of swine, which, becoming lunatic, ran into the sea. Your devils, the witches, "believe and tremble;" and, speaking to Jesus, said, "Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?"—What splendid mysteries and miracles possess the soul of a benevolent Restorationist!

6. Well, as "the Bible possesses no evidence of the real personal existence of a being called the devil," we must suppose that Jesus was tempted by his own lusts; that a lunacy entered Judas when he sold his Master: and that the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels, was prepared for Cotton Mather and his Salem witches!

7. You quoted the Apocrypha twice! I did not quote the Targums once in this controversy. We all die because Eve eat the forbidden fruit, apple or fig, I do assert from the Bible; and although you do not believe it, Moses and the Apostle Paul did. You say that you can not affect the eternal destinies of man by your preaching. You are not, then, of Paul's party, who were the savor of life or of death to their hearers!

8. "Where are the converts," you say, "made by the preaching of eternal wo—your hell-fire converts! They are hypocritical pretenders," you answer. You have, in almost every letter, raged, laughed, and scouted at the "hell-fire damnation, everlasting punishment, and eternal fire preachers." Now as I am not remarkable for this sort of preaching, I may be allowed to say for this proscribed class, that they justify themselves by saying that Jesus the Saviour is their model; for he first introduced this style. He said, "None but he that doeth the will of his Father should enter the kingdom of heaven." "In that day I will say, depart from me, ye workers of iniquity," to those who prophesied in his name, but did not do what he commanded them. "Unless your righteousness excel the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven." "Fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." "It will be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for him who will not hear (or obey) the words" of the Apostles.—"It is profitable for thee that one of thy members perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell"—"cast into hell." "Serpents! generation of vipers! how can you escape the damnation of hell!" "Better for thee to enter into life maimed, than, having two hands, to go into hell, where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched—where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched,—where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched"—having two eyes to be cast into hell, where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. Thus, four times in one speech, spoke the benevolent Messiah. "He that believeth not shall be damned." "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." Truly, was he not a hell-fire preacher? and is he not, in this, good authority for those who regard him as the great philanthropist! Mr. Skinner and his laughing brotherhood had better take care that they be not found ridiculing the Judge of the human race!

9. But you can settle all these points in a very easy manner. Jesus used metaphors, was tempted of the devil, and did not understand hell-fire so well as Mr. Skinner and his brethren. "How shall we escape from the coming calamities of the Jews, if we neglect so great salvation!" Your system, you say, "presents stronger restraints from vice, and purer motives to virtue, than mine." It has, then, got a most hardened set of sinners to operate on: for of all the professors of Christianity under the heavens, it does the least to reform its converts. None need more reformation than your brethren. Mr. Todd is only one of a hundred traitors! (for all who join the Universalists are traitors to the parties they leave, according to your logic,) who concur in saying that "no man was ever made better by joining the Universalists—a thousand are made worse, but none better."

10. I am personally acquainted with some four or five Universalian preachers who have joined the church of Christ, of which I am a member, who all say that Mr. Todd speaks their experience, or who all concur with him in opinion. I do not believe one word of what you now say of Mr. Todd. I have evidence to the contrary.—Will you name only one person in America that has grown better by joining your church, and send me the testimony of any minister or magistrate not of your church, in proof of the fact, and I will publish him as a moral miracle to all my readers? I opine you can not do it. Do try.—As you have got ten converts from our doctrine for one we have from yours, it will be easy to find one, if one there be. But I opine you do not glory much in the moral stamina of these leprous converts.

11. You pervert Paul's remark. He says, "By one offence sentence came upon all men to condemnation," or to temporal death; "so by one righteousness sentence came upon all men to justification of life," or to a respite of natural life.—It is natural life and death, as connected with the two Adams, and not eternal life and death.

12. To "forgive punishment" is nonsense.—

You ask for such a phrase in the Bible. The Bible always speaks good sense. When sin or a debt is forgiven, the pain or penalty ceases as a matter of course. Remorse, you say, is the punishment of sin—the sure punishment. What philosophy! The greatest sinners have the least remorse—that is, the greatest sinners suffer the least punishment!

13. Your proof-texts are fairly abandoned on the ground of my challenge. You do not attempt an exegetical or common sense development of any one of them. You repeal your former gloss. But will any man of common sense call this an acceptance of my challenge? You have not shown, indeed you can not show, that the ultimate holiness and happiness of all mankind, is intimated in any one verse of the Bible. You have prudently declined it.

14. Your 21st and 22d paragraphs are only surpassed by Abner Kneeland, Taylor, and Carlile, of atheistic and blasphemous memory. I never read any thing so grossly profane from any professor of religion. Your present of the sublime beauties of my system, is slander of the first degree. You pervert my views and remarks on the relative numbers of the saved and lost. I never thought nor taught such dogmas as you allege. My opinion is, that all infants and children, who have never transgressed a positive law, are saved through the death of Christ; and I always read the commission thus: he that hears the Gospel, believes it, and is baptized, shall be saved; and he that hears the Gospel, and rejects it, shall be damned. You, therefore, misrepresent both my opinions and faith on this subject, and finish with a sublime exaggeration of the whole matter.—Why did you not print eternity with one letter on every column? You had better ask the impenitent, with such a dread eternity before them, "Of how much sorer punishment than death, will they be thought worthy" who despise the Gospel salvation, instead of teaching them to despise the word of Christ.

15. Your own system of the existence of moral evil, remorse, pain, punishment, and purgatory, as I have unanswerably shown, is just as clear and positive a reproach upon the goodness, justice, and mercy of the Creator, on your own premises, as the everlasting punishment of the wicked. If God can, for certain reasons, originate and continue for thousands of years, such a mixed system of good and evil, of happiness and misery, there is no man of sense or reason can say, that for certain reasons he may not continue it forever. Justice and injustice are not questions of quantity, but of quality. "He that is unjust in little," says Jesus, "is unjust in much." Now if God can justly and benevolently permit so much misery in the angelic, human, and brutal creations for so many ages, for transcendant reasons he may continue it for ever. Here reason must be silent, and revelation alone can speak.—The Bible deposes that for one offence of one man death reigned over all mankind.

16. Now if any man will show to me the justice, mercy, and love of God, in originating and continuing such a system as involves a whole world in innumerable pains and miseries, and finally in death for one sin of one man, I will, from his premises, engage to show that the same justice, mercy, and love, may be more brightly displayed in punishing for ever and ever all wicked men for their own sins. I have in part, in this controversy, done this very thing, and you passed it by with scarcely a single glance of your eye.—"There is no one so blind as he that will not see."

17. "What a head and heart" had Jesus when he said, "He that speaks a word against the Holy Spirit has NEVER forgiveness—shall not be forgiven, neither in this world nor that which is to come; but is liable to eternal damnation:" when he said, "Broad is the way to destruction, and wide is the gate, and many go in thereat," when he said, "Better for that man he had never been born:" when he shall say, "Depart, you CURSED, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels"? What a head and heart had Paul when he said, "Behold, you despisers, and wonder and perish:" when he said, "As many as have sinned without law, shall also perish without law:" "He will reward indignation, wrath, tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil:" "Christ shall reign till he has put all his enemies UNDER HIS FEET:" "Every one shall receive in his body according to the evil he has done, when we all appear before the tribunal of Christ—knowing THE TERROR of the Lord, we forewarn you:" when he said, "They shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire TAKING VENGEANCE on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." What a head and heart had Peter when he said, "Many shall follow their pernicious ways, whose damnation slumbereth not; for God, who spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to Tartarus, into chains of darkness, to be reserved to judgment; if he spared not the old world, drowning it all but Noah; if he burned up Sodom and Gomorrah, will he spare these wicked men, these cursed children, for whom, as Jude says, the blackness of darkness is reserved for ever? What shall I more say? What a head and heart had the beloved John when he said, "Whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire." "He that is unjust and unholy, let him be unjust and unholy still." They who keep his commandments shall enter into the heavenly city, without which shall be the dogs, sorcerers, whoremongers, murderers, and all LIARS—preachers of false doctrine. Wonder not, then, that we should dare to speak in this style.—Faithfully yours, A. CAMPBELL.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

MR. SKINNER'S FIRST LETTER.

St. Croix, (West End,) December 10, 1838.

Presuming (while I judge measurably from my own feelings) that a few lines from me will not be altogether unacceptable to you, I most willingly dedicate the present hour to your entire service. I may perhaps as well begin with a prosing and monotonous account of our journal or voyage at sea, this being probably as dull a theme as I can well find, and the less palatable the food, you know, the more necessity of its being taken on an empty stomach; otherwise it might prove altogether indigestible.

November 12th. Left Utica at 9 o'clock, A. M., on the rail road for Albany, in company with Messrs. Munson, Butler, Sayre, Townsend, Kellogg, Aylsworth, Aikin, and several other Utica gentlemen, and reached Albany about 3 P. M.—Remained here one day, for the purpose of visiting Br. S. R. Smith, and my brother, Judge A. Skinner, from Oswego county, now attending the Court of Errors at the Capitol. Tuesday evening left for New-York in the steam boat North America, where we arrived about day-light on Wednesday morning. Here I remained until Sunday, November 25th, with the exception of two or three day's absence for a visit to New-Haven; visited Brs. Sawyer, Le Fevre and other friends in the city; deliberated when and where I should sail, till my friends, Mr. Munson and Col. Dygert, (whose company to the West Indies I had expected,) made up their minds to sail for Savannah, and spend the Winter in Florida. I then resolved on sailing the first favorable opportunity for this port.

Sunday, November 25th. Sailed in the Brig Clitus, Capt. James Anthony, master, having on board the following passengers, viz., Mr. D. Whitson, Mr. and Mrs. Elliott, of New-York, and myself, for St. Croix; Messrs. McCobb, Warren, Tillford, and a mulatto girl, for Porto Rico—making eight passengers. Besides these, there were the captain, 1st and 2d mates, cook, steward, and six sailors. We were towed from the foot of Pike-street, about 12 1-2 o'clock, down past the Battery, by the steam boat Hercules. We got to sea off Sandy Hook, and discharged our Pilot about 3 P. M., and under a stiff Northwester, made directly for the gulf stream. The day was most bitterly cold. The vessels we passed in leaving port, were completely covered with ice, wherever the water had a chance to freeze upon them. The poor sailors complained bitterly on deck and among the rigging of the vessel, and often clapped their hands most energetically to keep them warm. The stove in our cabin was kept red hot most of the time, and still it was difficult to keep warm even there, unless close to the fire. Indeed, so far, it did not appear much like going to a warmer climate, for from the time of leaving home, it had been growing from cold to colder, and now it appeared the coldest.

Monday, 26th. Weather cloudy, and still very cold. Wind N. W., sailing E. S. E. at the rate of seven or eight knots an hour—reached the gulf stream towards evening. The contrast between the temperature of the air and water very great, occasioning the constant ascension of a thick mist, or fog, from the latter. Temperature of the atmosphere becomes gradually milder as we proceed. Passengers generally become sea sick, myself among them. Have no appetite for food.

Tuesday, 27th. Have passed beyond the Gulf. Weather still moderating—quite cloudy, but wind still favorable. Nearly all sea sick. Eat very little.

Wednesday, 28th. Still on our course—and making good progress. Saw a sail—a square rigged vessel—moving to the East, and were in sight of her for several hours. A fine rooster this day escaped from the hen-coop, and leaping overboard, found a watery grave. As he was doomed to lose his head, and feed either the passengers of the Clitus, or the fishes of the ocean, he had an undoubted right to chose his own mode of immolation, and select his own tomb. Perhaps he made a wise choice; though for a time he seemed to relent of it, and struggle againt his fate.—He stemmed most manfully the mighty flood, and vainly strove to regain his footing on our deck, as our gallant bark rapidly receded from him, and he at last disappeared in the distance. Took down our stove in the cabin when only three days out, and have no more need of fire! This looks rather more like going to a warmer climate.

Thursday, 29th. Windy, squally, rainy, unpleasant weather. All sea sick and confined in cabin. Captain could not see the sun to get his latitude and longitude; and having, about a year ago, been wrecked on the Bermudas, (a dangerous place to navigate in the night,) with the "Joseph Sprague," which he then commanded, and fearing, lest, if he kept the same course, he might meet with a similar disaster in the night, he acted on the wholesome maxim that "caution is the parent of safety," and steered south by west, which we next day learned had carried us more than a hundred miles to the west of Bermuda.

Friday, 30th. Got a glimpse of the sun, and found we had passed the latitude of Bermuda.—Weather unsettled, but warm enough for several of the sailors, cook and steward to go barefooted and without coats or roundabouts.

Saturday, December 1st. Held on our course S. E. by S., but with much less wind. Make but little progress. Find ourselves in what is usually called "Horse Latitude," extending from about 25 to 30 degrees of N. Lat., where vessels are so often and so long becalmed. The Trades do not extend so far North, and other winds are "few and far between." There being now considerable less sea, sickness begins to abate—appetites to return. We now broached a barrel of apples and found them right palatable at sea.

Sunday, 2d. Quite warm and Summer-like. Passengers generally put on thinner clothes.—At their instance, Capt. Anthony requested me to perform divine service, a duty which, on account of my throat difficulty, I had not attempted for nearly six months. And although I could not consent now to the performance of a long service, I felt, under existing circumstances, that I could not wholly decline the request thus politely proffered. Accordingly, about 11 o'clock, the passengers, captain, mates, and most of the crew, assembled on deck for this solemn and delightful duty. I read the 107th Psalm, addressed the throne of Grace in thanksgiving and prayer, and then gave a brief exposition and exhortation, founded on the 8th and 9th verses of the aforesaid Psalm—"O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men," etc. After speaking of the duty and privilege pertaining to men of worshipping and praising God, and pointing out in what his true praise consists, I took occasion to speak of the vice opposed to this duty, viz., that of profaning the name of our greatest and best Friend, a vice which has long been too prevalent among sailors and seafaring men, and which, of all popular vices, is the most useless, and has the least to recommend it. I must, however, remark, that although I heard some few profane expressions on board the Clitus, there was much less profanity than I had expected, and I think less than is usual among sailors. The whole service was listened to with devout and silent attention, and I can not but hope that some good was done, even here, far distant on the ocean, in the name of Jesus of Nazareth. This holy Sabbath at sea, while surrounded with the wide waste of waters, reminding me of the vastness of the Creator's works and power, as well as his wisdom and goodness, will long be remembered with devotional gratitude.

Monday, 3d. Weather still increasingly warm. Little wind—slow progress. Feel the need of exercise. Resort to climbing the rigging, and promenading the deck by turns.

Tuesday, 4th. Still in "Horse Latitude;" which means, in a region, where vessels having horses on board, getting becalmed, grow short of hay and water, and are obliged to throw their horses overboard. Little or no wind. A very dull day. Just at evening our sails begin to fill. The trade winds begin to blow, and we move on with as much more celerity as a caravan of camels do, when crossing a desert, they begin to snuff the cheering odour of the distant water, and "press with vigor on."

Wednesday, 5th. Find our Latitude about 23 degrees. Move on briskly at eight or nine knots. The increased motion of the vessel occasions a return of sea sickness. No appetite for breakfast. Eat a little dinner. Water here is quite warm, and teems with universal life. Multitudes of animalculæ attached together in little globules, fill the water, and in the moonlight (which, by the bye, we were favored with through our whole passage) glisten and sparkle like the most brilliant diamonds, at the prow and sides of our vessel.

Thursday, 6th. Fine breeze continues. Make rapid progress—descry a distant sail on our larboard side, but can not tell which way she heads. Find our Lat. about 20 degrees. Take in much of our sail, lest we might make land in the night. Multitudes of flying fish are now seen on all sides—some times they rise in swarms, and fly like the birds of the air, though not so high, for an eight of a mile at once. One of these little flutterers, leaving his native element, as Adam and Eve did Eden, and taking too proud a flight, struck the rigging of our brig, and dropped helpless on our deck. He was a beautiful fish, in body resembling the herring, and his large fins serving him for wings. We took him as an exchange for the rooster, which, a few days before, had forsaken the air and taken to the water, and by this right retained him for a dolphin bait. Whether this were exact justice or not, we leave to those to determine who are better skilled than ourselves, in the jurisprudence and casuistry of fish and poultry.

Friday, 7th. Soon after day-break, heard the welcome cry, "Land, ho!" and Sambraro Island was announced in sight. Passengers were all soon on deck to catch the first view of it. This is an almost barren rock rising out of the ocean, extending a few miles only in length, uninhabited, or serving only as the abode of numerous birds and sea fowls. A little before 9 o'clock, A. M., a wreck of some vessel was discovered at our leeward, at the distance of six or eight miles. We shifted our course so as to make directly for it, and as we neared it, all eyes were intent, and every heart pregnant with anxious expectations, wishing to know whether any human being was on board, or whether we might be the happy instruments of bringing salvation to a living soul. In vain did the anxious eye look for a human form on board. No cry of distress was heard—no sign of perishing fellow-beings appeared—all was still, save the dashing of the waves as they broke over her almost submerged deck. Whether all her crew had perished, without a helping hand, or an eye to pity, as was most probably the case, or whether all or a part of them had escaped by means of her small boat, was left to conjecture alone. We passed close under her stern, found her to be a hermaphrodite brig, loaded with lumber, stripped of every particle of her rigging, her bowsprit and masts cut off close to her bow and deck, the deck partly torn up, and on her stern was painted the word "Ann." But of what place we could not learn. She was mostly submerged, and completely covered with barnacles or muscles, and must have been a floating wreck for some months. Having gone a mile or so past her, the passengers suggested to the Captain, that as we were near our port, and both wind and current in our favor, she might easily be towed in, and her cargo would much more than pay for the trouble and delay. Capt. Anthony soon resolved on the measure, tacked ship, and returned for the wreck, having to make two tacks before reaching her; which was accomplished about 11 o'clock, and two long hausers fastened to her bow and to our main mast and windlass, and we were again en route, though at a much slower rate. Saw several sail to-day. Soon after taking the wreck in tow, we began to discover dolphins in great numbers, which had evidently been lying around the wreck and feeding on the muscles attached to her hull. Several sharks were also seen about her. We soon procured hooks, baited one with the flying fish that came on board the previous evening, and in a very few minutes pulled in a splendid dolphin. We had him dressed and cooked for dinner, some pieces being reserved as baits for catching others. In the course of two hours, we caught over twenty of these beautiful fish. This is one of the most splendid fish in appearance, that the ocean affords, combining all shades of green and blue colors, embossed with every brilliant hue, and tissue of gold and silver, its sides spotted like those of the trout. It is straight, elegantly tapered, and exceedingly active, moving almost with the velocity of lightning, and often chasing the flying fish for a mile or more, and jumping several feet out of the water to take them on the wing. They continued to play around our vessel all the rest of the way into port.

Saturday, 8th. On rising this morning, we found ourselves in sight of Virgin Gorda, St. Peter, St. Johns, St. Thomas, and most welcome of all, St. Croix. We approached "the promised land," near the Easterly or Bas End, as it is called, and sailed along on the north side, in full view of the whole length of this beautiful island. Its lovely hills are clothed with the freshest verdure, glittering in the golden sunbeams, and just uneven enough to give us all the rich varieties of light and shade, mingling and alternating the dark purple, the deep blue, the lively green, embossed with gold and tipped with silver; truly, a sea-begirt and fairy land, fit subject of poesy and song, while the reality is more charming and inviting than even fiction itself could ever make it seem. The air is loaded with fragrance, and every breeze redolent with the odors of Eden, wafted from the fields of cane, trees of tan arind, orange, lime, cocoa, banana, etc., etc. Several sail are now seen moving in different directions, and among them a Danish man-of-war brig, which, having discovered us with the wreck in tow, came to offer any assistance that might be needed in getting her into port. Capt. Anthony declined accepting of any assistance. At 3 o'clock, P. M., just 13 days from New-York, we anchored in the Bay of St. Croix, (West End,) and after being boarded by his Danish Majesty's Consul and Physician, to ascertain where we were from, and whether all were in health, we were permitted to go on shore, amidst throngs of curious spectators of all ages, sexes, colors, and nations, who crowded the wharf and streets to see and learn who we were, where from, and what wreck we had brought in. Passed through the crowd, and went to look for quarters. After a short excursion to the south part of the village, engaged lodgings for the present with Mrs. Egan, an Irish lady who buried her husband in this island about 15 years since, and who now keeps an excellent boarding house for the entertainment of those strangers who may visit the place from different parts of the world. Find several gentlemen boarding here from New-York, who arrived one week before us in the ship Decatur, which made a very long, boisterous, and unpleasant passage, having adverse winds, and being 26 days (just twice as long as we were) on her passage. I deem myself fortunate in having sailed when, and in the vessel I did. Her accommodations were not extravagant, but every way comfortable. She was a good sailor, and had a good Captain, and favorable winds and weather.

Sunday, 9th. Attended the Episcopal church, and heard service read, the clergyman being away to the Bas End to-day. Most of the visiters from America attend this church, some from preference, and others for want of any other that they might prefer, or for the sake of seeing their friends. Was introduced to several gentlemen from the States, some of whom are here for their health, some for business, and others have become permanent residents.

Having journalized in quantum sufficit, I will now close this epistle by a few desultory remarks. This island, together with St. Thomas and St. Johns, two small islands lying to the north of it, belongs to the kingdom of Denmark, and its civil and political management is in the hands of a governor under the Danish crown. It is between 20 and 30 miles long, and 8 or 10 wide. Almost its entire surface is cultivated like a garden, the sugar cane being the staple product, and the great source of its wealth. Its population is about 21,000, six-sevenths of whom are blacks. The English language is most generally spoken. The Danish is spoken by the officers of government. A small paper is published in the island, mostly in Danish, but a small part in English. The climate is most delightful, and of a very uniform temperature, far superior, I am satisfied, and better fitted to improve the health of invalids, than any part of the United States. There are about fifty here from the States to spend the Winter. Every attention is paid them to make their stay agreeable, and every luxurious fruit that the island affords, (which I assure you are neither few nor small,) furnished for the table. In a future letter I will give you a list of them. I have not yet learned the names of one half of them.

My health is about the same as when I left Utica, or if any difference, that difference is in my favor. I think, after the effects of sea sickness and the irregularities of the system occasioned thereby, are passed, I shall improve rapidly; and I can not but hope the climate will effect an entire cure of my complaint. That event, however, after doing all that lays in my power to accomplish it, I must leave to the decision of that almighty Being who is too wise to err, to merciful to be unkind, and too just to do any injury to any of his creatures. D. SKINNER.

The degree of estimation in which any profession is held, becomes the standard of the estimation in which the professors hold themselves.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ETERNAL LIFE.

BY REV. S. MILES.

What is it? Where is it? Is it progressive? How is it to be obtained?

No preliminary is here deemed necessary, or called for; we shall, therefore, immediately proceed to give a full, direct, and unequivocal answer to the above questions, in as plain and concise a manner, as our limits will permit. And, first, what is eternal life?

"This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent."—John xvii: 3. Knowledge is the life and power of the mind, and may well be called the food of the intellect. God says, "I will give you pastors according to mine heart, who shall feed you with knowledge and understanding."—Jer. iii: 15, compared with John vi: 45–48. The promise, "Ye shall know the Lord," is the same as if God had said, Ye shall have life eternal.

Now, as knowledge makes a giant mind, "when we were without strength, [i. e., without knowledge,] in due time Christ died for the ungodly," (Rom. v: 6,) and now, through his death, many are made strong in the Lord, and the power of his might.—See Eph. vi: 10. The Gospel of Christ, is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth.—Rom. i: 16. Compare with 1 John v: 10, 11.

In answer to the question, where is eternal life? it is written, "Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. In whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge."—Col. iii: 3, and ii: 3. "The gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Rom. vi: 23. Knowledge is the gift of God, and is life. "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus, before the world began; but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light, through the Gospel."—2 Tim. i: 9, 10. "He that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not, God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son."—1 John v: 10, 11. This record is the book of life, because it is the book of knowledge, which gives life to all who receive the truth therein contained.

Those who forget God, forget light, "for God is light." When we sin against God, it is evident that we have forgotten him, and that we love darkness rather than light. When we take away the key of knowledge from men, it may be said that we take away from the words of the book; and then God's word withdraws from us as far as we go from that.—See Rev. xxii: 19. Knowledge is always as far from us, as we are from that. "The thief cometh not but to steal, and to kill, and to destroy: I am come that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly."—John x: 10. Men stand in the way of sinners when they take away the key of knowledge, as described Luke xi: 52. The ancient Fathers in Christ, were not like drones in the hive; they were up and willing to suffer great and sore afflictions in the spread of the knowledge of God, which giveth life to the souls of men, that were alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance there was in them.—See Eph. iv: 18, and ii: 12, 13. No pains were spared—no sufferings too great for them to endure. Hear them, oh, hear them, and give heed to the word of life. "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the word of life—(for the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bare witness, and shew unto you that eternal life which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us—) that which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ."—1 John i: 1–3. "And these things write I unto you, that your joy may be full."—Verse 4.

Is this knowledge—or, in other words, which is the same thing—is this life progressive?

"Unto you that fear my name, shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in his wings; and ye shall go forth, and grow up as calves of the stall."—Mal. iv: 2. "Ye, therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware, lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness; but grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."—2 Pet. iii: 17, 18. "But speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ."—Eph. iv: 14, 15.

In taking a view of the ancient Fathers, we can not but see that some of them were what we call minor prophets. Our Saviour says, "Among them that are born of woman, there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist; notwithstanding he that is least in the kingdom of heaven, is greater than John."—Matt. xi: 11, compared with Acts xviii: 26.

How is this life to be obtained? "And I will bring the blind by a way that they know not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known: I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them."—Isa. xlii: 16. "It is written in the prophets, And they shall all be taught of God. Every man, therefore, that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me."—Job. vi: 45. That is, they that hear and learn of the Father, come to that knowledge which is the life and power of the mind. Christ says, "All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him."—Matt. xi: 27. "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls."—Matt. xi: 27–29. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given unto him." James i: 5.

[To be continued.]

For the Magazine and Advocate.

REVIVAL OF UNIVERSALISM IN HENDERSON, JEFFERSON COUNTY, N. Y.

Exaggerated and erroneous accounts of the wonderful works, ascribed to the Divine Spirit, written under the influence of excited feelings, and sent through the religious world on the wings of the wind, may perhaps momentarily produce their intended effects in places far remote from that in which they originated; or may brighten and confirm the delusive expectation entertained by almost all denominations, that the Lord is on their side—that their particular sentiments shall triumph and universally prevail; but they can not advance the permanent interests of truth, nor promote the ultimate spiritual health of the people of God; for the moment the deception is discovered, they are numbered among the lying vanities of earth, originating from a source whence truth was expected. But because false accounts should not be given, it does not follow that truth should not be stated. The teachings of the Almighty may be received through the medium of his Providence, as well as his Word. "For the Lord shall comfort Zion: he will comfort all her waste places, and he will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord, joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving and the voice of melody." But why should Universalists have revivals? Because "the Lord hath made bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God."

Henderson is a pleasant and flourishing township on the borders of lake Ontario, about ten miles south of Sackets Harbor, and seventeen south westerly from Watertown, the capital of Jefferson county. In 1819, a society was formed in this town, under the title of "The Henderson Universal Charitable Society." This was the first organized society of Universalists in this county. In the early part of my public ministry, in the latter part of the year 1820, by the advice and kindness of Br. S. Jones, I was induced to visit this place; and with the consent of all concerned, I settled with this people as their first pastor; spending half my time here, and the remainder in Watertown and Brownville, (where no societies existed in 1820,) during the years 1821 and 2. Our meetings were well attended during those two years, and after that period, my labors were principally confined to Watertown and its vicinity. In 1822 a church was organized here consisting of 25 members. In 1823 the society altered its name to that of "The First Universalist Society in Henderson." In 1824, through that deplorable remissness, which often paralyzes human exertion, the society became legally extinct; and though they had able and faithful preaching one fourth part of the time four or five years, by Brs. Person and Jones, yet they have not been organized as a society since 1824, till May, 1838. How can any religious society flourish, in which a minister is not sustained more than one whole year in fifteen?

In the mean time, this town has been occasionally visited by those flaming, tempestuous, and desolating revivals, so called, which by traducing and blackening the divine character and frightening weak mortals, tend to drive people from the house of worship, and bring religion into disrepute.

Last Spring, for reasons which seemed conclusive, if not altogether satisfactory, I thought it expedient to dissolve the connexion which had happily subsisted, with the exception of one year in which I was absent, between me and the truly excellent and well-beloved society in Watertown, since 1821. As a consequence resulting from the dissolution of my connexion with the Watertown society, I formed the design of making a long western tour to proclaim the word of life, and came to this town to make some necessary preparation for my journey, without any thought of remaining here. I was, in fact, for the first time in my professional life, out of business.

On the evening of the 28th of April, I was informed that a Methodist minister by the name of Lyon, who had long preached against Universalism in this region, would occupy the Baptist church the next day to disprove Universalism, and Universalists had been invited to attend. Accordingly, I attended his meeting and heard him silently, attentively and patiently. From the power of his voice and his mode of treating the subject, I soon became satisfied that he could roar better than he could reason, and Universalism would lose nothing by his attacks. It is not necessary for me now to describe his sermons, they will long be remembered by those who heard them. Suffice it to say, he proceeded in a manner very similar to that of his ministering brethren, who have preceded him in vociferous and fruitless attempts to demolish the doctrine of Heaven's boundless and efficient grace; with whose mode of warfare, I have long been very particularly acquainted. He quoted extensively and verbatim, without giving any credit whatever, from the notorious work of Luther Lee; a kindred spirit and co-worker in advocating the never-ending torments of hell. At the close of his meeting, I respectfully requested the occupancy of the house, to answer Mr. L. and to defend my sentiments. The Baptists granted my request in the most frank and honorable manner. Accordingly, on Sunday, the 13th of May, a very crowded congregation of all denominations, (among whom was

Mr. Lyon,) attended to hear my vindication of the doctrine of unlimited grace. After preaching more than an hour and a half in the forenoon, in direct reply to Mr. L., I asked him if he had any thing to say by way of rejoinder. He said he had not, because his arguments remained untouched. I appealed from his judgment to that of the congregation. In the afternoon, I had a fair opportunity to defend "the wisdom that is from above," before a very attentive auditory. At the conclusion of the services, Mr. L. gave notice that he would preach to young converts a week from that time, at a place about three miles distant. By request, I gave notice of a meeting in the village adjacent to the place of our first meeting, two weeks from that time, when the subject of society organization would be taken into consideration.

When the time arrived for Mr. L. to preach to converts, I was in the vicinity, designing to attend his meeting. A messenger informed the waiting congregation that Mr. Lyon had been taken with palpitation of the heart: a Methodist requested me to preach to his congregation, which I did, after a select few had withdrawn to another place to hold a prayer meeting.

When the time arrived for our meeting to consider the subject of society organization, the whole community, with few exceptions, rose in favor of the measure. A society was formed, which now consists of eighty-five members. A subscription for preaching the whole time for one year, was soon nearly filled. A subscription of $3000 for building a church was obtained during the Summer; and a building 60 feet by 40 has been contracted for, to be built during the present year.—A large upper room, 40 feet by 30, was obtained in which to hold our meetings, which have generally been well attended.

My intended western tour was relinquished, mainly because it was very manifest that a good work ought to be done here, at this time, through my instrumentality. How little do we know of futurity! Never did I calculate with more confidence upon any contemplated journey; and never was I so unexpectedly and effectually introduced into a whitened field of ministerial labor through the instrumentality of a Methodist brother! We have thus far been crowned with success beyond all expectation, and there has been no "hon in the way" of our prosperity.

In the Magazine and Advocate of the 6th of July last, I promised to give some account of our proceedings here, and I have designedly deferred this article that I might state facts, rather than probabilities.

On the 15th of July, Mr. Lyon, by his own request, met Br. S. Jones in Ellisburgh, about 4 miles from this place. Mr. L. preached down Universalism in the forenoon, frequently introducing my name, and what he called my arguments; and Br. J. preached up the same doctrine in the afternoon. According to the best information I have received, Mr. L. succeeded on that occasion as might have been expected, when he had an opponent who understands and is able to defend Universalism. Mr. L. challenged Br. J. to meet him again in four weeks. Br. J. declined meeting him on the Sabbath, but offered to meet him on a week day, and thus the matter ended.—Whether Mr. L. has had experience enough in opposing Universalism, to satisfy his own mind, I can not state, as I have scarcely heard from him for several months.

The prospects of this society are fair indeed, and with suitable exertions on their own part—a reasonable appropriation of the means which the Lord has placed at their command, and a careful observance of every Christian duty—they can scarcely fail to become far more numerous and able than any other society in town. May the Lord grant them stability and strength, and crown them with complete success.

By the state of my health, I was prevented from attending the public Conference at Constantia and Denmark, and am solemnly admonished, that after twenty years very satisfactorily spent in the whitened harvest of the Redeemer, I am advancing towards the end of "my course." I am prepared to live or die. The Lord willing, I should be pleased to live while I can do good, or receive enjoyment: but I have no fears of death, and an unclouded vision of unbounded glory for myself and a ransomed world, is presented, through faith, to the eye of my mind in the regions of eternal light and joy. "For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." PITT MORSE.

Henderson, February 5, 1839.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

HYPOCRITES.

BY REV. WM. ROUNSEVILLE.

"Some go to church, proved humbly to repeat,
And come back much more guilty than they went."

What is more to be regretted, and yet what is more common, than to cultivate a man-serving spirit, when we enter the "house where prayer is wont to be made," ostensibly for the purpose of worshipping God? Are not too many of the long prayers and disfigured visages which we there behold, to be attributed to this cause? If the truth could be known, how many, who now are celebrated as humble worshippers of Jehovah, would be derided as having bowed the knee to popularity and the love of praise? How often should we find that the thirst for applause has had more influence over the mind, than love to God, or his creature, man? Suppose the motives of all could be opened to our view, how many would answer the description of Dr. Young, in his "Love of Fame?"

"One way they look, another way they steer,
Pray to the gods but would have mortals hear."

Reader, are we—are you of this class? Then verily thou deservest and wilt receive the hypocrite's reward.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, MARCH 1, 1839.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAW OF KINDNESS.....NO. IV.

"Overcome evil with good."—ROM. xii: 21.

The fact now to be exhibited, shows in a lively manner, how an extraordinary instance of kindness has softened the asperities of opposition to a sect, whose peculiar forms and tenets are disbelieved by the mass of American people—I mean the conduct of the Sisters of Charity, an association of females in the Roman Catholic communion, who dedicate themselves wholly to benevolence. During the time when the angel of death, in the shape of cholera, raged in Philadelphia, in the Summer of 1832, a number of the Sisters of Charity voluntarily assumed the noble duty of attending the sick in that city. And though they were constantly in danger of being infected with the awful pestilence, and of being consigned to the tomb in a few hours, yet, armed with a Christian spirit, they watched the sick, and hovered around the couch of death, like angels of mercy, courageous in their benevolence when others were fleeing in abject fear. And when asked, why they, Catholics as they were, should be so ready to assist Protestants and the opposers of their faith, the answer in substance was, that to see a fellow-being, no matter of what name or sect, in distress, was sufficient to excite their endeavors to remove that distress. As a token of warm thanks, the Corporation of Philadelphia tendered a piece of silver plate to each of the Sisters for acceptance; but they refused it, not only as contrary to their rules, but with a reply worthy alike of Christianity, and the cause in which they were engaged; "if their exertions," said they, "have been useful to their suffering fellow-beings, and satisfactory to the public authorities, they deem it a sufficient reward, and indeed the only one which would be consistent with their vocation to receive." All this conduct is the pure spirit of the law of kindness. And it has gone farther in softening the opposition of the Protestants to the Catholics, than though an inquisition had been built in each State, with full power to destroy all dissenters. For it gained the admiration and approbation of the reflecting in all denominations, and proved that the Sisters of Charity were actuated by the benevolence of Christ.

It is well known that Quakers have adopted the non-resistance principle, or the law, "overcome evil with good." The founder of Philadelphia, Wm. Penn, was completely armed with the spirit of this principle.—When he came to this country, he came without cannon or sword, and with a determination to meet the Indians with truth and kindness. He bought their land and paid them—he made a treaty with them and observed it—and he always treated them as men. For this conduct he was nobly rewarded. The untamed savage of the forest became the warm friend of the white stranger—towards Penn and his followers, they buried the war-hatchet, and ever evinced the strongest respect for them. And to this day, many of the Indians possess a knowledge of his peaceable disposition, and speak of him with a tone and feeling very different from what they manifest, when speaking of those whites who come to them with words of treachery on their tongues, and kegs of "fire-water" in their hands.

An intelligent Quaker of Cincinnati related to me the following circumstance, as evidence that the principle of non-resistance possesses great influence, even over the savage. During the last war, a Quaker lived among the inhabitants of a small settlement on our western frontier. When the savages commenced their desolating outbreaks, every inhabitant fled to the interior settlements, with the exception of the Quaker and his family. He determined to remain and rely wholly upon the simple rule of disarming his enemies with entire confidence and kindness. One morning, he observed through his window a file of savages issuing from the forest in the direction of his house. He immediately went out and met them, and put out his hand to the leader of the party. But neither he nor the rest gave him any notice—they entered his house, and searched it for arms, and had they found any, most probably would have murdered every member of the family.—There were none, however, and they quietly partook of the provisions which he placed before them, and left him in peace. At the entrance of the forest, he observed that they stopped and appeared to be holding a council. Soon, one of their number left the rest, and came towards his dwelling on the leap. He reached the door, and fastened a simple white feather above it, and returned to his band, when they all disappeared. Ever after, that white feather saved him from the savages; for whenever a party came by and observed it, it was a sign of peace to them. In this instance, we discover that the law of kindness disarmed even savage foes, whose white feather told their red brethren that the Quaker was a follower of Penn, and the friend of their race.

The consequence of kindness and confidence, united with firmness, was strikingly exemplified in the conduct of two individuals, each of whom stood at the head of a company of soldiers, on our northern frontier, during a portion of the last war. Their names might be given, but as one is still living, they are suppressed. Both had strict discipline in their companies—but one produced it by excessive flogging—the other by kindness and firmness. The result of the two modes of government is as follows:—The soldiers of the severe captain hated him, and could they have obtained a favorable opportunity in battle, would have shot him without hesitation. The soldiers of the other captain loved him, and if necessary, would have waded to their knees in blood to follow their beloved leader.

In the light of these facts, every person must perceive the efficacy and power of the divine principle, "overcome evil with good"—and must admit, that as God has given it to us, and the Saviour made it the leading precept of his system, as well as the guide of his holy life, so, we should not only write it with indelible remembrance upon our hearts, but we should also act according to its dictates and direction. G. W. M.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. III.

GEHENNA.—CONCLUDED.

The views which we have thus far advanced, will find an ample confirmation by reference to the passages where gehenna occurs; a reference which we shall now make. Let it be remarked, however, that there are two passages in which it is admitted to be a figure, a simple notice of which is all that is necessary. The first is—"Wo unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites; for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte; and when he is made, ye make him two-fold more the child of hell (gehenna) than yourselves."—Matt. xxiii: 15. The phrase "child of hell," Clarke says, means an excessively wicked person. Bishop Pierce says, "rather two-fold more the child of gehenna; and meaning much worse than he was before; perhaps meaning more averse from receiving the truths of the Gospel." The punishment of the Jews had been referred to by the prophets, under the emblem of the valley of Hinnom, while the condemnation of a criminal to death in that valley, was considered a mark of the lowest degradation. Yet immense as was their own condemnation and punishment, set forth by the fires of gehenna, they made their proselytes so wicked, that they were even more deserving of that punishment than they. Here the reference is clear. The other passage is in James iii: 6—"So is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature; and it is set on fire of hell," (gehenna). As licentious speech and conversation rouse up the passions with all their corrupting influence, so it is well prefigured by the fires and filth of the valley of Hinnom. This reference is so clear as to need no comment.

I. "Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?"—Matt. xxiii: 32, 33.

I would here remark, that it will not be necessary to notice the word damnation particularly, because its simple meaning is, condemnation. Dr. Campbell remarks on the sentence, "he that believeth not shall be damned," Mark xvi: 16, that the Greek word katakrino, should not be rendered damned, for it corresponds exactly with the English word condemned. "He that believeth not is condemned already," says John, iii: 18.

Be it remembered that our Saviour was discoursing with the Pharisees. A number of times in the chapter, he says, "wo unto you, Pharisees and Scribes, hypocrites;" while the whole chapter is a description of their character, and a denunciation of judgment upon them for their crimes. He told these Pharisees to fill up the measure of their fathers. The question is, How did their fathers begin to fill the measure spoken of? In the 31st verse this is answered—"Wherefore ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets—fill ye up then the measure of your fathers." The Jews were a headstrong people, and oftentimes killed the prophets of old—and thus began to fill the measure of their iniquity. The Jews of the time of our Lord were to finish filling this measure. How? "Wherefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and Scribes; and some of them ye shall kill and crucify, and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city." Verse 34. To this was added the murder of the Saviour, and then their cup of sin overflowed. Pursuing such conduct as this, how could they escape punishment? Well did Jesus say to them, "how can ye escape the damnation of gehenna," or hell. What was this damnation of hell? We have seen that gehenna, in its primitive signification, signifies the valley of Hinnom, and that said valley with its smoke rising up even when our Saviour was speaking, was made an emblem of the punishment of the Pharisees. We shall behold these positions still more fully illustrated. Speaking of this very valley, and of these very events, Jeremiah says—"The days come, saith the Lord, that this place shall no more be called Tophet, nor the valley of the son of Hinnom, but the valley of slaughter. I will cause them to fall by the sword before their enemies.....and their carcasses will I give to be meat for the fowls of the heaven.....I will cause them to eat the flesh of their sons and the flesh of their daughters,...in the siege."—Jeremiah chap. 19th. In the 32d of Deuteronomy, we find a terrible prophecy of the same events—it is there called burning hunger and a bitter destruction; the sword without and the terror within. This is the punishment of which gehenna is made an emblem, and it was actually accomplished. The Jews in their destruction by the Romans, did experience burning hunger, did eat their children, were killed with the sword, and Hinnom's valley did become the valley of slaughter. This is the "damnation of hell." That this interpretation is correct, is manifest by what follows the passage under consideration. "That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel, unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar. Verily I say unto you, all these things shall come upon this generation. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Verses 35–39. How is it possible to mistake such clear and distinct communications!

II. "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill, shall be in danger of the judgment; but I say unto you, that whosoever is angry without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council; but whosoever shall say, thou fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire," (Matt. v: 21, 22,) or, gehenna-fire, or, as Macknight has it. "the fire of the valley of Hinnom."—Harm. Evan. Sec. 26. Raca "signifies a vain, empty, worthless fellow, shallow brains, a term of great contempt." "[Thou fool] Moreh, probably from Marah, to rebel against God, apostate from all good. This term, implied among the Jews, the highest enormity, and the most aggravated guilt."—A Clarke.

The literal allusions of this text, are clearly given by Clarke, to which account other commentators lend their names. "There are three kinds of offences here, which exceed each other in their degrees of guilt. 1st. Anger against a man, accompanied with some injurious act.—2d. Contempt, expressed by the opprobrious epithet, raca, or shallow brains. 3d. Hatred and mortal enmity, expressed by the term moreh, or apostate, where such apostacy could not be proved. Now, proportioned to these three offences, were three different degrees of punishment, each exceeding the other in its severity, as the offences exceeded each other in their different degrees of guilt. 1st. The judgment, the council of twenty-three, which could inflict the punishment of strangling. 2d The sanhedrin, or great council, which could inflict the punishment of stoning. And 3d. The being burnt alive in the valley of the son of Hinnom. This appears to be the meaning of our Lord." These are the literal allusions of the passage—but it is contended that the fire of gehenna was used as an emblem of future misery. But there is no proof of this. The literal derivation of gehenna is the valley of Hinnom; the prophets referred to that valley as an emblem of temporal judgments; the Jews of our Lord's time knew that the prophets did so use it; and as our Saviour does not give us the least intimation of a change from such allusion, we have no warrant to suppose that it was applied to future wo. Dr. Clarke says, "It is very probable that our Lord means no more here than this; if a man charge another with apostacy from the Jewish religion, or rebellion against God, and can not prove his charge, then he is exposed to that punishment (burning alive), which the other must have suffered, if the charge had been substantiated."

In the light of this fact, it is well known that the Jews, in their own views, did in amount charge our Saviour with apostatizing from the law of Moses—they looked upon him as an enemy to Israel's God and to them, and in consequence they murdered him. As our Lord says, for making charges against him which could not be substantiated, they were in danger of gehenna fire—the severity of their punishment was set forth in the dreadful doom of being burnt alive in the valley of Hinnom; a punishment which came upon them to the uttermost, in the complete fulfilment of the prophecies against them.

III. "And if thy hand offend thee, cut it off; it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands, to go into hell, into the fire that shall never be quenched: where their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched. And if thy foot offend thee, cut it off; it is better for thee to enter halt into life, than having two feet to be cast into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched; where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out; it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes, to be cast into hell-fire; where their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched."—Mark ix: 43–48.

Passages similar to this are found in Matt. v: 29, 30, and xviii: 8, 9, the last verse of which we shall quote. "Wherefore, if thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off, and cast them from thee; it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands, to be cast into everlasting fire." With the exception of the phrase, "everlasting fire," the consideration of the passage in Mark will explain the others, for all the phraseology of the others is used by Mark. And, even the expression "everlasting fire," can not mean any more than Mark means by "fire" and "hell-fire." In all these passages, where gehenna occurs six times, our Saviour was particularly addressing his disciples, and not the unbelieving Jews. The passage in the 5th of Matthew was spoken in reference to a particular passion, showing, that it was better to subdue that passion, than to commit the crime to which it led, and endure the consequent punishment, set forth by gehenna as an emblem. The last two passages were spoken in reference to the punishment which must fall upon the disciples, in case they rejected Christ and apostatized from his cause.

Though I know that this Scripture is used as strong proof of endless wo, yet, I ask, does any one look upon its language as literal? Do they suppose that people will enter heaven blind of one eye, minus a hand or foot, or that it is necessary to cut them off in order to get into heaven? It can not be. It is then viewed in a figurative manner by all; so that we all stand on the same footing—the great question is, What does it mean?

On gehenna, or hell, it is necessary to remark, that all commentators tell us that its original derivation is gee hinnom, the valley of Hinnom, which was a deposit for the filth of Jerusalem, and to consume which, a fire was kept continually burning. We have also seen that the prophets used the valley of Hinnom as an emblem of temporal calamities, and as our Lord never gave the least intimation that he altered it to designate endless misery, we have not a shadow of proof that it means in Mark, any other evil than temporal judgments—or in other words, that Mark used it any differently from what the prophets did.

Let us then look at the phrase, "everlasting fire."—This phrase took its rise from the continued fire of Hinnom, which was kept up perpetually, and is called everlasting from that circumstance. This is not singular. The land of Canaan was called an "everlasting possession" to the Jews, Gen. xvii: 8—the Aaronic priesthood was called an "everlasting priesthood," Exo.

xi: 15—the regulations of the Mosaic Law were called singly, "an everlasting statute," Lev. xvi: 34. Even the term "forever," is applied to the life-time of a servant. Ex xxi: 6. Jude calls the fire which destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, "eternal fire," because in his time, smoke was frequently seen issuing from the surface of the Dead Sea. It can not be thought wonderful, that a fire which had been perpetually burning beneath the walls of Jerusalem, ever since the days of the pious king Josiah, should be called "an everlasting fire."

"Where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched." This phrase also comes from the same source.—Professor Stuart, speaking of the filth which was deposited in the valley, and of the perpetual fires to burn it, says, "and as the same offal would breed worms, (for so all putrefying meat of course does,) hence the expression, 'where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.'"—Ex. Essays, p. 141. But perhaps I shall be told, that, as the worm died not, and the fire is not quenched, it must burn endlessly. To this, I answer, that the phrase is used more to denote certainty of execution, than duration of time. This fact will appear more obvious by citing a few passages, in which it is used with limited duration. Speaking of the fire which was to be kept burning on the altar of the Jewish sanctuary, it is said, "the fire shall ever be burning upon the altar; it shall never go out."—Lev. vi: 13. Can we suppose that this fire was to burn endlessly? It simply means, that the fire should not be suffered to go out, while the temple-service stood. Speaking of the destruction of the Jews, God said by Jeremiah, "Then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched."—xvii: 27. Were the palaces of Jerusalem to burn forever? No; it simply means, that the fire should not go out until they were annihilated. I will now introduce a passage in which the whole phrase occurs, when it will be seen by every person that its reference is to the overthrow of the Jews. "And they shall go forth, and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh."—Isa. lxvi: 24. From these facts it will be discovered, that the phrase took its rise from the valley of Hinnom, where worms and fire were continually breeding and burning, and that it was used to denote that the fire of punishment would not cease until it had consumed the Jewish nation.

I now remark, that by plucking out the eye, or cutting off the foot, or hand, our Saviour prefigured the mortifying of the passions. This is evident from the very subject—for, as Christ and his apostles went to Capernaum, it is said that the disciples "disputed among themselves who should be greatest."—Mark ix: 34. It is a truth that the disciples, previous to the resurrection, in common with the rest of their people, expected that the Messiah was to be a temporal prince; and one motive why they followed him, was, they expected high offices when his kingdom should be established. This was a darling ambition to them; dear as an eye, a hand or foot. Our Saviour, by plucking out the eye, and cutting off the hand, informed them that they had better destroy that desire and enter into life, (or the kingdom of God, the Gospel dispensation, the eternal life of knowing God and his dear Son,) shorn of the glory which they might have expected to receive from it, than to retain it; because it would render them unfit for his cause, and consequently, remaining among the Jews, they would take part in their dreadful punishment, set forth by the emblem of the worms, and the everlasting fire of the valley of Hinnom.

As an illustration of this subject, let one case suffice. On a certain occasion, a young man inquired of Christ, what he should do to inherit eternal life? He was told to keep the commandments. He said that he had kept these from his youth. Our Saviour then told him, that if he would be perfect he must sell his possessions, give to the poor, and follow him. "But when the young man heard that saying, he went away sorrowful; for he had great possessions."—Matt. xix: 22. This love of his wealth was to him a right eye and a hand, and unless he plucked it out, cast it from him, and entered the Gospel dispensation, willing to yield every thing, he would remain among his people, and when destruction came, there would be no escape; he would fall into punishment, emblematized by the fires of gehenna.—Surely, it was far better, in the existing state of the times, for this young man to pluck out his desire, than to keep it and perish.

IV. "And fear not them which kill the body; but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell," gehenna.—Matt. x: 28. The parallel passage is Luke xii: 5, but it will not be necessary to refer to it—the explanation of one, is the explanation of the other.

The word soul, in this passage, simply denotes life. It is the same word (psuche) which occurs in Matt. xvi: 26. "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Or what will a man give in exchange for his soul?" On this passage, Dr. Clarke remarks—"On what authority many have translated the word (psuche) life, in the 25th verse and in this verse, soul, I know not; but am certain it means life in both places. If a man should gain the whole world, its riches, honors, and pleasures, and lose his life, what would all these profit him, seeing they can only be enjoyed during life." The word also means life in the text, and you will see its perfect consistency of meaning in the explanation.

It appears from the context, that our Saviour was telling his disciples of the persecutions which would befal them, and was endeavoring to prepare their hearts to meet every evil. He tells them that they would be delivered up to councils, would be scourged in synagogues, and hated of all men. But notwithstanding this persecution, he says to them, "fear not them which kill the body." Most persons understand the word kill here, to mean separation of life from the body; but I do not so understand it; for it is evident that it is used in the Scriptures to denote trial. Hence David said, when in affliction, "yea, for thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are counted as sheep for the slaughter."—Ps. xliv: 22. Hence Paul said, "who shall separate us from the love of Christ; shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?—as it is written, for thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter."—Rom. viii: 35, 36. Hence too he said, 'I die daily."—1 Cor. xv: 31. In the text it evidently means the afflictions spoken of in the context.

The disciples were not to fear the Jews, who would afflict their bodies—but they were to fear God, who could not only afflict the body, but destroy the life in gehenna if they did not fear him. The reason is this; if they feared the Jews on account of the persecutions they would meet from them, and did not fear God more, but forsook the cause of his Son to escape trouble, they would not only meet affliction of the body, but also loss of life with the murderers of Jesus, who, in the siege of their city, had their bodies afflicted by hunger and thirst, and then lost their lives; a punishment well set forth by gehenna.

In continuing to strengthen the hearts of the disciples, Christ tells them that not even a sparrow falls to the ground without the notice of God—"fear ye not, therefore, ye are of more value than many sparows."—Vs. 31. They were not to fear the afflictions which they would meet from the Jews; for God had called them and would preserve them. Hence the Saviour said, verse 22, "but he that endureth to the end shall be saved"—he who endures patiently every trial and affliction, will escape the punishment which fell upon the Jews. This was actually the case, for Eusebius informs us, that not a Christian perished in the destruction of the chosen people.

But though they were not to fear the Jews, they were to fear God; for if they apostatized from him and fell away, they would be among their countrymen when that destruction came, which Christ declared was greater than ever had been or ever should be, set forth by the worms, the fires, the abhorrence of hell, gehenna, the valley of Hinnom; they would endure thirst, raging hunger, and bitter pain, and at last fall by the Roman sword, and perhaps be thrown into the valley of Hinnom, or among that number of 600,000, which Josephus affirms were unburied. Such, surely, is the meaning of the passage, for, in my judgment, there is not the least shadow of proof that it has any reference to future misery.

Such then, do I view to be the correct meaning of the passages in which gehenna occurs. And I aver it as my solemn conviction, that the more I study the Bible, the more do I feel assured, that not only does gehenna afford no countenance to the doctrine of endless misery, but that it is no where taught in the sacred pages.

G. W. K.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE FUND.

Amount named in our last,	$25.51
Utica $21.39—Cooperstown $20,	41.39
Amount	$66.90
Paid over to J. Stebbins, Treasurer,	$25.51

Three very respectable collections for a beginning—let those that have made collections, forward the amounts at their earliest and safest convenience; and if there are any congregations that have neglected or forgotten to take up the requested collection, let them, by all means, stir promptly in this important affair. Never mind the amount. Where there are but a very few friends in a meeting, and they not wealthy, of course but a small sum can be expected—but we believe there is not a congregation of Universalists in the State, unable to contribute any thing—and there are many, we know, who can raise $50 each. Let all, then, move in this matter, if they have not already done it, and report, as requested by the General Agent, to A. B. Grosh.

A Sermon by Br. K. Townsend has been omitted this week, to make room for Mr. Campbell's letter. It will appear in our next. We have a few more on hand, particularly one from Br. Manley, containing some original remarks on the phrase "cast soul and body into gehenna," which we will endeavor to find room for as soon as consistent with other engagements.

Br. T. P. Abell is respectfully informed that we have received no communication from him since we saw him last. Has he sent us any? We have supposed him unwell for a part of the time, as a reason for the silence. A. B. G.

A Voice to the Married.—Br. Austin's suggestion is agreed to. The "Voice to the Married" will be commenced with No. 14, current volume, (the beginning of our second quarter,) and "A Voice to Parents" can follow after.—Let him not cramp himself in room—there is plenty for him—let him take all he wants. A. B. G.

Utica Berean Institute—Meets every Tuesday evening in the basement of the Universalist meeting-house.—Tuesday, March 5th.—Lecture by A. B. Grosh, and reading of "The Budget," a literary journal published in manuscript.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. Guild, in the school-house in the Houghtailing Settlement, in Davenport, at 10 o'clock, A. M., and at the Cade school-house at 1 P. M.—Br. J. French, at Denmark—Br. Delong, at Tully, forenoon, afternoon and evening—Br. Bullard, at Binghampton. The friends through the country are respectfully solicited to attend.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. Gage, at Babcock Hill, and near Br. Emmory's in the evening.

A Conference will be held in Columbus Centre, Chenango county, next Wednesday and Thursday.

The fourth Conference of the Chenango Association of Universalists, on the second Wednesday and Thursday, 13th and 14th inst.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

L H V, Fowler (O) for self, F B, S C and M C—P M, Lodi (Mich) for self and D H—P M, Tiffin (O) for E C—P M, Howlet Hill, for self, J P R, D R and J C—S S, Ovid (O) for self, J W and O I—C N S, Russellville (Ala)—J B, Cortland village, for M M and R W W—R S, Mendon—P M, Norwich Town (Ct) for E P and R M—W S, Lima, for self and D T—Rev W B, Cortland village—Rev J M A, Danvers (Mass) for J T—O W P, Franklinville, for self, T G, N R and J C M—P M, Montrose (Pa) for L S and G Y—P M, Lanesboro (Pa) for S B—P M, New London (Ct) for J B L and T S—J C, Three Mile Bay, for self, J C J and J V N—P M, Cooperstown, for D C C, L W, J K and C C—G S G, Pine Grove, (Pa) for self, J H R and J W H—J U, Reed (O)—Rev J B, Swanton Falls, (Vt) for I S J—P M, Madison, for I C and C T C—P M, Homer, for E S, R C, J C, H H, E B, D B, A S, D B, S K, W W, L H, H N, B R, E H, J S F, S H, C A, J P, Mrs D M and M S—C W M, Royalton (Mass) for C S—G P G, Watertown—P M, Ridgeway, for M M N—P M, Gainesville, for H J, J T, C R and S K—P M, Philipsville, for C S and S S S.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TO THE SAVIOUR.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

"My beloved is mine, and I am his."

Yes, I am thine! Upon thy bosom leaning,
No grief hath power to damp my fervent bliss;
Nor can such love to thee be overweening—
Thou art deserving all, and more than this!

Beloved, ne'er from thee one moment straying,
My heart shall twine its roots upon thy truth;
All lighter loves than this are fast decaying,
Lost in the dying years of sunny youth.

When shadows gather o'er my timid spirit,
Thy faith beams brightly, and they pass away;
Oh! can a long, intense devotion merit
Such love as thou art shedding o'er my way?

One moment absent from thy sweet communion,
My heart grows faint and trembles with alarms;
I have no joy save in the blessed union
That brings me welcome to thy shielding arms.

I'll love thee deeper as age mantles o'er me,
And draw still closer to thy yearning breast;
And then I'll pass, where thou hast passed before me,
And enter with thee to eternal rest.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

AWAKE YE THAT SLUMBER.

BY REV. W. ROUNSEVILLE.

Awake, ye that slumber, arise from the dust!
Awake! gird your armor, in God put your trust;
The "sword of the spirit" be firm in your grasp,
The "hope of salvation" your brows shall inclasp.

Awake! wield the armor that God hath prepared,
The rights of the poor and defenceless to guard;
Rear the standard of truth, let your motto be love,
And show by your conduct, the wisdom above.

Awake! for the tyrant your homes doth invade,
And the joys of your fireside in sadness are laid;
Arise, and the heart of the bigot shall fail,
And the legions of error no longer prevail.

Awake! and bid bigotry flee from the world,
And fell superstition to darkness be hurled;
Let creeds and tradition before you recede,
And nothing the conquest of truth shall impede.

Awake from your slumbers! 'tis duty that calls—
'Tis duty that bids you to guard Zion's walls!
Will ye sleep when oppression hath marshalled her clan
To crush to the earth the bright prospects of man?

Awake! will ye slumber while charity pleads?
And religion from fiends hypocritic still bleeds?
Will you sleep while her altars are reeking with gore,
And the life-blood of victims unceasingly pour?

Awake from your slumbers! oh, why will you sleep,
While the daughters of Zion in sadness must weep!
Will you patiently yield your vile necks to the yoke,
Nor rise in your strength 'gainst the tyrants proud stroke?

Awake! then, ye sleepers, how can you forbear?
And the badge of submission eternally wear?
Arise! for the welfare of man is at stake,
Awake from your slumbers, ye sleepers, AWAKE.

THE WILL.—A Miser's Reflection in Affixing his Signature—Before using it however, he uttered a deep drawn sigh, or rather groan, and exclaimed, in a sorrowful voice, "Mine Gott! is dis all what a long life gomes too?—for dirty or forty years since I arrived at Bristol. I gave my time, and labors, and judgment, droadging like a slave, denying mineself all holydays, and lugsuries, and gomforts, dat I schrape togedder, by hook and by grook, a handsome property; and now, in von little moment, vid von little sgratch of mine pen, it shall all pass away vrom me for eber and eber, and anoder shall enjoy it! Houses, and stocks, and debts, and bills, I must leave dem all behind.—Dis is what makes it so bidder to die."—Mr. Smith's New Novel.

When the scholars of Socrates were anxious to bestow gifts upon their master in token of their esteem and gratitude, one poor scholar confessed, "Master, I have nothing to give; but I will give thee myself."

"Wilt thou?" said the philosopher; "then I will return thee better to thyself." How much is this like a true disciple of Jesus Christ, who comes to him "without money, and without price!"

MARRIAGES.

In this city, February 13th, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. ELISHA W. LITCHFIELD, to Miss MARY JOHNSON, both of Clinton, Oneida county.

In Cherry Valley, January 27th, by Rev. J. Potter, Mr. MARTIN ENGELL, of Sharon, to Miss LOUISA SEELY, of the former place.

Also, in the Universalist church in Sharon, February 27th, by the same, Mr. WM. DALE, of Fort Plain, to Miss IRENE ELDREDGE, daughter of Mr. David Eldredge, of the former place.

Also, at Minden, Montgomery county, January 31st, by the same, Mr. HENRY MCNEAL, to Miss POLLY WILSON, daughter of John Wilson, Esq., all of Minden.

In Hopewell, on the 5th of December last, by Rev. Oliver Ackley, Mr. EPHRAIM ARCHER, to Miss BETSEY PRICE, all of Hopewell.

In Seneca, January 13th, by the same, Mr. RANNY PHELPS, of Camden, to Miss CLARINDA MALAY, of Seneca.

In Bridgewater, on the 25th of December last, by Rev. T. J. Smith, Mr. DAVID HUBBARD, to Miss LYDIA ANN WILLIS, both of that place.

In Winfield, December 31st, by the same, Mr. GEORGE TIBLSON, to Miss NANCY WOODARD, both of Winfield.

In Litchfield, February 6th, by the same, Mr. DAVID B. GETCHELL, of Winfield, to Miss ALMIRA HADLEY, of the former place.

In Bridgewater, February 10th, by the same, Mr. MOSES BENNET, of Sangerfield, to Miss JULIA CARPENTER, of the former place.

DEATHS.

On the 3d of July last, in the town of Madrid, of consumption, Dr. COLLINS R. PIERCE, aged about 32 years.

Br. Pierce was a firm believer in, and supporter of the doctrine of universal salvation. He suffered all that a human being could suffer, and finally died in the hope of a joyful resurrection. He left a wife and three children to mourn his departure. The consolation of the Gospel was tendered to the friends and a very large audience, by the writer.
E. A. G.

In the town of Madrid, on the 19th of October last, Miss MARANDA LOCKWOOD, aged about 18 years. Complaint unknown. Maranda was universally respected by all who knew her. She was the companion of the aged and the young—the joy of the domestic and social circle—a constant attendant on public worship. Perfectly resigned in death, she gave up the ghost with a firm belief in the world's salvation. Sermon by
E. A. G.

In Massena, on the 9th ult., of a lingering consumption, Miss SALLY NIGHTINGALE, aged about 35 years. She was a member of the society of Universalists in Massena, and a person who had the esteem of all. She expressed the greatest anxiety for the arrival of the hour of death; it came at last, and bore her on faith's triumphant wing, to the abode of the blest. The funeral was attended at the Baptist church, which was granted for that occasion. Sermon by
E. A. G.

On the 6th inst., at Champion, (being on his return from a visit to the Royal Grant,) Mr. CHARLES HUNT, of Antwerp, (in the vicinity of the Oxbow,) in the 55th year of his age. Br. Hunt was an active, useful member of society, respected by all. Cheerful and cheering in social circles, a constant attendant at religious meetings, his house and table were freely proffered to the weary traveller, particularly to preachers of every sect. He maintained and expressed on all suitable occasions, an established belief in a world's salvation. His remains were conveyed to the place of his late residence, and on the 8th his funeral obsequies were attended by his bereaved widow, children, grand children, connexions, and a numerous assembly of friends and neighbors, who manifested their sympathy and respect for the afflicted: to whom the consoling hopes of the Gospel were tendered by the writer, from 1 Peter i: 3. A. WOOD.

In Eaton, January 17th, Mr. JAMES F. CHAMBERLIN, aged 60 years. In the death of Br. Chamberlin, every department of society has sustained a loss. He was a man of extensive business, and consequently, the business part of community will miss him much. The poor man has lost a friend, virtue an unflinching advocate, the religion of Jesus a faithful supporter his widow a kind husband, his children an indulgent Father, and the writer of this notice, a well tried and faithful friend.

For many years, Br. Chamberlin was a consistent Universalist, he was zealous in a good cause, and his zeal was tempered with knowledge. At his house, the minister of the restitution was always greeted with a hearty welcome, and many a happy hour have I passed with him and his family, in conversing upon the wisdom and goodness of God our Father. In this world we shall meet him no more forever.—But hope "the Christian's polar star, and the soother of our sorrows," points to that haven of rest, where the "ransomed of the Lord." of every nation, kindred, and tongue, shall be gathered together, and become one in Christ Jesus.

His funeral was attended on the 19th. and a discourse given by the undersigned, to the surviving friends, and an unusually large congregation of attentive hearers.
E. M. WOOLLEY.

In Sackets Harbor, on Friday morning, the 14th inst., after an illness of 12 days, Mr. ISAAC FARWELL, aged 5 years.

"SONGS OF ZION."

Just published and for sale at the "Trumpet" office, No. 40, Cornhill, (Up stairs,) the NEW BOOK OF PSALMODY, entitled, "SONGS OF ZION; OR THE CAMBRIDGE COLLECTION OF SACRED MUSIC; designed for the Church, for the Social Meetings of Christians, and for Family Worship; comprising a rich variety of the most popular tunes, anthems, etc., with many pieces from various authors, never before published, written expressly for this work; arranged with a figured bass for the Organ and Piano Forte. To which is prefixed a Familiar Introduction to the art of Singing, designed for the aid of those who are entirely unacquainted with the science of music; the Instruction being reduced to great plainness and simplicity." By THOMAS WHITTEMORE. Fifth Edition, enlarged and revised, containing eight additional pages of original anthems, for Temperance Celebrations, without any increase of price. Persons acquainted with the science of harmony are requested to call and examine this work.

This book contains upwards of three hundred tunes, of a great variety of metres. In addition to these, there are upwards of 100 pages of Anthems.

It has upwards of 350 pages of the size of the "Boston Academy's Collection;" and will be sold at the same price. The author pledges himself to the public, that neither pains nor expense have been spared to render this work correct, in its scientific, and elegant in its mechanical execution.

This work is very particularly recommended in cases where different denominations of Christians unite in "Union Singing Schools." On the great theme of praise all Christians agree; we can all unite our hearts and voices in celebrating the praises of God and the Redeemer, and the glories of eternity. In a great number of cases, the whole hymn is put upon the same page with the tune, which will be very convenient in singing these tunes as voluntaries. There are many most excellent hymns inserted entire, which appear in no hymn book in common use.

Boston, September 29, 1838.

UNIVERSALIST UNION.

This publication, as its title imports, is in defence of the final Restitution—in other words, the ultimate holiness and happiness of all men. A portion of it is devoted to miscellany of strict moral tendency. No efforts are spared to make it an instructive and interesting periodical—a welcome visiter in the domestic circle.

The publication of a highly interesting series of original articles, under the title—"JOURNAL OF A PHYSICIAN"—has just been commenced in its columns, and will be continued weekly throughout the present volume, and completed with it. They contain, "Observations on men and things, during several years peregrinations through Poland, Russia, Germany, France," etc., and are from the pen of an eminent European Physician. This work alone, though occupying but about one eighth of the paper, it is believed, will be deemed worth the entire subscription.

The Union is a large super royal sheet, published weekly, and is now issued in two forms—Quarto and Octavo. Terms, $2 per annum for the Quarto, and $2.50 for the Octavo. The first No. of the 4th Vol. was issued November 10, 1838. The numbers can be furnished from the commencement. Specimen numbers also may be had on application at the Publishing Office, No. 130, Fulton-st., between Broadway and Nassau, New-York, to which place all communications and letters on business should be addressed.

☞ Universalist clergymen are respectfully requested, if agreeable to their feelings, to name the commencement of the Foreign Correspondence to their congregations. There may be those who would like to secure the volume on that account, who would not otherwise obtain information of it.

THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE

IS PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY,

By A. B. Grosh and O. Hutchinson.

TERMS.—To Mail and Office subscribers, at $1.50 per annum, in advance, or within four months; $2.00 if not paid within four months; or $2.50 if not paid within the year. No subscription received for less than one year, unless the money is paid in advance; and no paper discontinued till all arrearages are paid, except at the discretion of the Publishers. Agents or Companies, paying for eight copies, will be allowed the ninth copy gratis; and so in proportion for a larger number. All communications by mail, must be post paid or free. ☞ To City subscribers who receive their papers by a carrier, $2.00 per annum, payable in advance, or $3.00 if not paid within the year.

C. C. P. GROSH, Printer, No. 41 Genesee-street.

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE
AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE.

"I AM SET FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE GOSPEL."....."PROVE ALL THINGS; HOLD FAST THAT WHICH IS GOOD."

VOLUME X. [NEW SERIES.] UTICA, N. Y., FRIDAY, MARCH 8, 1839. NUMBER 10.

[The circumstances which are connected with this discourse, are briefly as follows:—

Mr. Lewis, a revolutionary soldier, died—a part of his family were Methodists, and the Methodist clergyman attended the funeral. At the request of the family, I preached this discourse on the following Sunday. The friends wish it published. They are worthy members of society, and I should be pleased to have their wishes complied with.

Yours, K. T.]

For the Magazine and Advocate.

FUNERAL SERMON.

BY REV. K. TOWNSEND.

"For dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return."—GEN. iii. 19.

Such is the declaration of the Almighty, made to our first parents after their transgression in the garden of Eden, and directed particularly to Adam.

The account of the creation of our first parents, the law given by Jehovah for their observance, their temptation, their transgression and its consequences, are detailed by the sacred historian with all plainness and brevity. Mankind, however, have not been contented with what is narrated, and launching out into the boundless field of illimitable conjecture, assuming to be wise above what is written, they have informed us that Adam came from the hand of his Creator, holy and immortal—that by his fall he lost communion with God; that from thenceforth he was under his wrath and curse, made subject to the pains of death and of hell forever.

The account of the sacred historian does not, however, communicate these facts—the Bible says nothing of this supposed immortality. There is no intimation given, that man's physical organization underwent any radical changes after his transgression—no one says he was created pure and holy—and nothing is said throughout the whole account, of either the pains or the pleasures of another existence.

It is true, death was spoken of in the day of transgression; but it was only such death as could, and did pass upon him in the day of his disobedience. Afterwards Adam is informed by the Almighty—"Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree which I commanded thee, saying, thou shalt not eat of it, cursed is the ground for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. Thorns also, and thistles shall it bring forth to thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." You will perceive the line of distinction between what is stated as consequences, and what is communicated as information. Because Adam had thus done, he is informed, that in the sweat of his face he should eat bread, until he should return to the ground from which he was taken. He is instructed that he is dust, and shall return to dust, without any intimation that his decomposition and return to his original element, had any connexion, whatever, with his own conduct. These facts are mentioned, not on account of their particular bearing upon our subject, but to impress upon the mind of all, the importance of letting the Bible speak for itself.

The declaration of the Almighty, directed to Adam, informed him of his mortality. The whole family of man, partaking of his image, constituted in like manner, have been made subject to the same infirmities, nd are liable to the same mandate. One generation after another rises up to people this busy, active world. One generation after another passes from the stage of action.—The fathers live, and die, and mingle with the dust. Their children rise up to fill their places, inquiring, "the fathers, where are they, and the prophets, do they live forever?" In that common receptacle, the narrow house appointed for all the living, dwell the youth and the aged, the noble and the peasant, the wise and the foolish, the learned and the unlearned. There sleep, side by side, the conqueror and the conquered—the oppressor and the oppressed. There, too, now sleep in the silence of the tomb, all but a feeble remnant of that little patriot band, who dared to raise their arms against oppression, and beard the lion in his den. Armed in the justice of their cause, confident of the protection of Heaven, they stood forth invincible, upon the tented field.—Another—alas, another of our country's brave defenders, has passed from the scenes of life, fallen before the invincible conqueror, death, giving to us all, another assurance of the veracity of Heaven, that dust we are, and unto dust we must return.

Almost every people, if not every nation under heaven, have been believers in a future existence. Nothing, however, seems more evident, than that there is an insuperable and impenetrable barrier between this world and the world of spirits; hence, when a person gives loose reign to the imagination, he has before him an illimitable field of conjecture, while it may be impossible, from the nature of the subject, to disprove his errors, and expose his fallacies. There are but two sources to which we can apply for information—one is human authority, made up of speculations and conjectures—the other, the Gospel of Jesus Christ, which reveals life and immortality beyond the tomb.

I will not institute a comparison to influence your judgment, while I believe all will readily coincide in the opinion, that we should seek our information in the pages of the everlasting Gospel. We ought not, however, to suppose that only those who reject the Gospel, or are without that revelation of the will of God, indulge themselves in unfounded conjectures. It is too often the case, that even professed Christian teachers give loose reign to their imaginations, assume to be wise above what is written, and instead of preaching Jesus and the resurrection—instead of giving Heaven's truth, supported by Bible testimony, they advance their own unauthorized, unproved opinions. The Bible not only informs us that we are dust, and shall return to the dust again—but it also assures us of a blissful, a glorious, a triumphant resurrection. If, therefore, we take the Bible for our guide, we must content ourselves with the instructions of the Bible. If we would understand its teachings, we must draw the line of discrimination between human speculations and Bible truth, and resolve to content ourselves with what is revealed. I know that much has been said about separations in another world—about people being divested of all natural affection there—some have even undertaken to define the particular employments persons shall engage in, how they will feel and how act; but certainly where the Bible is silent, it does not become man to speak. Let, then, the subject of our inquiry be confined to what the Bible says of the resurrection of man.

We are told in the New Testament, to regard the resurrection of our Lord, as proof of man's resurrection—we are informed he was the first fruits of them that slept. Now the first fruits were ever a sample of the whole crop, and assurance of the ingathering of the whole. So Jesus Christ, by his resurrection, was an assurance of the resurrection in his own likeness, of all who slept. But upon this subject the evidence is most positive and most plain. We have pointed you to the fact, that we all partook in the constitution and organization of our first parents—that we were all dust, and like them, all turning back to our mother earth.

In the account given by Paul of the resurrection, in his first Letter to the Corinthians, where the subject is fully set forth and amply explained, this truth is fully recognized. And he declares, "for as in Adam all die, even so, in Christ shall all be made alive." One fact is here incontrovertibly established—all who die in Adam shall be made alive in Christ, and as all died in Adam, all shall, in Christ be made alive. This, then, it is allowed by all, proves a universal resurrection.

It is however asserted, that this only refers to the reanimation of man, and involves no moral change. Let us, however, consult the testimony, and be guided solely by its teachings. You will consult the testimony from which I quote, and read it with all its connexions at your leisure. We read, then, that every man shall be made alive in his own order. "Christ the first fruits, afterward they who are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end."—when? Answer—when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father. You discover that Christ is here called the first fruits—the first fruits of the resurrection—and will not the whole body of which he is the first fruits, partake of his image?

Again—the apostle speaks of his giving up the kingdom to God, for which it will only be prepared, when each subject shall partake of that mind which was in Christ Jesus our Lord. But he continues, and first describes the subjection of all things to Christ, next, the subjection of Christ to God, with the assurance, that from thenceforth, God shall be all in all.

You discover, then, that all shall be made alive in Christ, that they shall become subject to him, and their subjection to him is expressed by the same term which expresses the subjection of Christ to God. We are also informed, that this kingdom shall be given up to God, and God shall be all in all.

In the light of this evidence, I would ask—if man is not, by the power of the resurrection, prepared for immortal purity, could it be said that God should pervade and fill all created intelligence—that a kingdom other than a purified one, should be given up to our Creator?

In continuing his description, the apostle mentions various different orders of glory. "There is one glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. So, also, is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power." You will perceive throughout this whole description, that the line of contrast is not drawn between glory on the one hand, and infamy on the other—it is only a contrast between different orders of glory. So, also, in the application, Paul speaks of the resurrection of the dead without discrimination, and he says of them all—"it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory"—an expression we conceive hardly applicable to any who might be made immortal only to prepare them for a state of endless disobedience and infamy.

Once more; he continues—"The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven. As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." The apostle here speaks of Adam—let us now inquire, who have borne his image? we answer, every individual of the whole intelligent creation of God. "As in Adam all die." Then the assurance is co-extensive. We shall, all of us, bear the image of the heavenly.

But is there no farther evidence of our connexion with Adam, than the one, that we are mortal—have we not also shared in his moral image, like him been made subject to vanity, like him been made corruptible, and like him has not our corruptibility ripened into corruption? From both these evils, mortality and corruption, our Lord came to save us—and the apostle most plainly declares that this mortal must put on immortality—that this corruptible must put on incorruption—that what was sown in dishonor, shall be raised in glory—that we who have borne the image of the earthly Adam, shall also bear the image of the heavenly—that in Christ all shall be made alive. Christ Jesus, it is declared, is the image of the invisible God. Not, as all will agree, on account of a correspondence in form, or in some single particular, but because he shadowed forth and exhibited the moral perfections of the great I Am; and we feel authorized in saying, that when we bear the image of our risen Lord, we shall be like him, and see him as he is.

Once more—the apostle not only teaches the subjection of all things to Jesus, himself, and the delivering up of the kingdom to God; but also the destruction of every enemy, even death, the last enemy.

I would rather, that I were not under the necessity of stating the fact, but I would not have the important subject of examination misunderstood. It is well known to many, and should be to all, that the words placed in italics in our Bible, are supplied by the translators, and have no corresponding words in the original. In the 26th verse of the chapter from which we have quoted, the apostle declares—"the last enemy shall be destroyed, death"—he thus not only assures us of the destruction of every enemy, but particularizes death, as the last.

Again—after having described the complete and glorious triumph of the Son of God—the subjection of all things to himself—the giving up of all things to the Creator—the release of all from the bondage of corruption—their being clothed upon with immortality—he declares, that then shall be brought to pass the saying, "death is swallowed up in victory;" and the question, the triumphant question is propounded, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" The question is unanswered—for death's dominion is overthrown—death, himself, is destroyed—and the joyous victory is celebrated in aspirations of praise and gratitude—"Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

We can not but conclude, that if the apostle believed that only a part of mankind were to be raised to glory, and a part to infamy, he would have expressed it—that, had he been certified that this resurrection was to be succeeded by any event of importance, he would have continued and communicated it. His description, however, perfectly harmonizes throughout—perfectly corresponds with the declared designs of Jehovah, and the expressed objects of the Saviour's mission.

Again—we conceive it to be no small evidence of the correctness of our understanding of this important subject, that nothing short of an universal and unconditional resurrection, will meet the ardent desires of the Christian heart, or the case of that immense number who die in infancy, idiocy, or ignorance of the truths of the Gospel of Christ. It is to us certain, that the Gospel makes provision for all these. Nevertheless, a state of enduring happiness is only to be attained by the power of the resurrection. If that resurrection be founded upon contingencies, or if aught beyond it rest upon conditions, they are alike to all. Faith is not required of one individual as a prerequisite, and another exempted from the requisition—good works are not the criteria of judgment in one instance, and dispensed with entirely in another—and hence a salvation demanding faith or good works, is entirely out of the reach of all who lack the needed information, or the ability necessary to perform what is demanded.

In such difficulties as these, men continually involve themselves when they attempt to be wise above what is written. And how little does the revelation of God require the hand of human improvement, and the aid of human speculations!

All of us, it is true, are but dust; and to it, we must, all of us, ere long return. A few more rising and setting suns—a few more days and—a few more passing years—he who speaks and you who hear—all of us shall follow our aged friend to the silence of the tomb. But Heaven be praised, this is not to be our abiding place! Our risen Lord has burst the bands of the tomb—that resistless conqueror, death, shall in turn be conquered—we shall all, all of us, be raised immortal and incorruptible! Then shall each mother meet each darling child—each child shall meet with his affectionate parents—every wanderer shall be brought in, every prodigal return, and a redeemed world shall praise their great Creator! How cheering this prospect to every Christian heart—to look forward to that time, when all their high and holy desires shall be gratified—when the breathings of the soul shall be heard and answered—an end be made of sin and transgression—human speculations be lost in a blaze of glorious reality—human faith in divine fruition, and immortal glory crown each child of Adam's race! In view of such a prospect, such an all-glorious consummation, is there a heart so dead, that it feels no throb of gratitude—is there a soul so indifferent, that it does not respond, "Thy will, O God, be done!"—are there none who feel no promptings to yield their bodies, living sacrifices, holy and acceptable in the sight of God, to serve him with their bodies and spirits, which are his?

I leave this part of our subject, to offer a few remarks and observations, in relation to the individual whose loss we this day commemorate, and who has already been committed to the silence of the tomb.

As a minister of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and a citizen of this free republic, I can not but realize, and I trust in some degree appreciate, the high civil and religious privileges which are the common property of every inhabitant of our highly favored country. And while we are called as men and as Christians, to mingle our sympathies at the loss of one to whom, under God, we are largely indebted for those high privileges, it will be well for us, for a moment to pause and contemplate upon the virtues, the labors, and the integrity of that little patriot band, who are fast falling before the arrows of death—going down to the chambers of silence, to be seen on earth no more forever.

The all-wise Father has so ordered, that human attainment is ever the price of human exertion, and those who would enjoy uninterrupted liberty, can only secure it by unwearied and unceasing vigilance. For a single moment cast your eyes back upon the page of our country's history, to the period of the birth of the deceased, 82 years since. Alas, 82 years since we had no country—we were but a feeble dependence, a colonial appendage of the crown of Britain, misgoverned by a hereditary aristocracy, who, nursed in the lap of ease, were ignorant of our situation, ignorant of our capacities, ignorant of our resources and our wants. I need not now, to an American audience, detail the long list of usurpations, abuses, and acts of petty tyranny, which finally led our fathers to throw off the yoke of colonial bondage—to declare, that these United States are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, and for the maintenance and support of these rights, to pledge to each other, their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

Most decidedly does your speaker reprobate and condemn a war of conquest, and no one can more heartily despise a hireling soldiery, ready to execute, without question, the mandate of the haughty and unfeeling oppressor. But when man boldly asserts the rights of man—bravely bares his own bosom to the storm—risks life, and liberty, and all that man holds dear, that he may secure to himself the privileges of freedom, and transmit the priceless legacy unimpaired to his descendants, I should indeed be a monster of ingratitude, did I withold the just meed of dear bought approbation. I would do more than this—and while I render honor to those to whom honor is so justly due, I would excite the children of heroic sires to emulate the example and copy the firmness, of those who have so nobly discharged their duties to their country, and to the cause of liberty throughout the world.

It is frequently the case, that while the name of the commander is cherished, and his deeds handed down to posterity with encomiums, those who have moved in a less conspicuous sphere, are overlooked and forgotten. In the business of defence, every thing depends upon unity and concert of action. This is only secured by the unwavering fidelity of subordinates, and whatever may be the situation occupied, all who discharge their duties with undeviating integrity, are entitled to all the honors due to a faithful servant.—This the deceased most nobly did. He heeded the call of his country, enrolled himself in the army of the revolution, and throughout the whole of that eventful struggle, he bore all those privations and hardships, peculiar to those times which truly tried men's souls.

That eventful struggle, you all know, was carried on with stinted means, scanty fare, scanty pay, and scanty clothing. They were often compelled to encamp upon the frozen earth, and to pass the stormy night with no covering save their tattered garments, and the blue canopy of heaven. Often were they compelled to march where their footsteps might be traced with their own blood, as it flowed from their bare and lacerated feet upon the icy snow!

Friends and countrymen, it was in such hardships as these, surrounded by these and a thousand nameless privations, that our fathers redeemed their solemn pledge, and testified their unwavering devotion to the cause of liberty. It was thus they labored, thus they toiled, to secure to themselves and to us, their posterity, those exalted privileges which are the pride and the adornment of our country, and the wonder of the world.

It is not alone upon the battle-field that the soldier risks his life—he is continually surrounded by peril—continually liable to those skirmishes so destructive of human life.

Such was particularly the case with the deceased, who was more than once employed to transmit the despatches of the commander in chief, and to discharge other important duties.—With peculiar pride he spoke of his presence at the battle of Monmouth, at Germantown, and Brandywine, and upon his own mutilated body, he bore the marks of honorable service—an assurance that, in the cause of his country, he was a soldier, faithful and valiant.

Having, in common with the heroes of the revolution, devoted the best years of his life to the service of his country—having succeeded in extorting from England an acknowledgment of our independence, and conquered a peace—having been honorably discharged, and having received the thanks of his country—alas, all that country had then to give!—he retired from the scenes of war, to pursue the peaceful occupations of private life—beat his sword into a plough share, and learned war no more. In this situation his services to his country did not cease. As one of that people from whom power emanates, he aided in carrying out those principles for which he had so earnestly contended. In establishing those institutions, which secure to all and each the privileges of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, he assisted in raising our country to its present state of unexampled prosperity—was privileged to see his countrymen—his fellow-soldiers—his own and their descendants, springing up around him—fondly cherishing the memories of their aged sires, and richly enjoying the legacy secured by their integrity, their labors, and their privations.

With the deceased I had not the pleasure of an acquaintance, and am dependent for my information, upon those who were his associates, and those who shared with him in his devotion to our common country. From these I am happy to learn, that as a citizen, a neighbor, a father and a friend, he discharged all his numerous obligations with fidelity—setting before the rising generation an example of rigid integrity, and unchanging morality. More than all this—he had been taught to look forward beyond the bounds of time, to a period when death shall be swallowed up of life—when a ransomed world shall bow in the presence of the Eternal, and acknowledge Christ their Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Through life, the deceased was blessed with excellent health—he was privileged with a constitution unusually strong—enabling him to encounter and overcome the most excessive hardships. But for some time past, the infirmities of age were visibly creeping over him. He was sensible of his situation even to the last—sensible that the hour of his departure was near, and when the summons came, he peacefully resigned his spirit to the God who gave it, and fell asleep.

He has gone! He who once stood in the field of battle, the invincible champion of freedom, has in turn fallen before the mighty conqueror, death. The head, the patriot, the father, the friend and the Christian, is consigned to the silence of the tomb. He sleeps with our fathers—with those who have, in the institutions of our country, reared to themselves a monument enduring as time, and whose epitaph is written upon the affections of their grateful countrymen. I trust that the memory of our deceased friend and aged brother, will be gratefully cherished by us all—that the relatives of the deceased, his companion and his children, will largely participate in the sympathies of those who have been so much benefited by his labors—that all of us, who enjoy the privileges of civil and religious liberty, will remember our obligations of gratitude—that while we express our admiration of the integrity and virtue of our fathers, we shall labor to imitate what we admire—and that the rich birth-right which we have received, may be faithfully guarded, and transmitted pure and unimpaired to our posterity.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

ASSUMPTION NOT ARGUMENT.

In further noticing the Tract entitled "Universalism unscriptural and absurd," we come to the following remarkable passage. Page 4th. "The doctrine of restoration teaches, (what, indeed, Universalists generally affirm,) that God punishes no sinner except for his individual good; that the penalty of all transgression is fatherly correction, designed to reclaim and bless. Hence, whenever a man sins, he receives as penalty, goodness, in some form, at the hand of the Lord. Upon this hypothesis, the more men sin the richer experience will they have of God's goodness; and the soul that shall receive the highest possible manifestations of Divine favor, will be the most outrageous and heaven-daring rebel on earth! This follows inevitably from the doctrine that God inflicts upon sinners only that which is for their good; and who can help seeing that this is little else than for the Almighty to offer a premium for blasphemy and rebellion? According to this doctrine also, God's raining upon the wicked, 'snares, fire and brimstone,' is synonymous with sending upon them sanctifying mercies! And the threatening against the ungodly of 'indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish,' refers to the distribution of different sorts of blessings! The Scripture expression 'fierce wrath of God,' means simply, fierce goodness of God; and the 'fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries,' means fiery mercy which shall save the adversaries; and the 'smoke of their torment which ascendeth up forever and ever,' must be understood as the smoke of the salvation of the damned!"

We remarked in the forepart of this examination that the objection of our author to Universalism lay with equal force against his own theory. This is manifestly true with regard to the above extract. God punishes no sinner except for his good. The penalty for all transgression is fatherly correction. What an absurdity! Nothing but goodness comes from the hand of the Lord! How inconsistent! Here lies the objection. The penalty is fatherly correction! The penalty ought to be purely evil and vindictive in order to suit the taste of our author. To suppose that nothing but goodness comes from the hand of the Lord, is quite objectionable. There ought to be something evil and mean, as penalty, or the character of God could not be maintained, consistently with our author's views. A man, whose fundamental article of belief is evil and mean, and only so, expects that the administration of his God will be the same.

But our author's objections and sarcasms bear with equal weight against the Bible, that they do against the Universalist. Take, for instance, Ps. xciv: 12. "Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O Lord, and teachest him out of thy law." And again. "Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee." Jer. ii: 10. "Thou shalt also consider in thine heart that as a man chasteneth his son so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee." Deut. viii: 5. "Therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities." Amos iii: 2. "And I will punish the world for their evil—and the wicked for their iniquity.....I will make a man more precious than fine gold." Isa. xiii: 11, 12. Now what does all this chastening—this correction—this punishment mean? Why is it inflicted? Evidently for wrong doing—for transgression. This then is the penalty for transgression. But this penalty is "goodness, in some form, at the hand of the Lord." Here lies the absurdity. "Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth: therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty." Job v: 15. But according to our author, we must despise this chastening, because, forsooth, it is "goodness in some form." And we must also draw the inference, that "whenever a man sins, (say David, Job, Paul, or any of the saints, prophets, or apostles, or even our author—for I suppose he is the real Simon Pure,) they receive as penalty, goodness in some form, at the hand of the Lord." And, also, "upon this hypothesis, the more these men sin, the richer experience will they continually have of God's goodness. And the soul (say any of the saints) that shall receive the highest possible manifestations of Divine favor, will be the most outrageous and heaven-daring rebel on earth!"

Now, why not draw the same inference with regard to the saints—their chastisement, and the end of that discipline, that this tract writer does from sinners of any other class, and so boldly declare, in the face of the Bible and of reason, that none "can help seeing that this is little else than for the Almighty to offer a premium for blasphemy and rebellion."

But we will dismiss this page of the tract, and follow on to the next, which declares, "6. If the penalty of the Divine Law be disciplinary and purifying punishment in a future state, then hell is a most desirable home. According to the doctrine in hand, it fits multitudes for heaven who were incorrigible upon earth: it is a kind of hospital, where the deeply diseased with sin, and otherwise incurable, are restored to perfect soundness. Hence no one need fear the 'damnation of hell,' nor indulge a mistaken wish to escape it. It is a place of mercy. Hell is designed to secure the eternal salvation of the ungodly! and the sooner they feel its purifying flames, the sooner will they have paid the wages of sin, and be cleansed for the joys of heaven."

The reader will discover that our author makes a very light thing of punishment, chastisement, penalty, hell, damnation of hell, etc., unless those ideas convey an infinite, incurable evil. This is the very ground of his objections and ridicule. Because chastisement, as Paul says, though grievous, results in "our profit, that we might be partakers of his [God's] holiness," it may all be turned to sarcasm and ridicule.

We need pursue our author's objections no further, on this point, for all those objections against the disciplinary punishment of the wicked, lie with equal weight against the fatherly chastenings of the saints.

By varying the phraseology of the extract of our author, making the saints the subject of this punishment, or chastisement, his objections will all vanish like thin air, or the morning dew before the beams of the Summer's sun. We have perused the tract through and through, and perceive that it is all of the same cast, and all as easily refuted as those pages we have examined. We shall therefore bid it adieu. A. C.

EDITORIAL ITEMS.

HINTS TO OUR FRIENDS.—We can still supply back numbers for new subscribers, who wish to take our paper from the commencement of the present volume.

We can still supply volumes seven, eight and nine, (with the exception of four numbers,) containing entire the discussion between Br. Skinner and Mr. Campbell.

We can supply the entire discussion, itself, together with all the numbers of volume 9, except two.

And, lastly, we not only can supply the above, but we are very anxious to do it, to those who will order them for cash, or procure the requisite number of subscribers, to entitle themselves to copies of them, according to our offers in last volume.

NOW AND THEN.—One word more—Br. Austin's "VOICE TO THE MARRIED" will be commenced next month—with the second quarter of the volume. "Now" is a good time to get subscribers, and "then" will be a good time for those to commence who do not want back numbers. G. and H.

Br. Rogers—Mary T. Cole, of Little Falls, Herkimer county, N. Y., paid for last year's vol. Pro and Con, but only received 7 of the first numbers. She has now paid us $1 more, and wishes the remaining numbers of last and current volumes.

Also, send Pro and Con to Capt. E. Culver, Speedsville, Tompkins county. Credit him $2, and charge G. and H.

Br. Tompkins—Miss Sophia Healey's Repository should be directed Fultonville, Montgomery county, instead of Oppenheim.

Br. Price—Stop the Union to Isaac Earl, Van Buren, when his year expires. Credit Jesse Richards, Binghampton, Nathaniel Benjamin, and Widow Rounds, Vestal, Broome county, each $2, and charge G and H.

Br. Sanderson—Our Agent at Ontario, J. D. Coners, says he paid at your office in Rochester $12.25, September 27th, 1837, for us, and took a receipt signed by W. Chase, for the same. Can you give us any light on the subject? G. and H.

Br. Bazin—We have received $2 of Rev. W. Rounseville, for Expositor.

Br. Price—Send Quarto Union, back numbers, to Jasper G. Stiles, Gibson, Pa. Credit him $3, and charge G. and H.

UTICA BEREAN INSTITUTE.

Tuesday evening at 7 P. M.

Question for Discussion—Should the clergy be recognized as a distinct body or class of people, by constitutional or legal privileges or disabilities, conferred or imposed on them as a body? Affirmative, Messrs. R. T Hallock and L. M. Taylor—Negative, A. B. Grosh and J. G. McAdam.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

SHORT SERMONS.....NO. IV.

BY A LAY PREACHER.

"And he said unto them, go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be damned."—Mark xvi: 15, 16.

This text has been much used by the opposers of Universalism, in support of their pleasing doctrine of eternal damnation—I have said pleasing, because whenever I have heard it quoted in the pulpit, by our opposers, they seem always to pronounce the word damned with a pleasing kind of emphasis. For this reason I have italized the word in the text.

But before we go into an examination of this text, in order to learn its true import, let us admit, for the sake of the argument, that the construction put upon it by our opposers, is the true and correct one; and then inquire what their fate will be in the world of spirits.

The two verses succeeding the text, will afford us a key, with which we shall be able to unlock this iron door of Partialism; but without, I apprehend, discovering any more danger to us, than they are liable to, themselves. "And these signs shall follow them that believe." Well, what are they? "In my name shall they cast out devils," etc. This was a glorious power; and no doubt the eleven, to whom Jesus spake, had this power given them: because they are admitted, on all sides, to have been true believers. But have any of our opposers who preach and quote so often from this text, or have any in times gone by, for centuries, had this power? If not, according to their own showing, they can not be true believers, and therefore they must be damned, along with us poor miserable Universalists—including in the catalogue, all the popes that ever wore the tiara in Rome, John Calvin, Arminius, and all the admitted saints and reformers, since the days of the apostles, and primitive Christians! May the God of heaven have mercy upon us—for if this construction of the text be the true one, it is nearly tantamount to universal damnation.

Again, "They (that believe) shall take up serpents; and if any drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." Can any of those who are preaching so much damnation in the land, go into a den of rattle snakes, and handle the reptiles without being injured? Can they go to the upas tree, procure its gum, and drink a decoction from it, without being hurt? Can they lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover? If not, let them hold their peace; because, if we are damned, they must be damned, too; and Christ's kingdom will be as barren as the deserts of Arabia!

The limits of a "short sermon," will not admit of my going into a lengthy discussion on this subject; I can therefore only briefly glance at some parts of the text.

First. "Go ye into all the world." It can not be rationally supposed that the eleven disciples (the reader should take notice, the command was only given to those disciples) could go all over the inhabited globe, and preach the Gospel to every creature then living. What then is meant by the world here spoken of? I understand it to be the inhabited part of Judea, and that the Israelites were those to whom these disciples were commanded to preach the Gospel. God was preparing to inflict on the Jewish nation, a dreadful calamity, but had promised to spare all those who would believe in Jesus, and accept his Gospel; the unbelievers were to be condemned, (damned, if it will suit our opposers any better,) to utter destruction. In order therefore, that nothing could be brought against the justice of God, the Gospel was commanded to be preached to the whole nation; and such as did believe, were saved, to a man. The unbelievers were destroyed, or taken off into captivity. And this was the damnation spoken of in the text.

I can not discover any allusion in the text, to the popular doctrine of damnation. Jesus says nothing about being "damned" in another world; and his lamentations over Jerusalem would seem to contradict the notion altogether. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, but ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."—Matt. xxiii: 37, 38, 39.

It would seem, by this declaration of Jesus, that these damned Jews were to see him again, and to bless his name, but not in this world.—We must therefore conclude that it was to be in the "New Jerusalem," where they were to meet again.

St. Paul, too, had a different view of this subject, from that which we are now controverting. Hear him; "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, (lest ye should be wise in your own conceits,) that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: for this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins."—Rom. xi: 25, 26, 27. If any one can tell me how the salvation of all Israel, can be reconciled to the popular construction put upon our text, they will be able to reconcile palpable contradictions.

The word "baptized," which we find in our text, I do not feel disposed to say much about. It had a different application in relation to our text, than it now has. I do not wish to enter into a controversy on the subject; but if it was necessary to administer it to any one, in these days, I should prefer to see the immersion plan adopted. The sprinkling with a few drops of water, can hardly be said to be the "shadow of cleansing," while the other mode might at least cleanse externally, if it did not internally.

A few remarks now, upon the word "damned," which we find in our text, and I come to a close. In the first place it should be understood, that there is no word in the Hebrew and Greek languages, that has the signification of damned as the word is understood and explained, by our Partialists. The word in our text is from the Greek, and should be translated condemned—and so it is translated, in several places in the New Testament. There are different degrees in condemnation, but none professing Christianity have different degrees in damnation, unless it may be the Roman Catholics. Therefore, we read in Romans viii: 1, as follows: "There is now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus," etc., which might be translated with the same propriety as the word damned in our text, to read thus: "There is now no damnation" (in any degree) "to them which are in Christ Jesus," etc. But this would not answer the views of the translators and king James, under whose eye the translation of the Bible was made. They were full grown damnationists, and full of ardor in this abominable course.

Thus, and more strange, would appear these words, in many other places in the New Testament, were they not changed, and transposed, by the translators, to suit their own views of future punishment; when, if they had been translated condemned, and condemnation, the great mystery about damned, and damnation, would never have been thought of, by those who now live in so much fear on account of these unnatural terms.

The fact is, these words do not naturally belong to any language, in the heavens, nor on the earth. They are the spurious production of a tyrant in disposition, and a savage in practice. I regret, very much, that I have been under the necessity of making use of them so often in the above discourse. To two classes in the community they will not sound so harsh, viz., to the common swearers, and—(the other class I need not name.) The humane and considerate will be good enough to accept my apology, from the necessity of the case, when I assure them that the words are as disgusting to me, as they can possibly be to them. When, too, by showing them in their naked deformity, they may make ashamed those who use them, both as swearers and preachers. I add no more. J. K.

Sheshequin, Pa.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

AN APPEAL TO THE PUBLIC.

However much I may regret, that those who are professed representatives of the humble Saviour, should bring a reproach upon the cause of Christianity, and actually make it necessary for me to expose in a public manner, their indecorous and unchristian-like conduct, still, that duty which I owe to my family, requires me to make use of those means which God has placed in my power, to exonerate them from the charge of falsehood.

During the progress of a late protracted meeting in the town of Richmond, the Rev. Thomas Castleton, of the Methodist denomination, called upon my family, as we supposed, out of Christian politeness, and, while conversing with myself, expressed in an emphatic manner, a willingness to engage in a public discussion with any Universalist that was a gentleman; and named four propositions, which he should like to canvass. He repeated this a number of times, in a boasting and haughty manner, apparently with great confidence in his ability to "sweep Universalism out of existence."

A few days after, the Rev. Wm. Queal of Bristol, and myself, called upon the Rev. Mr. Castleton, for the purpose of accommodating him with an opponent, who would be willing to enter the field of controversy with him, and discuss the grand subject of Universalism. But to my great astonishment, he unequivocally denied challenging any Universalist to a public controversy.—This places myself and family in an unpleasant situation. As the matter now stands, either the Rev. Thomas Castleton has stated that which is false, or myself and family have. For the purpose of bringing this affair before an impartial community, in such a manner as to enable them to judge correctly, I have procured the certificates of my family and others. All that I ask from my fellow citizens is, that this matter may be weighed in the balance of truth and moral worth, and then, let the charge of falsehood rest upon the guilty one.

JOSHUA PHILLIPS.

We hereby certify, that the Rev. Thomas Castleton, while in conversation with Mr. Joshua Phillips, did state that he was willing to engage in a public discussion with any Universalist.

OLIVE PHILIPS.
MERCY BUTLER.

Richmond, February 14*th*, 1839. JOHN PHILLIPS.

We hereby certify, that we were present when the Rev. Wm. Queal had an interview with the Rev. Thomas Castleton, and that he unequivocally denied, stating to Mr. Joshua Phillips, that he was willing to engage in a public discussion with any Universalist.

ROBISON ORMSBY.
DANIEL S. BAKER.

Richmond, February 14*th*, 1839.

I hereby certify, that the Rev. Thomas Castleton did, in the presence of some fifteen or twenty spectators, deny expressing a willingness to engage in a public discussion with any Universalist. WM. QUEAL.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

This Rev. gentleman, while engaged in visiting Universalist families, is very courageous, and desires to enter into a discussion of the subject of endless misery, and of the final restitution of all intelligent beings to holiness and happiness. But where there is a chance of his finding an opponent, he is as silent as death upon that subject. He can contend with a Universalist clergyman, bravely, and untiringly, and successfully, at a great distance from him. But rather than meet one, he will sacrifice his character for truth and veracity, which he has already done, to some extent, among his Methodist brethren. Our prayer to almighty God is, that he may remember, that

"All liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone."

The Rev. Thomas Castleton has rendered himself some what notorious, in opposing, what he is pleased to call, Universalism. He is considered by some of his friends, as a mighty champion in the Methodist church; but who very meekly calls himself, "the little end of nothing whittled down." He now says, "if he should ever enter the field of controversy with a Universalist, he must be the first man in the denomination." What a condecension on Mr. Castleton's part!! But the gentleman, before he again expresses a desire to engage in a public discussion, had better prove himself clear from the charge of falsehood, which is preferred against him by four competent witnesses. Until then, he had better examine his own creed, and see if it will justify him in stating that which he knows to be as false as he is void of correct principles. WM. QUEAL.

Bristol, February 15, 1839.

For the Magasine and Advocate.

THE TRIAL OF CHRIST.

When the life of a fellow-being is put in jeopardy, and he is undergoing trial by the laws of his country, what an interest is excited in community, and what multitudes throng the court-room!—What sensations, what anxieties pervade the minds of those assembled, while gazing on the accused, who is soon to be either acquitted of the alleged crime, or condemned to suffer death.—These reflections have been occasioned by reading an account of the trial of our Lord and Master, as recorded by St. Matthew, chapter 27.—Behold him standing before the governor in all the meekness and composure of conscious innocence! That governor, arrayed in all the pomp and splendor of oriental costume, propounds the question—art thou the King of the Jews? to which he modestly assents. Then listen to the multiplied accusations of the chief priests and elders, which he bore with a dignified silence—so much so, that the governor marvelled, and reminded him of the many things which they witnessed against him. Still, he deigned not to contend with them. View the countenance of Pilate, while revolving in his mind a plan to save Jesus from the power of his enemies. Fully sensible of his innocence, he recollects the custom of releasing a prisoner, "whom they would," at that feast; he selects one, notorious for his crimes, and determines on giving them their choice, hardly believing that they were depraved enough to desire that one so full of iniquity as Barrabbas, could be released among them, in preference to him whose life had been characterized by benevolence and kindness to all around him. See now the busy forms of the priests and elders, stirring up the multitude, and persuading them to ask Barrabbas and destroy Jesus! A messenger arrives with the request of Pilate's wife, desiring her husband to have nothing to do with that just man. The governor, now seated on the throne of judgment, asks; "which of the two will ye that I release unto you? and they answered, Barrabbas. Again he asks, what shall I do with Jesus?" The multitude vociferate, "Let him be crucified."—Unwilling still to pronounce the dreadful sentence, the governor once more asks, "Why? what evil hath he done?" Instead of answering this candid question, the cry of "let him be crucified," resounds still more loudly through the hall.—Perceiving that he could prevail nothing, he delivers him into their hands. At the same time he pronounces him a just person, and washes his hands in their presence from his innocent blood! What an effect must these scenes have had on the mind of a beholder; and what lessons of patience and forbearance ought we to learn from the examples of our blessed Saviour. A M.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

IS IT A GOOD REASON?

Because this region of the earth is wrapped, at present, in a mantle of snow three feet deep, whose stubbornness and cold-heartedness withstands the most winning smiles of "wooing Sol," are we therefore authorized to say, that Spring will never exert its mild influence, and relax Winter's icy grasp—disperse the drifted heap—unloose the river's cham—bring life to vegetation, and then give place to the Summer "sun's more potent ray," and this again to Autumn's ripening power! A person unacquainted with the varieties of our climate, would undoubtedly believe that all nature was dead forever! that neither the relative position of the sun, nor any other cause could ever enliven it; that there were no elements in the physical world—nay, that not all the elements combined, could make the snow-bound earth send forth her blossoms and her fruits.

And still all this unbelief would not alter the fact. "Rosy-footed May steals blushing on" notwithstanding, and we who are inhabitants of this clime, are just as well assured that the snows will disappear, Spring come, Summer fashion, and Autumn ripen earth's bounties, as if all the world actually believed so too.

And the happy dwellers in the healthy and blooming valley of universal grace and goodness, are as firmly convinced that the dark and icy heart of man, will yet receive the smiles of truth divine, and be melted in contrition, love and praise, as we are of returning Spring; or as if there were none who disbelieved. In this as in the other case, faith or the want of it can in no wise alter the fact.

All that was necessary in the first instance, was to give the man, ignorant of the changes of our climate, instruction upon the subject. Let him once experience, that Winter, cold, and desolate, and unfavorable as it may seem, is no hindrance to the budding, blooming, and gathering season, and his mistakes will be corrected, his ignorance instructed, and his opposition disarmed; and he will as firmly believe that we do alternately have Summer and Winter, as he did before, the contrary.

So, when the ignorance of man shall have been enlightened—when the day-dawn of eternal truth and love shall break in upon his mental vision, then he will have learned that the moral winter of desolation which reigns in the hearts and over the lives of men, can not prevent the final triumph of the mild, yet potent sun-beams of God's universal and endless benignity. The love of the Almighty is without limits—will have its natural effect, and prevail—subdue the rebellious—disarm the enemy—give contrition to the hardened, and fill with love, gratitude and praise, the souls of ransomed and purified humanity.

February, 1839. PHIL.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, Editor; A. R. BARTLETT, Assistant Editor.
G. W. MONTGOMERY, E. H. CHAPIN, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA, FRIDAY, MARCH 8, 1839.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAW OF KINDNESS....NO. V.

"Overcome evil with good."—ROM. xii: 21.

There is still another scene in human life, where the law of kindness is producing the most extraordinary results; results which are contrary to all former experience.—I mean, those unfortunate beings whose light of reason becomes quenched in madness, and the mode by which they are now generally governed. It has hitherto been universally believed, that insane persons must be governed by violence, and that such a mode is the only manner in which they can be managed. Hence, in the past history of insanity, we find it one account of chains, rags, filth and harshness—while the violent and refractory were subjected to severe corporeal punishment, in order to subdue them. So that those poor, afflicted persons, whose mental house was in disorder, not only endured the wo of the utter blasting of reason, but they were visited with cruelty and unkindness.

But now, such views rarely exist. It is seen and admitted, not only that harshness and violence aggravate the complaint of the insane, but that it is both necessary and efficacious to cast the oil of kindness upon the boisterous waters of insanity, and that soothing manners and mild, interesting objects, gain the attention of the poor victims, and render the chances of recovery more certain and complete. Hence, in most, and I do not know but that in all, of the hospitals for the insane, the kindest mode of government is pursued, and the whole discipline adopted, is entirely the spirit of the law, "overcome evil with good." And over the gate of the institution, where the most success in curing insane persons is manifested, there ought always to be written, "kindness reigns here." But though kindness is, or soon will be, the universal rule of action in reference to all maniacs, yet there is an instance on record, which may even be called a bold and daring exhibition of its power; or at least, an instance in which most people would have hesitated, and even refused to adopt it; and one, too, where we should have expected the principle to utterly and entirely fail. There is a Lunatic Asylum for paupers in Hanwell, England. This Asylum was formerly conducted on the old principle of violence, confinement, chains, strait-jackets, whips and threats, until Dr. Ellis and his wife took charge of the establishment. They went into it with the broadest benevolence—their only governing power was "good sense and kindness;" for these were the soul of their system. They determined to visit every lunatic with leniency and liberty. Though such an experiment endangered their lives, yet they opened every door of the building, and gave its inmates free access to every part of the Asylum, treating them "as much as possible as though they were sane." The result is ennobling—after the pursuance of such a course for twenty years, no accident happened from it. Miss Martineau, who visited the Asylum, after speaking of the mode of government there, and the mingling of the inmates together, says:—

"I saw the worst patients in the establishment, and conversed with them, and was far more delighted than surprised to see the effect of companionship on those who might be supposed the most likely to irritate each other. Some are always in a better state when their companions are in a worse; and the sight of wo has evidently a softening effect upon them. One poor creature, in a paroxysm of misery, could not be passed by; and while I was speaking to her as she sat, two of the most violent patients in the ward joined me, and the one wiped away the scalding tears of the bound sufferer, while the other told me how 'genteel an education' she had had, and how it grieved them all to see her there. Why should it be supposed that the human heart ceases its yearnings whenever confusion is introduced among the workings of the brain? And what is so likely to restore order, as allowing their natural play to the affections which can never be at rest? For those who can not visit Hanwell, it may be enough to know, that no accident has happened among Dr. Ellis's many hundred patients, during the twenty years that he has been their guardian; but there is a far higher satisfaction in witnessing and feeling the evident security which prevails in the establishment, where the inmates are more like whimsical children, manageable by steadiness, than wretched maniacs, controllable only by force. 'O do let me out! Do let me go to my dinner!' wailed one in her chamber, who had been sent there because she was not 'well enough' for society in the morning. The dinner-bell had made her wish herself back again among her companions. 'Let me out, and I will be quiet and gentle.' 'Will you?' was the only answer when the door was thrown open. In an instant she dispersed her tears, composed her face, and walked away like a chidden child. The talk of these paupers often abounds in oaths when they first enter; but the orderly spirit of the society soon banishes them. 'I can not hear those words,' Mrs. Ellis says, 'I will hear any thing that you have to say in a reasonable manner. I am in no hurry. I will sit down: now let me hear.' No oaths can follow an invitation like this; and the habit of using them is soon broken."—Miscellanies by H. Martineau; vol. 1, pp, 242, 243.

When an individual is cured, and his mental house is put in order, he leaves the Asylum with the most grateful recollections; for so great is the attention and kindness there practiced, that he feels, when he is uncomfortable, that he can return and find a home under the care of his old friends. The "parting blessing" to the cured patient when going to the busy scenes of life, accompanied with the affectionate smile of Mrs. Ellis, and her kind invitation to return "home" whenever they are in difficulty, are the attractions which make the establishment so desirable to them. "A painter, who had long experienced the kindness of Dr. and Mrs. Ellis, was grieved to leave them. Some time after he had returned to his business in the world, he had a typhus fever; and when he was recovering, his first desire was to get back into his old quarters. 'I will go up to the Asylum,' said he; 'I am sure they will give me a nursing till I get strong.' And so they did." Could any thing be more delightful than such kindness, or more refreshing to the mind? Or could persons exhibit a more magnanimous and Christian spirit, than Dr. and Mrs. Ellis, in devoting their whole time to the welfare and comfort of insane paupers? Pure must have been the feelings and motives which actuated them—holy must have been their thoughts when dwelling upon the results of their labors. Those results are extraordinary. For not only does their kindness and judicious management firmly win the love and gratitude of the insane, but they have rendered chains entirely useless, so that, though in 1834 they had five hundred and sixty-six patients, there were only ten whose arms it was necessary even to gently confine. So, that while in many other institutions for the insane, there are heard howlings, screeches, the rattling of chains, and the utmost extent of human wo, yet here, all is peace, freedom, and comparative enjoyment. And what is more extraordinary still, is, that, under their management, ninety out of every hundred patients are cured, and again blessed with reason.

The power of the law of kindness is, in this case, most nobly apparent. It had not to deal with the wise, the reasonable, and the Christianized—those who understood its divine origin and felt its requirements. But it came in contact with the insane; those whose mental light had been quenched in the boisterous waters of madness, and the star of whose reason had set in darkness; those who could not appreciate the influences and tendencies of kindness. And what was the consequence? It made the stormy maniac gentle as a child—it hushed piercing screeches into softness—it changed violent opposition into obedience—it gave comparative happiness to those whose previous days of insanity were not relieved by a single spot of pleasure. And how did it effect this? It reared no chilly dungeon, gloomy with filth and damp straw; it threw no chains upon the limbs of those who came under its charge; it uttered no threats; it wielded no lash. It cast the oil of gentleness upon the raging waves of violence; it wove its web of silk around the bitter and blighted soul; it threw its light into mental darkness; and it knocked gently for admittance into the fleshly house which was deprived of its lamp of reason. And lo! not only did insanity bow to its holy influence, but in almost every instance, it succeeded in re-arranging the disturbed brain, and in replacing the light of reason in its socket, to fit and prepare its subject once more for the varied duties of human life. Oh, if aught is wanting to convince the skeptical of the power of kindness, it is found here! For if kindness will subdue and cure the insane, how great must be its influence when exerted in reference to those who are sane and can appreciate all its holy excellency? If madness bows to it, will not sanity yield to it?

G. W. M.

Br. Eaton is informed, that we received a remittance of $10, January 2d, which we presume to be the one alluded to in his letter.

JOHN FRENCH, SR.

This worthy father in Israel is no more, and agreeable to promise in his obituary notice, I proceed to notice a few particulars in his long and useful life.

He was born in Billerica, Mass., in April, 1765; and removed to New-Hartford, then called Whitestown, from Jaffrey, N. H., in April, 1789—fifty years ago.—The greater and business portion of Utica was then a swamp, and so bad was what is now the great western turnpike, that frequently the only passable road from New-Hartford to Utica, was by way of Whitesborough!

About 35 years ago, Mr. French and his lady, were led, by reading and reflection, to embrace a belief in the restitution of all things—and became earnestly engaged in bringing others into its joyous hopes and holy feelings. Mr. F. was peculiarly active during his life, in getting books, and preachers, and periodicals into the country, and in supporting by every means, the ministration of the word of life. To furnish an extract from the funeral discourse—"Probably no person present did more than our deceased brother, for the extension of this glorious and heart cheering faith, [Universalism,] in this portion of our land. He loved and cherished it in the pride of manhood—loved it not only in word, but in deed. His hospitable home was the abode of universal love—the home of the preacher of the reconciliation, whether he wandered into this then moral as well as natural wilderness, or whether he here abode among the little flock of believers. His hands were ever ready to help—his lips to speak—his life to illustrate the faith he avowed. And not only was his house the preacher's home—not only did he exert himself to spread a knowledge of God as the Father of all men, in this vicinity—but often did he itinerate far and near, bearing with him, in his conveyance, the preacher of the glad tidings, thus generously devoting his time and labor, that others also, might taste and see that the Lord was good, in deed.

"Nor was the preacher, himself, forgotten, as is too often the case even among our zealous brethren. Br. French gave freely and liberally of his own basket and store, and of the contents of his purse, to the faithful laborer in the Gospel field; and when he carried the minister abroad, to proclaim the impartial goodness of God, he stimulated others to a like exhibition of justice and good will, and with his own hands, took up the collections of the believers for the support of the preacher.

"And this house—this almost deserted temple, erected and dedicated to the worship of 'the living God, who is the Saviour of all men'—this house, erected 25 years ago, when there was not a Universalist meeting-house, and but few Universalist societies west of the Hudson river—this house found in him one of its devoted builders, and a liberal supporter of the ministrations of the sacred desk. In these walls he was a punctual and delighted hearer whenever health and strength permitted, and rejoiced 'with joy unspeakable and full of glory,' as his warm heart swelled with love and gratitude to God, the Father and Saviour of all."

But my limits forbid more. A few years since he was thrown from a sleigh and injured a nerve of his arm above the elbow. An occasional tremulous motion of the hand commenced, increased, and finally spread over the whole frame. Nervous derangement affected his mind, and for several Winters past he was at times delirious, and slept but little at nights. This Winter he seemed rather worse than usual—and finally a general torpor pervaded his system, his appetite failed, and after enduring much pain, in despite of the care of tenderest friends and the skill of physicians, "the harp of thousand strings" ceased its strains. He has left a widow, a son and daughter, in New-Hartford, and another daughter in Illinois, together with a very large circle of relatives, friends and acquaintances, to mourn their loss. His own family, and many of his friends, are supported by the same faith wherewith the deceased was strengthened and consoled.

The funeral was a large one, and many who claimed no relationship, except that of a common nature, with the deceased, were mourners—particularly the few aged men and women who had long known and loved him. A father in our Israel hath departed—peace be to his ashes, and honor to his memory!

A. B. G.

THE BIBLE.

The following toast chanced to be born in Rochester, January 29th, 1839, at the celebration of Thomas Paine's birth day, held in that city. We presume that if Thomas Paine was alive now, he would not thank them for thus insulting his nativity. We copy it from the "New York Watchman," as a specimen of the profound argument, learned criticism, and spirited free inquiry, used by the opposers of the Bible, which is every way worthy of sober recollection. Let every Christian preserve the sentiment "to be exhibited as a curiosity to future generations," indicating the ingenuousness, candor, and refinement of those who oppose the Bible, in the nineteenth century. Reader here it is.

"The Bible:—Used up!—Christians are ashamed of it, and 'Infidels' neglect it Let us lay the old thing upon the shelf to be exhibited as a curiosity to future generations."

The thing, (we mean according to its theory, not according to fact,) from which this sentiment sprouted, need not be over anxious about laying the Bible on the shelf. We assure him it will not hurt him; and also, that as has been the case heretofore, so will it be hereafter; it will continue to be handed down to posterity, and be examined, and joyfully and gratefully studied, not as a curiosity itself, but as a "thing" which places its opposers in a curious predicament.

That 'infidels' generally have but little knowledge of the Bible, and are therefore poor judges of its merits, has often been charged upon them. Now they have advanced at a public feast, and published in one of their own papers, a confession to that effect—unless, indeed, it be contended that to "neglect" the Bible, is to acquire a knowledge of it. Hereafter, when we hear the phrase, Free Inquiry, applied to "infidels," we have only to substitute the word "neglect," for that of inquiry, in order to understand what is meant, according to the key, furnished in the above toast.

But in what manner do Christians evince their shame of the Bible? Is it in the fact that its advocates are steadily and powerfully increasing in numbers, despite the sneers of their mistaken opposers? Then the charge is true. Is it in the fact that wherever Gospel truths are felt, there is genuine morality and happiness, and where those truths are unknown, there is immorality, misery and degradation? Then the charge is true. Is in the fact that the more the Bible is examined, the brighter is the glow of its truth? Then the charge is true, for every day adds to the number who yield to the moral power of Gospel truth. We do not denounce the "infidel" as an outcast from the favor of God. No, for the very Book which he despises, teaches us that he is our brother. But if he is determined to starve, or refuses to have his diseased appetite restored to health, we can do no more than to set before him, the viands of truth—we can not compel him to eat.

We are very gravely told that the Bible is "used up." News indeed. I have my Bible yet, and its truths are just as grand, just as sublime, just as dear to me, as ever they were. It teaches me—what my infidel brother can never learn by his philosophy—that I am not a brute, a thing without a name; that I have a higher duty to perform, a higher station to occupy, and a higher destiny awaiting me, than the beast that perishes. And so it is with thousands. Its use is becoming more and more elevated, its truths better appreciated, and its precepts more faithfully obeyed: and all this exactly proportioned to the improving morals of mankind. This is the way it is "used up," and so effectually too, that even the "infidel" can not perform a good act without so far furnishing an evidence of its truth; nor can he practically oppose it, without becoming so far an immoral man. Reader, we do not care how long it continues to be so "used up."

A. R. B.

CIRCULAR TO STANDING CLERKS.

UTICA, February 27, 1839.

Dear Brother:

I am desirous of procuring from you full and correct information of the Cause in your section, for the Register for 1840. It is believed, that by consulting the records of your Association, and by conversing and corresponding with neighboring ministering brethren, you can furnish all that is necessary. Send a bill with your returns—for we are willing to remunerate you for your labor—and please inform us how we can best and soonest liquidate it.

The following are the items on which I wish as full and particular information as can be obtained, on or before the first day of June next.

1st. UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATIONS.—State the names and limits of your Associations in your section—when organized—the number of societies, churches, meeting-houses, and preachers within their bounds—the names of Standing Clerks and their post-office address—and the prospects of the Cause in each. Underscore those added since June, 1838—prefix †, if not in formal fellowship, and a *, if omitted in previous Registers.

2d. UNIVERSALIST SOCIETIES.—State the location of each church and each society existing in your section—when organized—its present number of members—its proportion in the meeting-house, if any—the proportion of time its sustains preaching—whether it has a Sunday school, Bible class, library, etc., etc. Underscore those added since June, 1838—prefix †, if not in formal fellowship—or a *, if omitted in previous Registers.

3d. UNIVERSALIST PREACHERS.—Please give me each preacher's name and post-office address, in your section. Underscore those who have been added since June, 1838—prefix †, if not in formal fellowship—‡, if he has formerly been a Partialist preacher—*, if omitted in former Registers.

4th. UNIVERSALIST INSTITUTES.—Give us the names of these Associations—when organized—present number of members—number of volumes in their library, and name of their Corresponding Secretary. Underscore those added since June, 1838—prefix *, if omitted in former Registers.

5th. UNIVERSALIST PUBLICATIONS.—If periodicals—terms and days of publication, number of copies, size, Editors, Publishers, etc. If books and pamphlets—size, number of pages, retail price, number of copies, when published, Author's name, Publishers, etc., etc.

6th. Schools under the patronage of the denomination, and every other information relating to the Cause, which you may deem necessary besides the foregoing.

Please be as accurate as possible, and do not fail to send so that I may get the full returns here requested, before the first day of June next, if possible, that I may have time to copy off, and arrange, and prepare all the returns I may receive, for the press, in sufficient time. If any alterations occur, or you wish any mistakes corrected, they can be sent on after the full return, or published in any Universalist weekly periodical—any time before the 15*th of July next*—as it is easy to insert them in the copy prepared for press. The main difficulty is to prepare the returns themselves—so, again let me urge you, do not fail to send so that I may get the return before the first day of June next.

That you may know whether any of the societies, etc., have been in former Registers or not, I send you a copy of each Register heretofore published. Please be careful in comparing them with your list, when made out, and in affixing the marks as I have suggested.

Excuse the trouble I ask at your hands, on the plea that I can not possibly get the information I need, in any other manner—and on the assurance, that even after I have paid you for your labor, I will esteem myself your much obliged and grateful Brother in the Gospel of reconciliation, A. B. GROSH.

The above Circular has been sent to all the Standing Clerks of our Conventions and Associations out of the State of NewYork, whose address I was certain of.—But there are some whose names even I do not know, and others, whose present residence is unknown to me. And those in this State will, I trust, be willing to save me the labor and expense of directly addressing them by letter. So that I publish the Circular in the paper, and request brother Editors in the connexion to copy it with these remarks, that it may reach all concerned.

All who have information to communicate, will please communicate it, on or before the middle of April next, to the following brethren in their respective States—D. Forbes, Hallowell, Me.; M. Ballou, Portsmouth, N. H.; E. Garfield, Bethel, or J. Wallace, Montpelier, Vt.; B. H. Davis, or W. S. Balch, Providence, R. I.; L. R. Paige, Cambridgeport, Mass.; A. Moore, Hartford Conn.; A. C. Thomas, Philadelphia, Penn.; J. A. Gurley, Cincinnati, Ohio; N. Stacy, Ann Arbor, Mich.; J. P. Fuller, Henderson, Ills.; E. B. Mann, or William Course, Leavenworth, Ind.; I. D. Williamson, Baltimore, Md.; E. H. Chapin, Richmond, Va.; A. Fuller, Double Branches, Pickens District, S. C., or Dr. L. F. W. Andrews, Macon, Ga.—and in all other cases, or where most convenient, to "Magazine and Advocate Office, Utica, N. Y."

 Advertisements will be inserted on the cover of the Almanac, and of the Almanac and Companion, at the rate of ten cents per line, burgeois type. As the circulation will probably be over 25,000 copies, and as the lines are longer than those of newspaper columns, this rate is cheap compared with common advertising. The attention of booksellers, especially, is invited to the subject. Advertisements to be inserted, must be accompanied with pay, and reach here on or before the first of June next. A. B. G.

☞ Will each of our periodicals please insert the above once—and charge this office. G. and H.

COMMON SCHOOL LIBRARY,

PUBLISHED BY THE AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

A friend has called our attention to the fact, that notwithstanding the repeated deceptions of this sectarian association misnamed American, some of the liberal public are credulous enough to be again deceived by its professions of unsectarianism. Always ready to thrust its proselyting publications into the hands of our youth, it has availed itself of the opportunity furnished by the legal establishment of District school libraries, to get up a collection of its stereotyped works, well interlarded with the doctrines of the trinity, total depravity, and endless sin and misery, and to offer them for sale to the proper committees, as entirely free from sectarianism.—A greater lie was never coined by them. A considerable number of the books are decidedly sectarian—purposely written to inculcate sentiments abhorrent to God, pernicious to man, and directly opposed to the sentiments of all liberal Christians. Let our friends beware of purchasing such books for school libraries—which, as they are to be read by children of all denominations, should contain no religious doctrines, but such as all agree in believing. And if any have been deceived by the assurance that these works are free from sectarianism, into purchasing them, let them immediately return them to the seller, and compel him to refund the purchase money, thus obtained under false and deceptious representations of the character of the article sold.—Examine the works immediately—mark the sectarian passages, and return the work forthwith with a claim for the money paid for them; thus teaching these men that they can not succeed in imposing on an honest and intelligent community, by their lying professions of liberality. Justice to them—justice to the deceived public—justice to the children for whose use these libraries are purchased, imperiously demands this measure.

In our next, I will pursue this subject, and point out a few of the objectionable passages in some of the books. Meanwhile, let every parent who values honesty in book publishers, and the correct moral and religious instruction of his children, see to the matter for himself, and he will find that the Library published by the "American Sunday School Union," is deserving of his indignation, reprobation and opposition—if on no other score, on the ground of the deceptious pretences by which it is urged on the patronage of the public. A. B. G.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Knickerbocker for February has been received and partly read. We rejoice to hear that the subscription list is rapidly increasing—an evidence of public opinion of its merits which can not be otherwise than gratifying to its publishers. If they are made of the right kind of stuff, they will continue, instead of lessening their great exertions in catering for the public taste.

The American Phrenological Journal, published by Waldie of Philadelphia, continues to increase in interest. There are one or two articles in the last number which we would like to publish in our columns, had we room. In despite of an occasional sickly effort made in its pages, to reconcile some of the theological absurdities and monstrosities of popular orthodoxy with Phrenological facts, (about as difficult as to reconcile them with Scripture,) the journal is deserving of a liberal support from inquirers into, and believers in Phrenology. ☞Specimens exhibited, and subscriptions received at our Book-store.

The Common School Journal.—The fourth number of this valuable and interesting periodical is before us.—It is published semi-monthly, by Marsh, Capen, Lyon and Webb, Boston; Horace Mann, Esq., (Secretary of the Mass. Board of Education,) Editor; at only one dollar per annum, or for 384 large octavo pages, neatly printed, on excellent paper. Massachusetts seems to be wide awake and going ahead on the subject of common schools, and with the aid of such a work as this journal, it appears to me they might go in the right direction. From some articles by Mr. Mann, I am rejoiced to find that the efforts of sectarian proselytes will not succeed in their unholy and bigoted aim in that commonwealth. Would that the people of the Empire State were enough awake to examine the district libraries some of them are purchasing from the American Sunday School Union! If they were, they would sooner burn the books than put such poisonous trash into the hands of children of our common schools.

But to return to this Common School Journal—it is worthy of extensive patronage and circulation. Specimens can be seen at our Bookstore, where subscriptions will also be received. A. B. G.

A SAD MISTAKE.

By reason of some fatality, or chance, or carelessness, or for some other reason, only a part of the notice for the fourth Chenango Conference, was published last week—alas, the poor child might as well have been denied a name. The reader was notified that there would be such a Conference and when, but the whereabout was not given. The fault was mine. I might here inflict upon the reader a specimen of absent mindedness, was it not that the mistake is too serious for a joke—Notice, therefore, that the fourth Conference of the Chenango Association, will be held at Upper Lisle, Broome county, on the 13th and 14th inst.

A. R. B.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. GAGE, at Bullock Hill, and near Br. EMMORY'S in the evening—Br. MCADAM, at union meeting-house, Lee Centre—Br. KIBBE, at Marshall, and at Br. Dick's school-house in the evening—Br. BULLARD, at Dryden, and lecture at Etna in the evening, and lecture on Monday evening at Libertyville, and on Tuesday evening at Ludlowville.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. MCADAM, at Marshall—Br. BULLARD, at Homer, and at McLean same day, and lecture at Groton Hollow in the evening.

The fourth Conference of the Chenango Association of Universalists, will be held at Upper Lisle, on the second Wednesday and Thursday, 13th and 14th inst.

LETTERS CONTAINING REMITTANCES,

Received at this office since the publication of our last paper.

A B, Clinton, (La) for J B, J C, W R, R W P, T E S, S A K, I W L, J C G, I B, R D, T E P, A W and L R B—P M, Union Springs, for Z A and J W C—J F, Ronse Point, for self, A A and E D—J S Jr, Gibson (Pa) for A C, O S, A R J S 2d and J G S—J D C, Ontario—J B, Carlton's Store (Va) for self, J G and J C—E K, Harford—Rev T D C, for A D F, S B, W T and A H—P V I, Waddington, for E S, S J D, A T M and B B—E H, Henrietta—Rev W B, Cortlandville, for J B, S B, B H, S C, A C and J C—P M, Newburg (O) for S J and A U—S M, Caledonia, for W H and O M M—M W J, Marengo, for self, S C, P M, J L, J D S, J W and H P—P M, E Bloomfield, for S B, L B, F B, A H Jr and W P—P M, Braman's Corners, for J B, I C B R H, A McM, A B, A E, R H, C C, J B, J K, C F, W A J, C G, E L and M O E—W S, Lyons, for self, R A, D J, B C Jr, J F H, J S, W F and W W W—Rev L P, Panama, for L R D, E R, M P and E W L—O T, Ionia (Mich) for self, A S, J T and A M—Rev J B, Dummerston (Vt) for self, J B, P M and E G A—S W, Grand Rapids, (Mich) for R H and S C

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

UNIVERSAL PROVIDENCE.

BY MISS EMELINE ROUNSEVILLE.

The God who made the bright blue sky,
And placed the shining stars above;
Formed, too, the little birds that fly,
And fill the air with songs of love.

He made the speckled trout that glide
So nimbly in the sunny stream;
He formed the ocean's rolling tide,
And all the fish that live therein.

He made all things that live and move,
And all, his constant goodness share,
He loves them with a parent's love,
And guards them with a parent's care.

Whene'er I take my walks abroad,
Or lay me down at night to sleep;
Thou still art near—my Friend—my God!
From every harm my soul to keep!

Then let me love thee more and more,
And trust thy loving kindness still;
If aught of wrong I've done before,
In future may I do thy will.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

A religious reform in general seems necessary and desirable. Very few among those who allow themselves to reason, believe that the priesthood has the power of sending into, or excluding from, heaven.—Christianity and common sense teach that every one should do his duty, and that he can do no more. Religious teachers, therefore, should be considered in the same way as teachers in languages, arts and sciences. Every one who has talent and time might study religious ideas, write and converse with others on them, in short, do as he pleases, provided he conducts himself in conformity with the principles of general morality.—Every one might read the Scriptures of Revelation, and form his own opinion; and every civil government should follow the example of the United States of America, and abolish the priesthood as a political body, or as a necessary division of the government. Jesus expressly stated that his kingdom was not of this world.—(John xviii. 36.)

I am aware that the sacerdocy will object to such a reform, and do what they can to make many believe that there is no morality without religion, and no religion without their office, and that they deserve to be largely rewarded. I, however, can not help thinking that man has been, and still is, misled by priests, because he is naturally religious, and that priests ascribe to their influence, what belongs to the power of the CREATOR. The time of what was called theocracy is over. I can, however, conceive, that where civil governments decide in every respect what people are permitted to do, religions as well as political opinions are dictated; but it seems natural to admit, that where liberal principles prevail, religious and civil liberty should go hand in hand. Yet there is still too much credulity among the great number of congregations. They are occupied during the week in their worldly concerns, and on Sunday, without troubling themselves much with examination, they will listen to their clergyman, if he speaks to their liking, and according to their feelings. Some teachers will cry against the great pope of Rome, but make at the same time the little pope in their pulpit, in sending all who differ from their manner of thinking to eternal damnation, whilst they declare themselves and their followers predestined to eternal beatitude: This doctrine, indeed, is comfortable for the elect, and the congregation may say amen and sing Alleluia, but it shows also that common sense is sometimes wanted in religious considerations. I think it wrong to leave these matters exclusively to a privileged profession, whilst they ought to occupy every intelligent mind.—Spurtheim on Education.

It is in the middle classes of society, that all the finest feelings, and the most amiable propensities of our nature, do principally flourish and abound. For the good opinion of our fellow-men is like strangers, though not the purest motive to virtue. The privations of poverty render us too cold and callous, and the privileges of property, too arrogant and consequential to feel: the first, places us beneath the influence of opinion—the second, above it.

As the next thing to having wisdom ourselves, is to profit by that of others, so the next thing to having merit ourselves, is to take care that the meritorious profit by us; for he that rewards the deserving, makes himself one of the number.

AGENTS.

NEW-YORK.

Adams, Sampson Jaquith
Addison, I W Rowley
Akron, L E Harrington
Alabama, Nelson Netheway
Albany, E Murdock, Rev S R Smith
Albion, R Caswell
Alexander, Rev S Goff
Alden, R Bills
Amboy, J Carter P M
Ames, A Mudge
Antwerp, A Weeks
Apulia, E A Mills
Attica, C Lovelace
Auburn, Rev G W Montgomery
Ava, D Edgarton
Avon, J Raymond
Bainbridge, A Stockwell
Barre Centre, B Mattison P M
Batavia, H B Crompton
Bath, Rev M L Wisner
Belfast, S Wilson Jr
Belville, I Mendall
Benton, H Barden
Bennington, A Hayden
Black River, F Butterfield
Bombay, W Randall
Boonville, S Harrington
Braman's Corners, R Frisbee
Brantingham, D H Higby P M
Bridgewater, S Richards
Bristol, Rev W Queal
Brownville, A Skinner
Buffalo, Moses Baker
Burlington, Capt E Pratt
Butternuts, S H Adsit and P M
Byron, J Seaver
Cambria, D Rogers
Camillus, Charles Land
Canal, D C Lytle P M
Canastota, T Barlow Esq
Canajoharie, David Dain
Canandaigua, J Gage
Canton, Z N Ellis
Carroll, Albert M Thornton and Rev S Adams
Carthage, S A Budd
Cato, A F Ferris P M
Cedarville, Dr B Phileo P M
Central Square, H Fitch
Chapinville, Harris Andrews
Champion, T A Granger
Champion South Roads, C J Johnson P M
Champlain, John Fish
Chateaugay, J Manning Esq
Chestertown, J H Smith
Chittenango, A S Nichols
Clausaville, O Tuller
Cicero, Wm Winte
Clarendon, E Farwell Jr P M
Clayton, G Caswell
Clear Creek, M Sheldon P M
Cleveland, S H Stevens P M
Clintonville, I T Hyde
Clockville, S Chapman P M
Cobleskill, S B Wakeman
Cohocton, D Palmenter
Cold Brook, J Trask Jr
Collinsville, I Brinkerhoof
Conewaugs, S Cowley
Constantia, E M Fitch P M
Concord Centre, A Ashman P M
Constableville, H Johnson
Copenhagen, E Moody
Cooperstown, S Doubleday P M
Corinth, J W Creal
Cortlandville, J Badgley Esq
Cortland Town, E P Agate P M
Coventryville, Dr E Cornell P M
Cowlesville, Rev S A Steele
Coxsackie, H Gates
Darien Centre, Rev J S Flagler
Dansville, D Grover
Danube, C Kosboth Esq
Deansville, C H Stacy
Depauville, S Johnson P M
Delphi, S Benedict
Denmark, Rev J French
De Ruyter, D N Barber
East Bloomfield, H Munson P M
East Greene, W H H Crandall
East Hamilton, W H Taroop
East Pembroke, G W Wright
East Pike, S McFarland
East Richfield, D Brown. Nelson Coleman
East Sheridan, J I Eacker
Eaton, J McConnell Esq
Eaton's Corners, R Frisbee
Elba, Franklin Patterson
Elbridge, A Clarke
Ellicottville, L Vinton
Erieville, B Turner
Euclid, W Warner
Evan's Mills, E Hungerford
Fabius, C P Johnson
Factoryville, W R Finch
Fall Creek, E Finney
Farmers, S Squires
Farmingham, C Lee P M
Fairport, D M H Graves
Fayetteville, Amb ose Clark
Felt's Mills, O Wheelock
Fenner, D Cook Jr P M
Fort Plain, Edward Lindsay
Fowler, Rev O Wilcox
Frankfort, J B Dygert and E T Marsh
Franklinville, Otis W Phillips
Fredonia, T Gillis and Rev T C Eaton
Friendship, C H Davis
Fultonham, J W Bouck P M
Gainesville, Rev W E Manley
Garoga, S R Dudley
Geneseo, J F Wyman
Geneva, Rev O Ackley and I Prescott
Genoa, A Avery
Gilboa, W Stevens
Goff's Mills, W Goff P M
Governeur, Chester Betts
Greenfield, S Gregory
Greenwood, L Davis P M
Hague, J McClanathan
Hamilton, John Martin
Hannibalville, M Pierce
Harford, Erving Taintor
Harpersville, D Barnes
Hartwick, J S Perkins and J W Brewer
Hastings, Rev C B Brown
Henderson, D Montague and Rev P Morse
Hermon, B Healey P M
Heuvelton, W Thurstin P M
Hobart, N Stevenson
Homer, M Berry
Hoosick Falls, J L Wells
Hopkinton, E Seely
Honeoye Falls, E B Vedder
Hornby, T Hendricks
Hornelsville, Rev A Upson
Howard, O Marshall
Howlet Hill, J Case P M
Hunter, A R Benjamin
Hume, S G Mills and Rev I B Sharp
Jacksonville, J Cooper P M
Jamestown, W H Tew
Johnson's Creek, F Butterfield P M
Johnstown, G Van Nostrand
Jordan, W K Knowlton
Kempville, J D Cooper
Kings Ferry, D Adams P M
Kirkland, D Pixley
Lafargeville, Luke Frame
Lakeville, Rev O Roberts
Lancaster, E M Safford
Lansingburg, Rev M Rayner
Lawrenceville, J F Sanders
Lebanon, Rev E M Woolley
Leesville, S Eldredge
Le Roy, S W Carpenter
Leyden, J Rockwell and Rev J A Aspinwall
Lima, W Smith
Linden, A J Waldron
Little Falls, T Cole 2d, and S Petrie
Livonia, Robert Adams
Logan, J S Smith P M
Louisville, J Marsh Jr
Lowville, S Murray
Lyons, J B Pierce, W Sisson
McLean, H Boynton
Macedon Centre, J M Mott
Madrid, Alfred Goss
Malone, S Field
Manchester, A F Chamberlain
Manlius, A Mills
Mannsville, J W Persons
Marengo, M W Jenkins
Martville, F Austin P M
Massena, Rev E A Garfield
Maysville, J Pratt
Mead's Creek, Geo. Patchin
Medina, Roswell Star
Mendon, Squire Goff
Mexico, B Thayer
Middlefield, W Shipman
Middlefield Centre, Dr A Todd
Middleville, Ira Farmer
Milan, D Badgley Jr
Milford, Lorenzo Bates
Mohawk, P H Warrin
Moravia, Eleazer Woodward
Moriah, G T Barker
Moreland, L Sanford
Mottville, Adam Thumb
Mount Hope, B Dodge
Naples, B K Lyon P M
Nashville, A Sprague
Nelson, J Donaldson P M
Newark, D Kenyan and Rev K Townsend
New-Berlin, T Howard
New-Berlin Centre, M L Wood P M
Newburg, J W Waterfield
New-Haven, T Gridley Esq.
New-Lisbon, E Lull
Newville, Dr A Snyder
Newport, B S Keeler
New-York, P Price
Nichols, G W Saxton
Nicholville, W Spencer
Norfolk, T Kingsbury Jr
